LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Monday, April 18, 1983

The Third Session of the 32nd Parliament of the province of Ontario opened at 3 p.m. for the dispatch of business pursuant to a proclamation of the Honourable J. B. Aird, Lieutenant Governor of the province.

The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, having entered the chamber and being seated upon the throne, was pleased to open the session with the following gracious speech.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Hon. Mr. Aird: Pray be seated.

Mr. Speaker and members of the Legislative Assembly, Ontario is now emerging from a period that has proven to be difficult for all jurisdictions within the industrial western world. The economic setbacks experienced in 1982 were, beyond doubt, more severe than any public or private observers had foreseen. For the first time since 1975, real output for the industrialized economies as a whole declined; and, more disturbing, unemployment rose to unprecedented post-war heights. Clearly, steps must be taken to overcome this situation.

It is gratifying to be able to report to this Legislature, therefore, that we are now witnessing several positive signs, both in the resumption of economic activity with increased employment as well as in the fight against inflation. The restoration of confidence has begun.

The personal economic outlook for many Ontarians, however, will remain challenging. My government is well aware of the hardships imposed by current high levels of unemployment. These hardships have been borne by men and women in all regions and from all walks of life. The lessening of these difficulties will continue to head the list of matters requiring the full attention of this Legislature.

It is obvious that no single province has at its disposal the means to solve all of the problems resulting from current economic conditions. However, the government of Ontario will continue to give the highest priority towards the fashioning of initiatives designed to provide badly needed job opportunities.

The last provincial budget outlined a number of such initiatives. The job creation program which was announced at that time created some 40,290 jobs at a cost of $176 million. An additional $150 million was later provided for direct job creation projects and for co-operative programs with the government of Canada. Funding for employment programs for young people, who have experienced higher unemployment levels than the rest of the work force, has been increased to $120 million. Through these and other measures, the government has endeavoured to assist in creating conditions conducive to economic recovery. In recent months there have been indications that additional developments have occurred which should aid in this process.

For example, there has been a significant slowdown in inflation. Consumer price increases in Canada have declined from an annual rate of 12.5 per cent in 1981 to the six per cent range during the last few months. Moderation of unit labour cost increases and the favourable outlook for food and energy prices will both contribute to continued dampening of overall price increases in the year ahead.

Trends in wage and salary settlements have also contributed to the growing confidence in our ability to cope with inflation. In the public sector many jurisdictions in Canada, including Ontario, have demonstrated a commitment to ending the inflationary environment through the implementation of public sector wage and price restraint, and in the private sector there is evidence that major wage settlements are also moderating.

Concurrently in this country and in the United States there are signs that economic activity is increasing. Interest rates have declined substantially. In specific sectors—housing, appliances, autos—there has been a perceptible quickening in the pace of activity. Recent reports reveal that consumer confidence has increased significantly, and nothing will offer a surer sign of improving economic conditions than a decision by individual consumers to enter the marketplace.

The stage now appears set, therefore, for an enduring economic recovery in Ontario and Canada. The evidence is clear that such recovery and the increased employment opportunities that will result from it will centre primarily on the private sector. The responsibility of government, including that of Ontario, will be to create the proper climate for the private sector to foster that economic growth, to complement the efforts of business and industry through appropriate plans and programs, and to assist directly and in a variety of ways those citizens who, for whatever reasons, require help, including assistance in finding appropriate job opportunities, within the work force.

The importance of a well-trained labour force for economic recovery is obvious. Ontario possesses one of the most highly developed systems for manpower training in North America, delivered in the main through its community college network. Last summer my government took the lead in developing, with the government of Canada, a new national training program which will further institutional training and at the same time give significant additional financial support for training within industrial settings. As the economy improves, it is equally important for employers to fulfil their training obligations by increasing their commitment to and participation in these programs.

While job training will demand particular attention during this period in which industrial requirements and the technology that supports them are changing so rapidly, we cannot lose sight of the need to continue to provide high-quality programs of all types within our educational system. This will require constant examination of school organization and curriculum content as has been evidenced by the recent secondary education review project. Further, to ensure the most effective results for the resources available, new developments, both in terms of programs and facilities, will of necessity be approved on a priority basis.

It is clear too that as new technology takes hold, traditional job patterns will change and, in some cases, disappear. This in turn will give rise to significant changes in the style and nature of life for many Ontario citizens. Rather than wait and react to these events as they unfold, my government intends to undertake an extensive and serious study of these projected developments so that we are in the strongest possible position to assist Ontarians to adjust to the changing circumstances within our industrial and business sectors.

In times such as these organized labour plays a vital role, not only in representing the interests of individual members but also in working together with business and the government to find practical solutions to our common difficulties. It has, for example, undertaken constructive co-operation with management in the introduction of pilot projects in quality of working life across the province. These efforts will be extended and enhanced in coming months as a further example of what can be achieved through co-operative efforts involving labour, business and government.

Further, sustaining the turnaround in economic activity will require a continuing commitment by all parts of our society to act responsibly. For both those in the private and public sector, this will mean continuing the trend towards moderation in the demands placed on the economy—in wage and salary settlements and in the movement of prices. Failure to achieve such restraint will shatter the growth of confidence and slow the momentum of economic expansion.

Constructive intergovernmental co-operation is also critical to economic recovery and the restoration of public confidence, and it is with this in mind that my government once again calls upon the Prime Minister of Canada to convene a first ministers' meeting on the economy at an early date. Such a meeting could serve to chart the course of a broadly based economic recovery during the remainder of this decade. We must build and give impetus to the emerging climate of optimism. Our citizens deserve no less. While the recently established federal Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada was a welcome initiative, we cannot rely solely on this longer-term process to spur lasting economic recovery. Enhanced federal-provincial co-operation is required now.

For its part, the government of Ontario is resolved to bear its full share of responsibility and to continue to provide leadership in the weeks and months ahead. My ministers, therefore, in their several responsibilities, will be placing before you, in this session, components of a clearly defined three-part program. Measures will be introduced to contribute to an enduring economic recovery which will create the jobs necessary to allow all Ontarians to lead productive lives; to strengthen the management of the province's affairs; and to respond to the critical concerns and needs of Ontarians, in all areas of their lives, through this adjustment period.

The budget, to be presented in May, will form a key element of this program. It will address the broad directions the government will take in meeting the fiscal and economic policy challenges facing Ontario today. Emphasis will be placed on strengthening the province's longer-term economic potential.

In the coming year, the government will continue to set priorities and co-ordinate economic initiatives to ensure that our province is able to take full advantage of the many resource and technological opportunities that will be available in the future. Many initiatives already in place will demand further fiscal resources and strategic guidance.

While continuing this work, we will strive constantly to seek out new initiatives. Specifically, we can expect new projects and programs in such fields as fusion fuel technology, interregional transit, assistance to single-industry communities in northern Ontario, development and marketing of pollution abatement equipment, development of a Canadian school microcomputer and educational software, and tourism.

These initiatives will be supplemented further in the coming 12 months by a number of new measures. My government's goal is to promote and encourage the development of internationally competitive industries, including the agricultural sector, which will result in the creation of new jobs and increases in real incomes, both corporate and personal. Our goals, for which policies and programs will be outlined, are: to stimulate business investment significantly over the next two years; to double foreign trade over the next five years; to increase domestic market expansion; to increase the productivity and entrepreneurship of small and medium-sized businesses; and to increase innovation in all sectors of our economy.

Of particular importance to economic recovery and growth in Ontario is the state of the automotive industry. For this reason, during the past year Ontario has pursued discussions with the government of Canada and business and labour leaders to promote its revitalization and future development. In this regard, as a short-term measure, we continue to advocate, in the strongest possible terms, restriction in the number of imported cars to allow the domestic industry time to adjust to the new circumstances and, more important, to permit time to obtain agreement from foreign manufacturers to increase significantly Canadian content in their products. Since we are not satisfied that federal officials are acting vigorously enough on this matter, we intend to increase our own efforts.

We have supported, in recent months, the establishment of the Task Force on Canadian Motor Vehicles and Automotive Parts Strategy and look forward to the release of its report. Without prejudging the findings of this report, we believe that the continued viability of the Canadian automotive industry will only be ensured in the longer term by requiring all vehicle manufacturers sharing the Canadian market to operate under the same requirements as those mandated under the 1965 Canada-United States automotive products trade agreement. The importance of the automotive industry to our overall economic good health requires no less.

The problems that have shadowed the world economy over the past few years have taken a particularly heavy toll in the farm community. Farmers have been hit financially by high interest rates and further squeezed by low commodity prices. The government acted to alleviate this situation by providing a temporary bridging to improved economic times.

Originally, the Ontario farm adjustment assistance program was scheduled to expire on December 31, 1982. In light of the current economic situation and the unlikely prospects of significant improvement in commodity prices, the program has been extended. In addition, Ontario, in co-operation with Saskatchewan, has taken the lead in designing a national tripartite stabilization program to insure producers against volatile commodity prices in the future.

The ministry will reinforce its efforts in the area of financial counselling, designed to assist producers in optimizing their business decisions. Initiatives will also be taken to support the long-term development of our northern Ontario agricultural resources.

In addition, no farmer should fear the loss of his product through the failure of another business or misrepresentation of a buyer. Complementing the livestock financial protection program, successfully introduced for beef producers last year, it is our objective to expand this type of protection. For example, the Grain Elevator Storage Act, currently under review, will be updated to provide better protection for farmers who store their grain in elevators.

In order to remain competitive, Ontario agriculture requires a continuous stream of young, highly qualified entrants to carry on in this vitally important sector of the economy. The government recognizes the many problems faced today by young farmers. Accordingly, we shall be proposing measures to assist young people entering agriculture for the first time to get a fair start.

My government will continue the programs established to reduce potential and actual pollution of our air and water by international sources and will continue, by means of consultation and, if necessary, by intervention, to represent Ontario's interests and to ensure that the wellbeing of our people is taken into account in the formulation of remedial measures.

The people of Ontario enjoy a quality of housing second to none in the world. We plan to maintain this standard with programs designed to stimulate housing construction both to meet the shelter needs of home owners and tenants and to provide employment in the construction industry and the many related industries which ebb and flow with the housing market.

It is our intention in designing and executing these programs to work closely with our partner governments at the national and municipal levels. This partnership will yield maximum efficiency in creating programs to meet our housing needs community by community. Such a partnership will provide continuing sensitivity to the changing needs of senior citizens, the single-parent family, the disabled and other special needs groups.

My government believes that there is a need to accelerate progress in the area of women's issues, and while considerable advancement has been made in recent years to enhance opportunities for the women of Ontario, much remains to be done. To ensure, therefore, that women's essential contribution to the social and economic wellbeing of the province receives further support, my government will move to name a senior minister who will be responsible for women's issues with a complete mandate to review, initiate, direct and promote policies favourable to and in support of women in Ontario society.

This minister will have wide-ranging responsibility for providing a focus for the government and the public on concerns that affect 52.4 per cent of our population and for taking steps to close the gap in wages that has too long existed between men and women as well as the proportion of women who are clustered in particular areas of employment.

Ontario is widely envied throughout the world on many counts, not the least of which is the sound conduct of its financial and administrative affairs. In five out of the last seven years, my government has held its expenditure growth below the rate of inflation, freeing available resources for the private sector and for budgetary stabilization initiatives. Further evidence of this can be noted in the fact that, were our financial affairs in the same situation as those of our national government, the provincial deficit would be four times that currently projected. During this same seven-year period, Ontario's public service employment has decreased by 6.1 per cent, leaving Ontario with the fewest public servants, as measured on a per capita basis, of all Canadian provinces. It is a testimonial to our employees that this has been accomplished while maintaining the quality of our services to the public.

In the coming year this tradition of sound management will be continued. Renewed emphasis will be placed on value-for-money auditing and the examination of all ongoing programs to determine that they continue to serve the purposes for which they were intended and that the benefits are commensurate with the costs. The government's capital construction program for the public sector requirements will aim at saving tax dollars in high-cost leasing areas. Finally, a number of government regulatory functions, such as the building and fire code regulations and the Mining Act, will be reformed and streamlined.

My government will strive to provide an equality of services across Ontario. The one-window approach will be expanded to allow more Ontarians to deal with their government more directly and more simply on a face-to-face basis throughout the province.

Further, my government recognizes that the retirement income system can be improved at both the national and provincial levels. Last December the government of Canada created a special parliamentary task force to develop recommendations for achieving such improvements. We will urge this task force to proceed with its deliberations as quickly as possible so that needed reforms can be recommended and adopted. To assist in this process, my government will seek to present its views to the government of Canada later this year. These views will emphasize the importance of freedom of choice for individuals in preparing for retirement and the need to provide more adequate retirement income protection for many members of our society.

The Public Service Superannuation Act will be amended to eliminate the unfair practice of discontinuing a survivor's pension upon remarriage. This change will apply retroactively to those individuals, mostly women, who have been inadvertently penalized by the current provisions.

Trust companies perform a vital role in Ontario as desposit-taking institutions and as administrators of estates and trusts. They also provide a major source of residential mortgage loans. It is my government's belief that public confidence in the trust industry of this province should be unquestioned. In furtherance of this objective, the Loan and Trust Corporations Amendment Act was passed in the previous session and a white paper will be tabled outlining a form of regulation that will address the need to maintain the public's confidence and also enable the trust industry to develop and maintain itself in these changing economic times.

Changes in the demographic composition of Ontario's population are constantly creating new challenges. Currently 10 per cent of the provincial population is over the age of 65. In less than 10 years, the number of those over 85 will increase by nearly 50 per cent. These changes will necessitate enhancement of existing services and the development of new and innovative approaches to meet evolving needs.

In order to ensure a comprehensive approach to the needs of the elderly in the years ahead, my government has completed a major review of programs and services to the elderly. While a number of initiatives will be proposed with respect to institutional and community health services, particular emphasis will be placed upon the support services in related programs which will enable elderly citizens to continue to live independently in the community.

Mon gouvernement est fier, et à juste titre, des progrès qu'il a accomplis dans la prestation des services à la population francophone de la province, en particulier dans le domaine de l'éducation. Cette année, la population scolaire de langue française comprend environ 93,706 élèves inscrits dans 276 écoles séparées catholiques, 13 écoles élémentaires publiques et 65 écoles secondaires de langue française ou mixtes. En fait, environ 96 pour cent de la population scolaire de langue française dans la province bénéficie actuellement de l'enseignement en français, en tout ou en partie.

Dans la poursuite de nos efforts pour assurer l'égalité des chances en éducation à tous les élèves de la province, nous présenterons, après avoir consulté le public, des amendements à la loi sur l'éducation dans le but de:

Reconnaître le droit de chaque élève francophone de faire ses études en français;

Veiller à ce que les conseils de l'éducation établissent, dans certaines conditions, des sections de langue minoritaire composées de conseillers scolaires élus par les électeurs du groupe linguistique minoritaire, lors des élections de 1985;

Permettre au ministre de l'Éducation de résoudre les différends entre les conseils scolaires et la Commission des langues d'enseignement de l'Ontario quant aux mesures à prendre.

Il convient de noter que toutes ces dispositions s'appliqueront également aux Ontariens anglophones dans les circonscriptions scolaires où ils se trouvent en minorité.

My government is justifiably proud of the progress it has made in providing services to our province's French-speaking population, particularly in the field of education. This year the French-language school population comprises approximately 93,706 pupils registered in 276 Roman Catholic separate schools, 13 public elementary schools and 65 French or mixed secondary schools. In effect, approximately 96 per cent of the French-speaking school age population of this province currently receives its education, in whole or in part, in French.

To complete our efforts of ensuring equal educational opportunity for all pupils in this province, following public consultation, amendments to the Education Act will be introduced: to recognize the right of every French-speaking pupil to an education in the French language; to ensure that boards of education, under certain conditions, establish minority language sections consisting of trustees elected by minority language electors for the 1985 elections; to enable the Minister of Education to resolve situations in which a school board or the Languages of Instruction Commission of Ontario may disagree on an appropriate course of action. It should be noted that all these provisions will apply equally to English-speaking Ontarians in those school board areas where they are in a minority position.

Ontario will fulfil the commitment it made at the meeting of first ministers and aboriginal leaders to extend the provisions of Canada's new Constitution respecting the process for identifying and defining aboriginal rights. My government has been at the forefront of constitutional discussions to guarantee equal status of native men and women, to ensure that governments consult aboriginal peoples in advance of constitutional amendments that could affect them and to entrench future constitutional discussions respecting the rights of native peoples.

In order to implement the terms of the accord signed by first ministers, this Legislature will be asked to consider and support a resolution authorizing a constitutional amendment to sections of the Constitution Act respecting an ongoing process, the equal status of native men and women, clarification of the term "treaty rights" and guaranteed consultation in event of future constitutional reform affecting native peoples.

My government has completed a systematic review of its legislation and programs as part of its commitment to the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to the primacy provisions of the new Human Rights Code. Legislative measures will be brought forward over time to ensure that Ontario law and practice is fully consistent with the important principles expressed in the charter and the Human Rights Code.

This year, preparations will continue apace for Ontario's bicentennial in 1984. Two hundred years ago, the first large major settlements of our province were established by those who migrated from the United States, following the American Revolution, joining with the native and French population of the then Ontario to build a new community and a new future under what would become responsible parliamentary democracy. The bicentennial will be a community-based celebration responsive to the many cultures and identities that have built our province during the last two centuries and an affirmation of the common opportunity we share to build on this history for the future.

My government is particularly pleased and honoured at the prospect that our Queen, Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, will be with us on this important occasion in 1984. Her presence, grace, warmth and humanity symbolize more than anything the continuity of the liberty, freedom and opportunity that our way of life sustains for Ontarians of all origins, colours and creeds. It is important that we seize this opportunity to affirm, in a modest yet inspiring fashion, that we have much of which to be proud, much for which to thank those who have preceded us and even more to which to aspire in the future.

Honourable members, the general outline I have set before you today towards the combined goals of economic recovery, sound management of our public affairs and meeting the varied needs of Ontario's people will of necessity be expanded through more detailed statements describing the specific plans and programs my government intends to introduce. You may look forward, therefore, to a series of announcements by my ministers in the weeks to come that will set before this House a variety of proposals that will ensure continued progress in these major areas.

May Divine Providence attend your deliberations. In our Sovereign's name, I thank you.

God bless the Queen and Canada.

The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor was pleased to retire from the chamber.

Prayers.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, if I may rise on a point of privilege: With genuine regret, because I was not intending to rise today in my place, I thought I should bring to your attention a discourtesy by the government in not delivering the traditional copy of the throne speech to the Leader of the Opposition. This could be merely an oversight, then again it could be seen at one with other events of the day whereby access to the lockup was restricted to members of the opposition party. I commend these two occurrences to you for your investigation and would appreciate your reporting back to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I beg to inform the House that to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of His Honour's speech, which I will now read.

Reading dispensed with.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Tuesday, April 19, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

COMMISSION ON ELECTION CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENSES

Mr. Speaker: I beg to inform the House that I have today laid upon the table the sixth report of the Commission on Election Contributions and Expenses containing recommendations with respect to the indemnities and allowances and salaries of members of the Legislative Assembly.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

STRIKEBREAKING LEGISLATION

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the tragic death on April 9 of Claude Dougdeen, an employee of Alcan Building Products Ltd.

As members know, Mr. Dougdeen was picketing in support of a lawful strike at the time of his death, which occurred when a tractor trailer was entering the premises of Alcan on Warden Avenue in Scarborough.

Since the police investigation is continuing and since an inquest will be held, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the precise circumstances of Mr. Dougdeen's death. However, there have been suggestions that it was caused in part by the inadequacy of our laws relating to strikes and picketing, and it is this aspect of the matter I wish to address briefly today.

Ontario, in common with almost every other jurisdiction in the western world, permits a struck employer to carry on business during the course of a strike. Two Canadian provinces have enacted legislation that in limited ways restricts this right. In British Columbia employers may not employ professional strikebreakers; that is, persons whose primary objective is to prevent, interfere with or break up a lawful strike. Quebec, while its labour code prohibits the use of external replacement employees to perform the work of bargaining unit employees during a lawful strike, permits the use of both management personnel and employees of independent contractors.

I might add that on the facts as they are known to me neither BC nor Quebec laws would have prevented the use of the transport company that was servicing Alcan on the occasion in question, a company that had apparently performed services for Alcan intermittently in the past two years.

I have received representations from the president of the Ontario Federation of Labour and a number of his senior associates to the effect that I should propose amendments to the Labour Relations Act to outlaw the use of all replacement labour during a lawful strike, including the use of professional strikebreakers. I have undertaken to study those proposals and I shall do so.

However, in the meantime I wish to say that in my view it is quite unfair both to the government and to Mr. Dougdeen's family and friends, who must be suffering grievously, to suggest that his death resulted from deficiencies in the law.

That very serious allegation, which was attributed in the press to a senior staff member of the bargaining agent at Alcan, I must reject categorically. There is no jurisdiction of which I am aware in which all access to struck premises is prohibited. I am not aware of any law, in any jurisdiction, which would have prohibited the passage of the truck in the Alcan case.

Having said that, I wish to repeat that I intend to fulfil my undertaking and to consider the genuine and deeply held conviction expressed to me at last Friday's meeting by Mr. Pilkey and his colleagues that there is a need for legislative change. While I have the deepest sympathy for Mr. Dougdeen's family and profoundly regret his untimely and tragic death, my consideration of the need for legislative reform must be carried out objectively, which I undertake to do.

TRUST COMPANIES

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, since the House prorogued in February there have been a number of significant developments related to my ministry's response to the problems that arose in the Crown, Seaway and Greymac Trust companies. I would like to report to the members on how we have dealt with these problems to date and what we intend to do in the future.

My statement will be rather lengthy and I therefore beg the indulgence of the House. I have in front of me, for tabling today, reports and documents which will add greatly to the information available to the Legislature. They are listed in an appendix to this statement.

The events of the past six months have engaged my ministry in two areas of its responsibility: one, the area of loan and trust corporations; and two, the area of rent review.

As far as the trust companies are concerned, there is no need to remind members of their importance to the economy of this province as financial intermediaries. They take deposits of funds from the general public, very often from small savers who are totally dependent on them for their honesty and expertise.

These companies in turn make investments, often on real estate, which, if the integrity of the system is to be maintained, must be made honestly, prudently and within the regulations of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act. This means the protection of depositors is a fundamental obligation of those who own and operate loan and trust companies.

As to rent review, members will recall the concerns that had been expressed in 1982 and earlier years about the application of the rent review process to the increased costs arising out of a sale and refinancing of a rental property. These concerns included not only the impact of legitimate arm's-length sales that led to rent increases but also the possibility of non-arm's-length arrangements being used artificially to inflate costs that were to be presented to the Residential Tenancy Commission in support of a rent increase.

In September 1982 it was reported that Cadillac Fairview had sold approximately 11,000 rental units to Greymac Credit Corp. for some $270 million. While tenant concern was growing over the effect this sale would have on rent increases, it appears that Greymac Credit sold its interest in the apartments to Kilderkin Investments Ltd. at a price said to be about $312.5 million. Kilderkin in turn is said to have sold the properties to 50 numbered companies at a stated price of $500 million.

The last two sales, or "flips" as they are called, came to light after the conveyances from Cadillac Fairview were registered on November 5, 1982. The financing for the $500-million transaction appeared to consist of an existing first mortgage put on the properties by Cadillac Fairview in the amount of $110 million, a second mortgage taken back by Cadillac Fairview on the sale to Greymac Credit in the amount of $113 million, and what may loosely be described as a series of third mortgages totalling $152 million advanced as to $76 million from Seaway Trust Co., as to $63 million by Crown Trust Co. and as to $13 million by Greymac Trust Co. Finally, the balance of the alleged $500-million sale price was said to include $125 million put up by the 50 numbered companies, which were said to be beneficially owned by Saudi Arabian investors.

These events raised important issues regarding both the trust companies and rent review. If, as we suspected, the $500-million price was artificially inflated, then the mortgages on the properties of $375 million, exactly 75 per cent of the supposed $500-million purchase price, were unauthorized under the Loan and Trust Corporations Act, and the depositors might well be at risk. On the rent review side, an inflated price would represent an attempt to circumvent the protection afforded to the tenants of these buildings by our rent review legislation.

As members know, we have taken steps to protect both the tenants and the depositors of the trust companies. On November 16, I announced a rent restraint bill to limit rent increases attributable to the pass-through of financing costs arising out of the sale of rental property. New guidelines were issued by the Residential Tenancy Commission to deal with problems arising out of the financing costs of sales and resales of residential rental properties.

Mr. Stuart Thom, QC, was appointed to conduct an inquiry under the Public Inquiries Act into the application of the existing laws to the regulation of rents. Mr. James A. Morrison, of the firm of Touche Ross and Co., was appointed under section 152 of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act to make a special examination and audit of the books, accounts and securities and to inquire generally into the conduct of the businesses of Crown Trust, Seaway Trust, Greymac Trust, Seaway Mortgage and Greymac Mortgage.

On December 21, 1982, a bill was introduced and, with the co-operation of all members, passed the same day, amending the Loan and Trust Corporations Act by establishing an approval process for the transfer of shares of a loan and trust corporation under certain circumstances; enabling the Lieutenant Governor in Council to authorize the registrar to take possession and control of the assets of a loan and trust corporation or to impose limitations or conditions on the registry of such a corporation; and, finally, by strengthening the enforcement provisions of that act.

On December 21 I also advised the House that a white paper would be issued on proposed amendments to the Loan and Trust Corporations Act.

By January 7, 1983, I had received, among other information, interim reports from Mr. Morrison as well as a critique of the appraisals said to have been relied on by the trust companies. On that date, the Lieutenant Governor in Council acted pursuant to the amendments to the Loan and Trust Corporations Act. This action was undertaken in the belief that in the case of each of Crown Trust, Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust, among other things, that there existed "a practice of or state of affairs within the corporation that is or may be prejudicial to the public interest or to the interests of the corporation's depositors, creditors or shareholders."

The orders in council authorized the registrar of loan and trust corporations to take possession and control of the assets of the three trust companies. The registrar was assisted in this regard by the firms of Touche Ross and Woods Gordon. This action was carried out in consultation with the Canada Deposit Insurance Corp., which I shall refer to as CDIC; and because of the applicable legal requirements, we were compelled to limit the withdrawal of deposits to the statutory limit of the insurance, which was then $20,000.

I should point out that about the same time that the registrar was taking control of these three provincially incorporated trust companies, federal officials were asserting control under the federal act of the two federally incorporated mortgage companies, Seaway Mortgage and Greymac Mortgage.

Included in the material I am tabling here today are the three interim reports of Mr. Morrison and the appraisal critique prepared by A. E. LePage.

Following the takeover of the trust companies, the registrar had three objectives: (1) to carry on the businesses to the extent possible in the circumstances; (2) to review the state of affairs within the three companies; (3) to determine the appropriate courses of action to be taken.

On January 17 I reported to the House the highlights of the draft interim reports received from Woods Gordon with respect to Crown Trust and from Touche Ross with respect to Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust. Woods Gordon advised in part that Crown Trust, at January 7, 1983, did not appear to be in compliance with certain liquidity, investment and borrowing requirements of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act and that, as of that date, the company could not be considered a viable going concern in the absence of substantial injection of additional capital, interim support to assist in meeting liquidity demands and restoration of confidence by the public and the financial community.

Touche Ross advised that neither Seaway Trust nor Greymac Trust had a borrowing base for the purposes of section 118 of the act to support its deposits and other borrowings, that both companies had substantial parts of their mortgage portfolios invested in mortgages related to Kilderkin Investments Ltd. and that in most, if not all, instances of Kilderkin-related mortgages, the Seaway or Greymac mortgage was subsequent to a first and sometimes a second mortgage and represented a loan in excess of 75 per cent of the value of the property as permitted by the act.

Also on January 17 I advised the House that a complete review of our internal administrative procedures in the area of financial institutions would be carried out, initially by an internal review team but if necessary by an outside organization that is familiar with the operations of financial institutions and the problems that arise in the course of administering regulatory legislation.

On January 17 the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, Secretary of State for Finance, announced that CDIC coverage of deposits would be increased from $20,000 to $60,000 effective as of that date. To parallel this, I announced on January 19 that the deposit insurance applicable to credit unions and caisses populaires would be increased to $60,000 effective as of that day.

The federal bill, C-142, was introduced in the House of Commons on February 19 and received third reading on April 14. It is now awaiting approval by the Senate and royal assent. When this bill becomes law, depositors who have matured deposits in excess of $20,000 in Seaway Trust or Greymac Trust that they have not been able to withdraw because of the $20,000 limitation will then be able to withdraw up to $60,000.

Following the actions of the registrar to take control of the three trust companies, it was confirmed that deposits taken in by the trust companies from the public had been used in what appeared to be a very large number of questionable investments which disregarded the limitation to 75 per cent of value in respect of mortgages. It did not appear that it was appropriate to return the administration of these companies back to the controlling shareholders, nor did it seem appropriate, particularly in the case of Crown Trust, to take an alternative course of action provided by the Loan and Trust Corporations Act to initiate proceedings to wind up the companies. Such action would have reduced asset recoveries and resulted in losses to uninsured depositors and delays and uncertainties to all depositors.

This was particularly so in the case of Crown Trust because that company, unlike the other two, was carrying on a profitable and therefore valuable trust business. However, it was a wasting asset in the sense that public disclosure of the financial condition of the company and of the questionable investment practices of its management was resulting in trust accounts and agency business being removed from the company.

After careful consideration of the situation and in co-operation with the CDIC, which had agreed to provide financing, it was determined that the course of action that would result in the greatest recovery of assets of Crown Trust was one that would see the company taken over as a going concern by a responsible trust company. This course of action, which promised the greatest return for depositors, shareholders, creditors and others, was not possible under the then existing legislation. We therefore decided to seek legislative approval to dispose of the assets of Crown Trust. As members will recall, this resulted in the introduction on January 24 of the Crown Trust Company Act, 1983.

In order to make the acquisition of Crown Trust assets at all attractive, it was necessary to guarantee prospective bidders that if they took over the company, they would not immediately become embroiled in litigation. This required that the new act preclude any legal actions to set aside any agreements made in respect of the disposition of the assets of Crown Trust.

I note that while it was necessary to enact the Crown Trust Company Act to protect the interest of depositors, the recourse of shareholders to the courts for any losses caused by improper or imprudent behaviour by the registrar or his agents was fully preserved.

On January 25 I made a further statement to this House commenting on the need for speedy passage of the Crown Trust Company Act. At that time extracts from the Woods Gordon report submitted on January 15 were tabled. At the same time information was given on how the $152 million advanced by the trust companies had been distributed. Further information on the distribution of these funds has recently come to light in the report of Coopers and Lybrand, the court-appointed receiver of Greymac Credit, and that information is included in the materials being tabled today.

This House was also advised that none of the lawyers acting for any of the parties involved in any of the transactions of sale, resale and mortgage of the rental units appeared to have actually dealt with the $125 million that was stated to have been paid by the numbered companies.

On January 27 I made a further statement to the House explaining the need and import of that bill. At that time I dealt with an issue that is still raised and is clearly not understood by some. I refer to the question, "Why have no criminal charges been laid?"

The taking of deposits from the public by a trust company is not a right but a privilege that is granted by this Legislature through the provisions of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act. When those privileges are abused in a manner that puts in jeopardy depositors and those who provide the insurance and premiums to protect them, we have a duty to act. That action could not and should not await the outcome of any criminal investigation.

On January 31, before the administration of justice committee, which was considering the Crown Trust bill, I explained at length the significance of a trust company having a proper borrowing base and how the mortgages on the Cadillac Fairview rental units and another very significant mortgage transaction were both capable on their own of eliminating the borrowing base of Crown Trust and thereby preventing it from accepting any further public deposits. The bill was passed and received royal assent on February 1.

As members are aware, the operations of Crown Trust are now largely in the hands of Central Trust. There remain under the control of the registrar a number of assets of uncertain value, which we have characterized as soft assets. Major among these are the mortgage loans made on the Cadillac Fairview rental units in the amount of $63 million and a mortgage loan made in respect of real estate in Vancouver in the amount of about $50 million.

At the time Woods Gordon reported on Crown Trust it was not clear how matters would develop. With the arrangements made with Central Trust, the role of Woods Gordon has significantly changed, and I have now been advised that, with the exception of subsequent reports on soft assets, they do not intend to submit any further reports on the affairs of Crown Trust.

I have already tabled the Woods Gordon report of January 15 on Crown Trust. I am tabling today reports of Touche Ross on the affairs of Greymac Trust and Seaway Trust. From these reports the members will be able to see the extensive nature of this assignment and the difficulties encountered. It is clear that, had the government not taken this action on January 7, the problems uncovered and referred to in these reports would have been aggravated beyond their present state. Those whose funds were on deposit with the three trust companies and any who might have placed their savings with those trust companies would have faced greater risk of loss had the government not acted. The losses to the CDIC, which potentially are in excess of $100 million, would also have been even greater if the government had not acted.

These reports indicate that the Cadillac Fairview transaction was only part of an overall pattern of behaviour. I expect that the precise analysis of that behaviour will be a central element of the final Morrison report when it is available and will be a matter for a decision in the courts. In the meantime, it may assist the Legislature in its understanding of the situation if I refer to an affidavit filed in court by my adviser, Mr. John L. Biddell, where he states as follows:

"Investigations conducted into the affairs of the plaintiffs since January 7, 1983, suggest that the Cadillac transaction was not an isolated example of the improper use of the moneys of the respective plaintiffs with the object of securing immediate profits to those responsible for the management of the plaintiffs' affairs. On the contrary, it appears that the Cadillac transaction was just one of a number of similar transactions involving initially Seaway and Greymac Trust before Greymac Credit purchased control of Crown, and since that purchase all three of the plaintiffs. A number of such transactions appear to show a systematic misuse of the plaintiffs' moneys.

"The transactions to which reference is made in the previous paragraph ('the relevant transactions') all have a common involvement between one or more plaintiffs and companies controlled by or associated with Rosenberg and Player or one or other of them. During 1981 and 1982 the relevant transactions comprised a substantial part of the respective businesses of Seaway and its wholly owned subsidiaries ('the Seaway group'), and of Greymac Trust and its wholly owned subsidiaries for the time ('the Greymac Trust group'). During the period between October 7, 1982 (when Greymac Credit acquired control of Crown), and December 8, 1982, Crown became involved in the relevant transactions as hereinafter appears.

"The relevant transactions involve one or other or both of the following two elements:

"(a) An artificially inflated rise in the apparent value of the property concerned secured by a purchase on the open market and an immediate resale to parties within or associated with either the Seaway group or the Greymac Trust group, and the application of such profit in the increase in the equity base of one or other of the plaintiffs, thereby increasing the statutory limit on the amount of money the relevant plaintiff could borrow from the general public. I hereinafter call this element 'the self-fuelling element.' The self-fuelling element progressively gave increasing scope for the application of the plaintiffs' money in the second element in the relevant transactions, namely:

"(b) An advance of the plaintiffs' money to complete the relevant transactions so that on such completion such money or a substantial portion thereof was paid either directly or indirectly in some form or other to Player or Rosenberg or some associate of theirs. The said advance of the plaintiffs' money was made on the basis that the property concerned had a value at least as high as the subsale price and that such property was a proper security for the advance. As will hereafter appear, in most cases no or no proper appraisal was made of the value of the relevant property before the plaintiffs' money was advanced and no proper inquiries were made as to the financial standing of the borrower and no proper steps were taken to ensure the protection of the plaintiffs."

The registrar has instructed counsel to initiate certain lawsuits against those companies and individuals believed to be central to this scheme in an effort to trace and recover all moneys improperly paid out and to seek damages against corporations and individuals who may be found by the courts to have participated in an unlawful activity.

As recently as yesterday, proceedings in the Grand Court of the Cayman Islands resulted in a broad order which I am tabling in this House together with all the materials filed in those proceedings and in support of them. Counsel for the registrar in those proceedings in the Cayman Islands hopes we will be able to trace and recover any funds located in that jurisdiction which properly belong to the three trust companies.

In addition, there are numerous court proceedings under way seeking to compel various law firms that have direct knowledge of the dealings by the three trust companies and other related companies to divulge any information they may have pertaining to these matters. In fairness to some of the lawyers who have resisted disclosure, it should be stated that they may have been precluded from co-operating with the registrar and the Morrison inquiry by their clients claiming solicitor-client privilege. The validity of this claim of privilege is currently before the courts and until this issue is finally resolved some of the information needed to explain many of these transactions may be unavailable to the authorities.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, various actions have been instituted for the tracing of moneys said to belong to the three trust companies, and in a number of instances the courts have granted interim orders freezing funds and assets until all these issues can be finally adjudicated upon. Because many of these matters are at present before the courts and more lawsuits are contemplated, I do not propose to comment on them. I do, however, wish to make it clear that both CDIC and this government are committed to ensure that every effort will be made to seek appropriate recovery for all the losses that the public has been made to suffer.

With respect to the future of Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust, documents I am tabling today are quite lengthy and complex, but I wish to share the highlights of those reports with the members of the Legislature.

The Seaway Trust report confirms that after making appropriate provision against many of Seaway's assets, there is an indicated deficiency in assets in the amount of $75 million. That is, the company not only has no borrowing base for the purposes of section 118 of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act, but it is also in a negative position with respect to its net assets.

The Seaway report also gives many examples of questionable practices in establishing value for lending purposes, many of which relate to the now all-too-familiar pattern of chain or flip transactions among related parties with rapid and substantial escalation of property pricing.

This served to remove trust company funds as loans at the expense and risk of Seaway's depositors.

Touche Ross also reports that certain of the Seaway transactions appear to have been entered into more for the benefit of its controlling shareholder or its officers than for Seaway itself as a deposit-taking institution. The report also suggests that the apparent disregard of Seaway management of the growing dependence of Seaway on the financial capacity of Kilderkin raises at least an inference that Seaway may be in some manner controlled by William Player.

The Greymac Trust Company report by Touche Ross indicates a deficiency in assets of $62 million after making appropriate provisions against many of its assets. As is the case with Seaway Trust, this means that Greymac Trust not only has no borrowing base for the purposes of section 118 of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act, but has a deficit with respect to its net assets.

Touche Ross reports that some of the transactions which the principals of Greymac Trust authorized were so complex as to raise the inference that the complexity was intended either to circumvent regulatory requirements or to cloud the underlying values of the properties involved, or both. Examples are given in the report that illustrate the close working relationship which existed between the Greymac group of companies and Mr. Player.

The report on Greymac Trust also describes Mr. Rosenberg's interest in and growing ownership of the Canadian Commercial Bank, a chartered bank established under the Bank Act of Canada. The Greymac Trust report indicates that through a series of transactions commencing in 1982 Mr. Rosenberg arranged for the Greymac, Seaway and Player groups of companies to purchase 27 per cent of that chartered bank. The bank has announced that it has refused to register the transfer of shares purchased by Crown Trust, Greymac Trust and Seaway Mortgage, stating that if these companies are associated within the meaning of the Bank Act, it would contravene the statutory 10 per cent limitation of individual equity ownership in a chartered bank.

The Touche Ross report states that from correspondence on file at Greymac Trust it appears that Mr. Rosenberg planned to acquire 100 per cent of the shares of the Canadian Commercial Bank, and Touche Ross concludes that this was for the purpose of extending the interest and influence of the shareholders and senior officers of Greymac Trust and Seaway Trust into areas that would give them access to even more public deposit funds.

The review of the affairs of the trust companies on behalf of the registrar also indicated that Kilderkin Investments Ltd. was substantially indebted, directly or indirectly, to Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust and that payment of interest on such borrowing was significantly in arrears. This indebtedness and default was in respect of numerous transactions separate and apart from the Cadillac Fairview transaction and led to numerous foreclosure actions and considerable confusion among the tenants.

On February 15, Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust commenced action against Kilderkin to recover their loans. In the course of that action, the court appointed the Clarkson Co. interim receiver and manager of Kilderkin and authorized it to collect the rents from the 5,600 tenants in the buildings Kilderkin was obliged to manage.

In its report to the court on March 29, the Clarkson Co. reported that in its view Kilderkin had not been in a financial position to meet its liabilities for some time prior to its appointment and that Kilderkin was only able to continue in operation by virtue of obtaining ever-increasing sums of money on new property transactions involving funds from the Seaway and Greymac groups of companies.

That report sets out in detail examples of how funds were obtained from the trust companies and applied to the purchase or management of buildings that had in many cases been sold in chain transactions involving Kilderkin, the trust companies and their principals and affiliates at ever-increasing prices. The report also describes how large sums of money were transferred outside the jurisdiction to the Cayman Islands and other places without any backup documentation or justification.

Indeed, millions of dollars appear to have been paid out by Kilderkin on the basis of only a cheque requisition or a telephone call. This is typical of the business operations of the company where documentation for multi-million-dollar transactions, including the Cadillac Fairview transaction, ranges from sparse to nonexistent.

This situation has been worsened by lawyers who acted for Kilderkin on these transactions refusing to provide reporting letters and other documentation to the interim receiver. The interim receiver has determined that Mr. Player is personally indebted to Kilderkin in the amount of $10.5 million with no indication of his ability or intention to repay it.

The receiver has also noted that there was no overall direction in the financial management of Kilderkin and the cash-flow forecasts for many of the management projects undertaken by Kilderkin, including Cadillac Fairview, were simply not available. On the best available information, the Clarkson Co. estimated that Kilderkin would incur a loss of $10.5 million for its financial year ending April 30, 1983.

I would remind the Legislature that Kilderkin was a central figure in the Cadillac Fairview transaction where it specifically agreed to underwrite millions of dollars of cash-flow deficiencies from the Cadillac Fairview buildings, which agreement was said to justify the stated purchase price of $500 million.

I now turn to some other related matters.

First, I should say that discussions have taken place with representatives of the numbered companies with a view to possible settlement of existing lawsuits against them and parties related to them. I am advised that those discussions are still under way and I do not therefore propose to comment on them at this time. Contrary to media reports, these discussions are not in respect of any resale of the Cadillac Fairview buildings to the numbered companies, which are still the registered owners of those properties.

Second, I would like to comment on the story that William Player has found another buyer prepared to pay $500 million plus for the buildings. Let me state most emphatically that no such offer has been produced by Mr. Player. It appears that he had some discussions with the Reliance Group of New York and that they displayed possible interest in the proposal as it was described to them by Mr. Player.

Certain lawyers appeared in Toronto last week, apparently on behalf of the Reliance Group. It now appears that they were here at the request of Mr. Player to promote a deal that might be sold to the Reliance Group. The Reliance Group has advised us that the New York lawyers who came to Toronto last week did not represent them.

It would appear that what Mr. Player offered for sale was the Cadillac Fairview buildings with some guaranteed rental income stream that was sufficient to justify the selling price he quoted. Needless to say, the registrar and this government totally reject any proposed solution to the improper borrowing from the three trust companies that places the burden of the solution on tenants through government guarantees of rental levels outside the rent review process.

Third, I expect that Mr. Morrison's report will add to our understanding of what has gone on. His job has been a large and complex one. He has faced delays in reporting to me as a result of the failure of some individuals to extend to him their full co-operation.

I want to thank many others who have voluntarily come forward and assisted him in his inquiries. I am advised that Mr. Morrison's work is nearing completion and I expect to have his report in hand by the end of May. I have already undertaken to table that report in the House and to make it available to the Thom commission.

As I have said, I have instructed my officials to prepare a white paper on the regulation of loan and trust corporations in this province. As Mr. Morrison's report will doubtless contain relevant information in this regard, I intend to allow one month after delivery of that report for delivery of the white paper. It ought to be released in June.

I would also like to make some observations about how we are likely to approach the white paper and any changes in the administrative procedures concerning financial institutions in Ontario.

First, we are reassured that the loan and trust industry as a whole in Ontario truly deserves the high degree of confidence placed in the industry by the public. Indeed, if anything, loan and trust companies in Ontario, with very limited exceptions, have not altered their long-standing prudent approach to mortgage lending and other investments and in this respect may have actually conducted their business in a more conservative and secure fashion than many other participants in the financial system. This means that we do not propose to overreact to a situation which I believe the Morrison report will make clear was a very particular situation.

Second, new powers were granted to the registrar and cabinet by the legislation of December 21 last. These powers, together with changes in administrative procedures which take into account the lessons of the present affair and general changes in the economy and financial system, will, I believe, go a long way to ensure that we will not see a repetition of our problems with these trust companies.

Mr. Kerrio: What about Re-Mor and Astra? What are you talking about?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I cannot hear you. Speak up a little bit.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Finally, our response to the need for new legislation and different administration procedures will build on these two elements, while minimizing changes which would make the practical position of those running their business in a sound and prudent manner more burdensome or restrictive in any material and unnecessary way.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the excellent co-operation and assistance we have received from CDIC. As I have explained on previous occasions, the arrangements for the continued operations of the trust companies were only possible because CDIC provided backup financing that enabled the companies to meet their obligations on maturing deposits. These arrangements are an essential element in the Crown Trust management by Central Trust and will be essential in any arrangements for the management of Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust.

To give you some idea of the scope of the CDIC involvement, I would like to provide the House with the following information on the net amount of advances made to date by CDIC even after some recoveries to the three trust companies: Crown Trust, $80 million; Seaway Trust, $33.5 million; Greymac Trust, $7.5 million. The advances to Seaway and Greymac will increase in the near future. That will be so even if we are able to make alternative arrangements for their future operations.

I would remind the members that payments made by CDIC under its obligation to insure deposits become a claim against the assets of the trust companies that is payable before there can be any distribution of surplus assets to preferred or common shareholders.

The practical and effective co-operation of the federal government, through the Honourable Paul Cosgrove in getting the insurance limit increased to $60,000 and through the arrangements made by CDIC in respect of the three companies and our own government, is an excellent demonstration to the public of how our two levels of government can work together to achieve positive result in the public interest.

We are working very hard to complete negotiations which would lead to the transfer of the operations of Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust to other institutions. We contemplate agreements similar to the Central Trust agreement with respect to Crown Trust. If such arrangements can be achieved, this would hopefully lead to seeing arm's-length depositors paid in full as their certificates mature.

I would like to conclude with some observations. First and foremost, we have endeavoured to act in a manner which contributed to the stability and soundness of the financial system as a whole so that the public would be justified in continuing to place its confidence in it and its participants. We have sought to protect depositors and achieve maximum recoveries for the three trust companies and their depositors. We are determined to ensure the loan and trust industry is one in which there can be public confidence based on a balance between reliance on laws and regulatory administration on the one hand, and on market forces and private sector responsibility on the other.

Finally, it has been my determination throughout to make as full disclosure as possible as soon as possible. I have felt subject to four major disclosure constraints which I would like to outline.

Obviously, my first constraint was to avoid saying or doing anything which might create unnecessary public uncertainty or a lack of confidence in the financial system or any of its members.

Second, I have been constrained in that at any given time I may not have had all the relevant information necessary to make public statements.

I have also sought to avoid jeopardizing depositors through untimely disclosures which might damage possibilities for recoveries and the preservation of the business of the trust companies.

Finally, relating to matters which are either before the courts or properly subject to the courts, I have felt that, to the extent possible, information should come forward under the protection available to all parties from the courts.

The protection of depositors dictates firm action on the part of government, and that is what is taking place.

VISITOR

Mr. Speaker: I would ask all honourable members to join with me in welcoming and recognizing Mr. Dov Shilansky who is a member of the parliament of Israel. I am also advised he is the parliamentary deputy to the Prime Minister of Israel.

USE OF TIME IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: Just before proceeding with the most interesting part of the day, I would like to ask the consideration and co-operation of all honourable members. In my opinion, there seems to be a growing tendency to usurp more time than is justified in question period by the insistence of some members on asking more than one question at the same time, referring to them as three-, four-, five- and six-part questions. This, in turn, leads to exceptionally long answers which are often an abuse of question period as the minister tends to go even further in his answer than the multiple questions warrant and perhaps elaborate more than necessary.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Will the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) just listen? I am asking for the co-operation of all honourable members by keeping their questions to a single, specific question which may be answered by a specific answer, as is the obvious intent of the standing orders. This will enable more members to participate in question period. Therefore, I will henceforward rule multiple questions and multiple answers out of order.

ORAL QUESTIONS

SALE OF RENTAL UNITS

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. As one attempts to sort through the plethora of material he has supplied to us, there is one recurring theme that comes back all through his statement and the reports we have read. This has turned out to be the greatest regulatory boondoggle in the history of this province.

I refer the minister to page 7 of the Touche Ross report on Seaway Trust which says, "The files relating to mortgage loans are lacking in data, including appraisals, financial information on borrowers, etc., which would normally form the basis for the prudent lending of deposit moneys."

I refer to the Touche Ross report on Greymac, and I quote from page 15, "The management philosophy appears to have been closer to that of a speculator or gambler rather than the prudent regard required for the investment and safeguarding of depositors' funds."

It is obvious, is it not, that this boondoggle, this mess, has been going on for some considerable period of time—indeed, two years before the great Cadillac Fairview transaction? How could that possibly have happened when the government has a team of regulators who are supposed to prevent this from happening?

2:50 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I assume that the initial comment about a plethora of material was not meant as a criticism, because in his endeavours to be on all sides of all issues the Leader of the Opposition has continually criticized me for not submitting information. Let me say that he has plenty of information, the Legislature now has plenty of information and the public will surely have good confirmation of the steps this government has taken to protect the depositors of this province.

Mr. Speaker: And now to the question, please.

Mr. Sweeney: Just answer the question.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: The Leader of the Opposition knows very well, and we have talked about this many times in this House before, that the issue with respect to the business practices and the activities of the trust companies in question is under thorough and complete review under section 152 of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act by Mr. Morrison.

I have also indicated very clearly that an internal review is going on, which may result in an external review. The combination of that information will present to this House a very full and complete story of what has taken place, and it is going to take place when that information is available.

Mr. Peterson: Obviously, the issue here is regulatory failure, that the minister should have known what was going on. He was aware, I am sure, that Seaway Trust was in front of the cabinet twice in 1982 for regulatory approval, and as I understand it, never once was there an objection to the way it ran its companies then.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Peterson: That, I am sure, he is aware of. Who is conducting the internal review of the failure of the regulation system?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: First of all, the honourable member's statement that there were never any questions asked of the companies involved is a mere assumption on his part. I assume he is interested in the actual story, which will be forthcoming, because we are going to know the full story and it is going to be told in the context of what has been going on and in the context of the Morrison report.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: I would like to know from the minister in answer to this question, why he met privately with the three publishers without the press being there—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sargent: That is important to what he is saying now.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Your leader has asked his question.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I do not agree with the initial assumption of the Leader of the Opposition. Again, I only re-emphasize that the details of the internal investigation, which may require an external investigation, will be made known when it is completed and when the Morrison report has also been completed. It is being carried out at the present time by a representative of our policy and priorities branch in conjunction with a member of the administration and finance division.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, can the minister disclose to us now who the principals are behind the numbered companies that are the registered owners of the Cadillac properties?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, the situation with respect to the ownership of the numbered companies remains the same as it was when this House prorogued in February. The honourable member understands that quite well and understands the problems related to it.

Mr. Peterson: Given the major failure of the ministry to spot what was going on for two years; given the fact that there were warning signals; given the fact that we had a little company like Seaway going from $1.2 million in assets in 1978 to $300 million in 1982; given the fact that they were before the cabinet; given the fact that they were on intermittent or monthly licence and then Greymac was switched, for example, in October 1982 to a yearly licence, obviously giving passive if not active approval to what it was doing, how can the minister have any faith that those regulators or the people who are giving him advice are on top of the situation as it took place here, let alone with other trust companies in existence right now?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I can only reiterate that I trust that the Leader of the Opposition, along with all members, would be interested in the whole story, and it is the whole story that will be reported.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a new question of the minister with respect to the apartment buildings. It is my understanding that he has launched legal action against every bank in Grand Cayman, trying to trace down $109 million. I would like him to confirm or deny whether that is the case in the affidavits and the variety of documents he filed yesterday, the day before and possibly today. If it is the case, does it confirm, in the minister's judgement, the existence of that money? Does it say the Arabs exist and there was an arm's-length transaction? Does it say the buildings were sold for $500 million and thereby confirm the value?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, which question do I have permission to answer?

Mr. Speaker: Any one.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Any one or all, my choice? I may confirm then that a writ called a Mareva writ was issued in the Cayman Islands on behalf of the trust companies against all the parties, including the numbered companies, with respect to any moneys in the possession of those banks, be it the so-called $109 million that was said to be advanced or be it any other moneys, such as the money that Mr. Player indicated last week was in an account on his behalf in the Cayman Islands.

Mr. Peterson: On that subject, can the minister confirm at this point that the Arab transaction was a legitimate arm's-length transaction and that they were in a position to buy those buildings? Is the minister now categorically denying that the Reliance Group offer is not an offer, but is a mere speculation on the part of Mr. Player, and that we still do not know who owns those buildings or where they are going to end up?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Again, with respect, I think the member is asking a question about the initial so-called transaction or payment of $125 million, a question that still remains in some degree of doubt. Certainly, the interim reports of Mr. Morrison that the member now has before him will indicate that Mr. Morrison has some doubts about it.

Whether it took place, it has been said before Mr. Morrison that it did take place and that there is money in the Cayman Islands and, therefore, the registrar, on behalf of the trust companies and the depositors of this province, has an obligation to proceed on the basis of that statement. In addition to that, there have been statements with respect to other moneys deposited in the Cayman Islands.

With respect to the Reliance Group, what I am saying is that there have been no Reliance representatives in Toronto. There have been no documents forwarded. There have been no offers made, and the only parties that attended in the city and met with Woods Gordon, it now turns out, were representatives acting on behalf of Mr. William Player.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, if the minister will not tell us who the principals are behind the numbered companies that are the registered owners of the apartment buildings, will he give us specifically the names of the representatives of those principals and those numbered companies with whom he is carrying on discussions or negotiations?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I do not think it is any secret that Mr. Qutub of Saudi Arabia has been the official representative of the reported Saudi Arabian investors. That has been made very clear.

Mr. Peterson: Has the minister determined whether there was an arm's-length sale to the so-called Saudi Arabian investors at a valuation of $500 million? That is the key to the whole question of whether there were soft assets in the various trust companies. Is the minister still hanging on to his opinion that they are only worth $300 million and, thereby, they were soft assets jeopardizing the deposits in the trust companies? Is that still the essential dilemma in his view?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: This government and this ministry have no dilemma. It has been very clearly put what our view is with respect to the value of those properties. That remains unchanged.

STRIKEBREAKING LEGISLATION

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour and it concerns the statement he made today as well as the general question of strikebreaking legislation. On pages 3 and 4 of his statement the minister says it would be unfair to both the government and to Mr. Dougdeen's family and friends, who must be suffering grievously, to suggest that his death resulted from deficiencies in the law.

Would the minister agree that if we had legislation in Ontario that gave to the Ontario Labour Relations Board clear carriage of the conduct of a strike and of a picket line and clear legislation that restricted the movement of goods in and out of a struck plant it is very likely that Mr. Dougdeen's death would never have occurred and certainly likely that no such incident would ever be repeated in this province?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with my learned friend in the statement or question that he just put. I can only repeat my earlier comments in respect to the other two provinces that have some sort of legislation in place, that the tragic accident would still have occurred had we had in place in Ontario either or both pieces of legislation that are in place in British Columbia and in Quebec.

Mr. Rae: What we are suggesting to the minister is that Ontario be a leader and if there are deficiencies in the legislation in BC and Quebec they need not be repeated in Ontario.

I would like to specifically ask the minister, given the absence of the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry), whether he would not take up with the Attorney General the very serious situation which is taking place in the strike at the Central Precision plant in Rexdale. I am sure the minister is aware that the Securicor firm has gone before a justice of the peace in west Metro, Mr. Kashuba, and that as a result that gentleman has issued warrants for the arrest of several individuals. As the minister knows, it is a somewhat unusual practice, when a JP has been presented with a series of private charges, that rather than issuing a summons he has actually issued warrants for arrest.

Given the severity of that action taken by the justice of the peace in this situation and the dramatic contrast between the response of the authorities in this situation and the tragic events at the Alcan plant, would the minister consider taking up with the Attorney General the whole question of the way in which justice is administered on a picket line, and the very real hardship and tension and extraordinary deterioration in collective bargaining relationships which is taking place as a result of that kind of action?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: My first responsibility and concern as far as the circumstances at Central Precision are concerned is to mediate a settlement. In that respect we have had several meetings over the past couple of weeks. I personally have met with representatives of the union; they were accompanied by my colleague, the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie). Since then I have had meetings with the management of Central Precision.

We have some new parties involved in the negotiations and we are anticipating a full-scale mediation effort on Friday of this week. I am optimistic that the settlement of the resolution, of course, will settle the problems on the picket line.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary to the minister revolves around the general need for some kind of legislative action on his behalf in the area of strikebreaking, particularly as a result of some of the actions and the enormous tragedy at Alcan and some of the activities at Central Precision in recent weeks.

Does the minister not believe the time has come, as was suggested to him last week by the Ontario Federation of Labour, for him to put an end to professional strikebreaking in industry in this province? Does he not believe that legislation which is now in place in some states in the United States, such as Massachusetts and New York, would be useful in Ontario to bring to an end the abuses of many of these so-called security firms in labour relations situations?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, as the honourable member is aware, there is a matter of this nature before the Ontario Labour Relations Board at present and we are awaiting that decision. The member is also aware that the whole matter of security firms is being studied by the Solicitor General (Mr. G. W. Taylor) through the Ontario Provincial Police, and possible amendments to the appropriate act out of the Solicitor General's office are being considered.

As the member is also aware, there is access to the courts in these matters. There have been two very significant judgements in our courts in the last couple of years with respect to illegal action of this nature.

We are looking at all these various matters in concert with the representations made to us by Mr. Cliff Pilkey, president of the Ontario Federation of Labour, and his senior colleagues on Friday. I made a commitment earlier in question period that I would study matters from all sides in a very objective manner and I fully intend to do that.

Mr. Rae: The minister has responsibility not only for protecting collective bargaining rights, which we believe are being undermined today by the work of these security firms and by the strikebreaking activities of many employers, but also for human rights and the protection of human rights legislation in Ontario.

When the minister undertakes this review of strikebreaking legislation, will he consider the impact of any refusal on his part to move not only on labour relations and collective bargaining but on the sense of fairness, justice and hope which many new Canadians have, and had prior to the kinds of events we have seen at Central Precision and Alcan? Will he take that into consideration when he considers the kind of legislation that is necessary?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I will certainly take that into consideration. I would have done so without being lectured by the leader of the third party. I resent the implication that he and his colleagues are the only ones who are interested in a sense of fairness, a sense of hope, and so on.

Mr. Rae: The minister is very touchy.

WOMEN'S ISSUES MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my second question is for the Premier. It concerns one of the few specific promises that was made in the speech from the throne yesterday. It said on page 13, "My government will move to name a senior minister who will be responsible for women's issues with a complete mandate to review, initiate, direct and promote policies favourable to and in support of women in Ontario society."

Are we talking about a senior minister who already has other responsibilities or about a minister whose sole job will be to promote the interests of women, and are we talking about a ministry which will have the ability to support that minister in his or her work?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I reply to the earlier admonition. I think there were three questions. I guess my simple answer, in order to meet the spirit of the Speaker's admonition, is that I will answer all three fairly soon.

Mr. Rae: With the absence of not only a fair reply but of any specific statements in the speech from the throne with respect to equal pay for work of equal value, affirmative action, skills training, child care or pensions, I would like to ask the Premier how he can justify the fact that statements made even in earlier throne speeches, for example, with respect to equal pay for work of equal value are not contained in this throne speech? How can he justify the omission of any specific measures that would provide for greater equality between men and women in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I do not think it is necessary to repeat some of those things. If we had done that, the honourable member would simply have asked me, "What did the Premier mean in the throne speech of a year ago?"

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, if the Premier is interested in advancing the cause of equality for women in this province, which is a laudable aim, why would he not show specific good faith in this matter by removing the government's veto of the child-rearing drop-out provision, which is affecting women all across this province and is a major sticking point in the great pension debate?

He is the only holdout. Why would he not show his personal bona fides in this matter by at the very least removing that veto so we can advance that cause?

3:10 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that is a supplementary question but I will answer it anyway. This government has always been sympathetic to that particular point of view. We have made that clear on a number of occasions and have also indicated to the members of this House the reason that we have been reluctant to move because of other matters that were being discussed with the government of Canada. However, I can assure the honourable member it is a matter that we have addressed and are addressing very carefully.

Mr. Rae: In the throne speech yesterday we were told the minister would have "wide-ranging responsibility for taking steps to close the gap in wages, as well as the proportion of women who are clustered in particular areas of employment." Can the Premier simply tell us what steps he intends to take?

Hon. Mr. Davis: After the first question, in which the member suggested there were no specifics in the speech, I am delighted he has now found two. He will get the answer to those two specifics in due course.

NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES LTD.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. I am trying to understand the thought processes of the minister. On the one hand, with the trust companies and under the act that we passed before the session broke off in February, he proceeded to confiscate the property of certain companies, parcel it off, sell it off and prevent recourse to the courts, and yet there is apparently no evidence to lay any charges under any statute.

Yet in a decision just in the last week involving Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. and certain other individuals, he decided not to acquiesce or give his consent to a prosecution when he had reports from his own investigators, from the Ontario Securities Commission, he had the police investigation which recommended charges—

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Roy:—and he had recommendations and a suggestion by the chief law officer of the crown and the crown law officers to proceed with charges.

How is it, based on that particular evidence and on those recommendations, he decided to refuse to give consent or to allow the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) to prosecute under the Securities Act?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I apologize beforehand, but there will be some detail in the response to this question because it is fundamental and shows a lack of understanding of the Securities Act in this province.

First of all, let me say there was no confiscation. If the member would have chosen the alternative route, which caused a loss to everybody, then that is on his head and not mine. Second, the issue of whether or not there are criminal charges does not relate to the activities of this ministry and what it had to do. If he has a question in that regard, he knows where to put it.

Third, let us be very clear—and I do not say this with any disrespect, but just as a fact—I do not think he understands the true meaning of the Ontario securities legislation as it was established by this Legislature. That body was established, under section 2, to be entirely in control of the administration and activities with respect to the securities market in this province, and it was to maintain an independence and an arm's-length relationship to the ministry. That they have done and that they continue to do.

There have been no requests of me, either by the Ontario Securities Commission or by the Attorney General, to lay any charges. So his statement is out of order.

Mr. Roy: Does the minister deny that under the act, section 119, any prosecution under the securities legislation requires his consent? Does the minister deny he has refused to grant that consent over the wishes and the suggestions of his own securities officials? Considering that under section 125 of that act the limitation period was one year for bringing this matter before the courts, is the minister going to prohibit the commission from taking any proceedings as it can do under section 125, subsection 2, to bring this matter before the commission for a full hearing and a full and complete airing of this whole matter?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Once again I think there is not a full understanding of the functioning of the legislation nor the functioning of the commission.

The commission, on its own, I believe following a series of three meetings and following discussions and meetings with the Attorney General's representatives, chose not to request my permission to proceed with a charge. They do not have to get my permission in that area to not lay a charge; they only have to get my permission, which then requires evaluation of the basis for it, if they wish to proceed with a charge.

So the member is totally in error in saying that I have refused to allow them to do this. They have unanimously felt that there were not sufficient grounds to justify their proceeding. That is their decision.

The Attorney General, in conversations and correspondence with me a week ago today, indicated that some of his crown law officers had a differing point of view and asked if, in the light of that, I would ask the commission to review its decision. This I did, enclosing a copy of his letter and, at the request of the Attorney General, allowing representatives of the crown to attend at that subsequent meeting of the commission. Remember that this was an administrative decision they were making, not a judicial one. As a result of that prolonged afternoon and evening meeting a week ago the commission again unanimously reaffirmed its decision not to ask me for permission to lay a charge.

So, with respect, I think the member has not got the process quite clear, and there has been no request made to me.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, my question also relates to the actions of the minister with respect to the Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. matter and the matters before the commission. It also relates to section 119. Why did the minister, in accordance with the terms of that section, not direct the commission to proceed in the matter for the following reasons.

One is that the investigators submitted to the commission a report with the following statement, "We are of the view that a strong case can and should be made in an appropriate forum that Norcen and certain of its individual officers broke the law by making false statements about, and omitting to disclose, an intention which constituted a material fact and decisions which constituted material changes within the meaning of the act."

The minister knew that the chairman of the commission, whatever his bona fides with respect to his conflict of interest decision may have been, was at all material times a partner in the law firm that advised Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. during the period of the occurrences that were under investigation. Indeed, it was a partner in that firm who approached and intervened with the Attorney General of Ontario with respect to these matters.

Why did the minister not direct the commission under section 119 to proceed with the charges under the Securities Act?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, there are two very important elements to the question asked, and I accept the bona fides of the question because I understand the issues raised here.

First of all, I think the honourable member appreciates that these proceedings were at the administrative decision stage. The commission sitting as a whole body came to the conclusion that the recommendations of its investigative officers were not in line with its views with respect to the appropriateness and the justification of charges being laid as a result of those views.

What the member is really saying is that I should publicly say I have no faith and confidence in the Ontario Securities Commission—

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Well, he has publicly praised some of the members and individuals in that commission.

And he is saying I did not accept their recommendation and chose to override them and evaluate administrative documents provided to them and therefore say that they were not capable of giving me the kind of advice and the securities industry the kind of advice that was required.

I really do not accept that. I think the member has raised something that I find very troublesome, this issue of the conflict, because he knows very well the kind of things that people give up in order to come into public life and the sacrifices they make.

Mr. Renwick: Oh, come on now. That does not override it at all.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: He knows very well that the chairman, of high esteem, competence and great regard, has severed his relationship totally with that firm with no commitment or understanding that he will return.

He has no relationship to it at all, was never in any way related to the Norcen brief in that company; sought advice from counsel with respect to any conflict he might have, and put that problem before his fellow commissioners who unanimously said he, in their opinion, should proceed to take part in the discussions. If that is a conflict, we will have problems forever in getting the kind of competence we wish in positions such as that in the securities commission.

Mr. Renwick: The very fact that the chairman had to ask an opinion of counsel indicates very clearly the conflict of interest which should have disqualified him in the minister's eyes and should have led to his instructions to that commission to proceed.

My supplementary question is, to what extent has the minister's action under section 119 intervened and prevented his colleague the Attorney General from proceeding with charges under the Securities Act if possible, and if not, under the Criminal Code?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I am not aware that it has had any detrimental effect with respect to anything the Attorney General chose to do. As a matter of fact, the Deputy Attorney General was advised on Tuesday evening of the decision of the commission and at that time, had we wished and had the Attorney General wished, still could have put a request to me for permission to commence charges.

He feels, as I do, that the statute, the securities legislation in this province, particularly section 2, places, through the Legislature, the administration and the regulation of the securities industry in that commission. Nevertheless, the Attorney General still has an overriding obligation with respect to administration of justice and he has demonstrated his concern very capably.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, will the minister not understand that what my colleague and I are suggesting is not interference in the day-to-day affairs of the commission. Surely he will understand that when one has a report from one's own investigators—the investigators from the commission—

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I do not get it.

Mr. Roy: No, the minister did not get the report but he knew the commission did and he knew the police were investigating this. Surely when the minister gets a letter from the chief law officer of the crown asking his permission to proceed with charges that the commission will not proceed with, why at that point would he not intervene as the minister, as he is authorized to do under the statute?

Considering all the possibilities, including the possible conflict of interest as mentioned by my colleague referring to the chairman, why at that point would he not acquiesce to the request of the chief law officer of the crown and allow him to prosecute or to proceed with charges under the Securities Act?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I seem to be having difficulty getting a very clear message across. The first message is that the securities commission exists to administer and regulate the securities industry. It does not report to me nor submit its investigative officers' reports to me for my approval or comment before it makes administrative decisions; nor should it, nor would this House expect it to. It is inappropriate for the member for Ottawa East to suggest that.

Second, he is in error again in saying that the Attorney General requested permission to lay charges. There was no such request and I have said that twice already.

ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Mr. Riddell: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture and Food.

In view of the fact that this government's promises to farmers in this year's throne speech are nothing more than a reshuffle of last year's promises and continue to ignore the real financial problems facing our farmers, given that Ontario farmers continue to go bankrupt at the alarming rate of one every two and a half days and because of this government's lack of meaningful assistance find themselves in the same financial crisis today as they did last year, other than blaming the federal government for its alleged lack of co-operation with this government's programs, what solutions does the minister have to offer Ontario farmers, many of whom are postponing making decisions on spring planting to the last possible moment because they simply cannot predict the future stability of the agricultural industry? Considering the low commodity prices, the high input costs, the uncertain interest rates and the lack of a meaningful government policy, does the minister not feel this province desperately needs a focus, an agricultural strategy within which farmers can make long-term decisions, rather than relying on disjointed ad hoc programs?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly agree with the honourable member there is a need for clear, concise policies. I have been minister now for going on 15 months and I would be interested to know what ideas he has over there. I have certainly not been one to reject out of hand any possibility that there might be an original idea in that party.

If we were to read Hansard from a year or so ago, the member stood in his place and at that time made the same assertions that people were unwilling to plant crops and that there were going to be thousands of acres left unplanted in 1982. All his pessimism came to naught. All his predictions were unfounded. In 1982, this government was able to assist well over 3,000 farmers to cope with the problems brought on by high interest rates, a policy of the member's party in Ottawa that has wrought havoc not just on agriculture but on every sector of the economy.

It has to be repeated that we put forward in 1982 and have carried forward into 1983 some very substantial policies and policy proposals that will make agriculture more secure, more stable, more predictable and more attractive, to keep the present investors, and by that I mean everybody involved in agriculture right from the producers through the processors through the retailers, and to make it more attractive for the future.

I am talking about the farm assistance program. I am talking about the beginning farmers program we are going to introduce. I am talking about our proposals for property tax reform, and I would be interested to hear the member's views on that. I am talking about our very substantial leadership role in this province and this ministry in establishing a new national income stabilization program, which the Liberals have done precious little to help us bring about.

Mr. Riddell: The minister says my assertions have come to naught. In view of the fact that his promise to introduce a young farmers credit program is a repetition of a promise made in last year's throne speech and budget that never materialized, will the minister assure us that this program will be made available to the young farmers this spring?

Will he provide us with some of the details of the perceived program, since he has had well over a year to work on it? Will he give us some of the details of that program? What are the eligibility requirements? Is it going to be a long-term financial assistance program? Is it going to be at low interest rates? Will the minister give us some of the details of the program if he knows all about it?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: First of all, I can assure the member he will not qualify.

Second, in 1982, the member will recall, both here in this House and in countless meetings around the province, when asked about that matter I was very frank, very honest and very open with everyone involved. I pointed out that subsequent to the throne speech of 1982 we had formulated certain proposals which, like proposals from various other ministries, had to be held because of the significant increase in the deficit that came to light because of declining revenues in the late spring or early summer of 1982.

I know that as a Grit the member believes he can have it all ways. He can say to the people: "On one hand, we will give you everything you want. On the other hand, we will not increase taxes. We will decrease taxes and we will decrease deficits." That simply cannot be done.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that was the question.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: The people see through that party's phinness. It has never been elected in 40 years.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, I presume the minister in his meetings with the banks and other financial institutions would have determined the situation with regard to farm mortgage loans in default this year compared to last year and would therefore know that in the Farm Credit Corp. alone the amount of default is 50 per cent higher across the nation than it was last year and 60 per cent higher in this province. Recognizing that, how can he justify the throne speech, which gives no additional assistance whatsoever to farmers who are in this serious situation?

3:30 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, obviously the honourable member was not listening, because in fact we are going to introduce a program for beginning farmers this year.

Let me just comment on the meetings I have had with the financial institutions. I indicated to members at about the time the House was wrapping up in February that I was going to meet with the financial institutions. I must say I have been very pleased with the results of those meetings because, contrary to the kind of pessimism that the members opposite like to spread about agriculture, I found in my meetings, particularly with the chartered banks, who are heavily involved in farm credit in this province and in this country, that they continue to consider agriculture to be a very good investment. On the whole, rather than a decline in farm credit, I found that the banks were telling me they anticipated lending more money, that they are going to be more heavily involved in supporting the efforts of our producers and everybody involved in agribusiness in this province.

I am sorry. I know the member would like me to confirm his pessimism; I know he would like to see nothing but negative predictions. But I do not have that to give him today.

CLOSURE OF AUDIO LIBRARY

Mr. Allen: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Provincial Secretary for Social Development on a matter on which she and I have had some exchanges in the past.

In February of this year the Speaker of this House wrote a letter to the president of the Peterborough branch of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation in which he declared, "The Honourable Margaret Birch and the Honourable Bette Stephenson have both assured me that the audio library at Trent University will continue in operation with the support of the Ontario government," only to receive about a month later a communication from the Minister of Colleges and Universities (Miss Stephenson) in which she said she had not changed her position; she was still holding that Trent must "get the funding required from other educational institutions using the service." As we all know, that would bring that institution to an abrupt end.

Mr. Speaker: I presume you do have a question.

Mr. Allen: Yes, it is coming.

The provincial secretary's handling of the question has continued to be clouded in some contradiction. At least the mechanism to provide the service a week or so ago was so threatening to the Trent audio library's board that it went into emergency session last week while some papers were speculating that the institution would remain open.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I just point out to the honourable member, who has referred to me and the riding I have the honour to represent, that he has not had the opportunity of the latest information. Would you please place your question?

Mr. Allen: In view of the attempt by a student at McMaster University as late as last week to place orders with the Trent audio library for a date after April 30, orders that were rejected, and since the Hamilton Council of Women delegation is coming this afternoon to this Legislature, will the provincial secretary please finally announce the fate of the audio library services and end the tortured course of the issue and the uncertainty in which post-secondary print-handicapped students have laboured for so long?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to respond to the honourable member's long question. In fact, he is well aware that a very positive resolution to this whole issue of the provision of Braille and audio materials to the print-handicapped post-secondary students has been resolved to the satisfaction of all of those who have provided services. It is anticipated that a very positive statement will be made in this House.

I just wish the member would discontinue trying to stir the pot by issuing press releases and by meeting with people to continue this discussion.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Allen: Mr. Speaker, I venture to suggest that if I had not tried to stir the pot it would not have boiled.

Will the Provincial Secretary for Social Development assure the Legislature that when she makes her announcement, and I hope it will be soon, it will (1) include permanent funding arrangements that will be of an ongoing nature; (2) provide for a direct service from the library to students and not a convoluted, time-consuming structure; (3) involve clients in the service in such a way as to assure them of participation in the activity; and (4), and I think this is most important, assure print-handicapped students that they are the responsibility of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities?

Mr. Speaker: I think that was a four-part question. I would direct the minister to answer the last part.

Hon. Mrs. Birch: I would just say that of all the groups that are involved in the provision of these particular services to the students in our post-secondary institutions, Trent did hold out. We were able to reach a compromise, and I have received a letter from them today advising me that they are very happy with the solution we have arrived at and are delighted to proceed to develop a policy that is going to benefit all the post-secondary students across the province.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, as late as last Friday a student at the University of Western Ontario contacted my office. Apparently that student was not aware of what the provincial secretary has just revealed in this House.

Given that the number of students is not that large, I am wondering whether we might put them at ease by notifying them individually that this wonderful announcement will not be the announcement of another makeshift program but, rather, of something permanent they can rely on for the remainder of their days at the university, and so those who are coming along after them also will not have to worry from day to day whether they will have any assistance.

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure the honourable member that this will be an ongoing, permanent arrangement to provide the very necessary equipment for the students to continue with their education.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Premier with respect to property rights. Given that the Prime Minister has promised to pass legislation by June to enshrine property rights into the Constitution if agreement can be made with the official opposition in Ottawa, and given that a total of seven provinces must pass similar resolutions for such legislation to take effect under Canada's new Constitution, will the Premier commit the government of Ontario to support the resolution which I introduced into the Legislature last October and reintroduce today, will the Premier propose his own legislation, or does he plan to continue doing nothing, as he has done on this issue previously?

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I could not hear the member for Grey (Mr. McKessock).

Mr. Speaker: Never mind.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am doing my very best to abide by your very proper admonitions at the beginning of the question period today. I will reply very briefly to the honourable member by saying I think it is likely that I will have something to say on this very important issue on Thursday afternoon.

Mr. Epp: Given the fact that we have waited for some months now for some indication by the government that it will come forth with an announcement, why does the Premier have to wait until Thursday afternoon to do it? Why can he not do it on April 19?

3:40 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I sometimes hear a little criticism from across the House that we prolong the statements. The minister had a very important and I think lengthy statement today. We did not want to usurp all the time. I just say to the member to be patient until Thursday. He is not going to go away and I am not going away. I will address this issue on Thursday.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I did not expect the Premier to move so quickly on the matter. I wonder whether on Thursday, in any remarks he might want to make about entrenching already well-protected property rights, he will include some statement with respect to protecting the right to economic security of large sections of the public in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I can only assume that the member for Riverdale is referring to his own economic security, and I know he would not want me to do that in the Constitution.

CLOSURE OF CHRYSLER PLANT

Mr. Cooke: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry and Trade. The statement was made in the throne speech yesterday that "Ontario has pursued discussions with the government of Canada and business and labour leaders to promote its revitalization and future development." That was in reference to the auto industry.

In this regard, what efforts has the minister made to secure the maintenance of the spring plant, a Chrysler operation in the city of Windsor, and to secure a car to be built in Windsor rather than relying on vans and van-wagons? If he is concerned about the revitalization of the auto industry, why does he defend Chrysler's decision to close the spring plant instead of attempting to keep it here and the jobs here?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that Chrysler is maintaining an employment level that far exceeds anything imagined a few years ago. Second, I am told the spring plant lost $5 million a year. If a plant is losing $5 million a year, one has to wonder whether that is going to continue. The third thing is that for the past two and a half years it has been known that the spring plant was going to close. The honourable member has known it.

Mr. Cooke: It is obvious why the United Auto Workers refuses to meet with this minister. He does not have the facts and he does not attempt to get the facts. That plant is not losing $5 million a year.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Cooke: What efforts has the minister made to secure the production of a car in Canada? Why has this government backed off on a commitment made by the former Minister of Industry and Trade that we wanted 100 per cent Canadian value added by foreign auto makers? In yesterday's throne speech the government backed off and now we are going for 65 per cent, which is part of the Canada-US auto pact. Why are we willing to settle for 65 per cent now when it was 100 per cent a year ago?

Hon. Mr. Walker: The member himself knows we have arrived at a figure that is a reasonably accepted compromise with the entire industry.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, to go back to the spring plant and the minister's claim that the plant is losing some $5 million a year, that is the third or fourth time the minister has made that claim. I would like to know on what basis is he making that claim. Quite frankly, the facts we have are entirely different. If he is so concerned about revitalizing the industry, why does he not protect the spring plant and why did he allow Chrysler to back out of the research and development facility which would have revitalized another segment of the auto industry in Windsor?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the claim of the $5-million loss, I understand that is documented in Ottawa in terms of the auto pact understanding and it has been provided to me by Chrysler officials. I indicated a moment ago that I was told those were the figures. I have not conducted an audit to determine whether it is $5 million, but I am told that is the case. I am told it is not refuted, and that is the situation. That is the first bit of information.

Relative to the R and D centre, the option was theirs to pick up that part of it. We had no hold over them as to whether they would or not. It was up to them to take down any of the money. Chrysler Canada chose not to take down any of the money that had been set aside for the purpose of the R and D facility. That was their choice. It was not our obligation.

ONTARIO YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing. My question refers to a news release from the minister's office, dated March 24 and concerning Ontario youth employment programs.

Given that youth unemployment in Ontario has increased over the past year by 50,000 to a new high of 233,000 and has increased from 17.3 per cent to 22.2 per cent in that age group, can the minister explain why in that release he is announcing a reduction in provincial support to the Ontario youth employment program from last year's $34 million to this year's $23.7 million and from serving 57,000 young people last year to only 41,000 this year, a reduction of 16,000? It does not seem to make sense.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member will recall that also in the past year we brought in a program to try to develop some youth employment programs during the other months of the year. Indeed, that had to be redistributed from the youth program we had in past summers.

The member will recall also that in the press release we said very clearly, and the speech from the throne yesterday repeated it again, that while the government has added some opportunities for encouraging people to employ young people, the responsibility should not fall entirely to the government; the private sector should become more of a participant at this particular time and indeed was given the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Sweeney: The minister is surely aware that the private sector, this summer in particular, is going to have almost no job openings because its first responsibility is to hire back those who have been laid off.

Is the minister aware that a program operated by his colleague the member for Scarborough East (Mrs. Birch), the summer Experience '83 program, is going to provide service to 300 fewer young people this summer than there were last summer?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Yes, I am aware.

JOB TRANSFERS

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Natural Resources. Can the minister tell us how he justifies his decision to close the sign shop at the Ministry of Natural Resources facilities in Huntsville and transfer the four jobs there to inmates at the Mimico reformatory?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member wrote to me about this before; I cannot recall my response, but I will get it to him.

Mr. Speaker: The time for oral questions has expired.

Before I recognize the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy), I would like to thank all the honourable members for their co-operation. We are a little rough around the edges, but I am sure we are going to make it work.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: You know how critical I am sometimes about the proceedings in the House, but I just want to comment that the admonition seems to have had a very positive effect. I am especially impressed—and I do not say this very often—by the shortness and brevity of the nonanswers from that side.

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a point of privilege.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege, perhaps as a reminder to the Minister of Labour. On February 9, in answer to a question I asked him regarding the closing of Dylex's Lakeshore operation in Toronto, the minister said I should have a complete report on it in the very near future. He was not able to get that before the end of the last session.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the minister has taken note of your nonpoint of privilege or nonpoint of order and will respond quickly.

3:50 p.m.

PETITIONS

CLOSURE OF FACILITIES FOR MENTALLY RETARDED

Mr. Sheppard: Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here with more than 7,000 names on it which I would like to present to the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea) in regard to the closing of D'Arcy Place.

FEES FOR PROVINCIAL PARKS

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition, which reads as follows:

"We, the undersigned, request a revision of the new legislation governing all Ontario provincial parks, re Ontario senior citizens. We should not be charged the $8 a night weekend fees. We feel that Ontario seniors should have free overnight privileges to these parks year round as we did in the past."

It is signed by approximately 150 senior citizens from the Rainy River area.

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, just to clarify the record: Senior citizens do in fact get free use of all areas in the parks on all weekdays during the regular park season. They also have access to the campsites at regular fees during the weekends.

Interjections.

MOTIONS

HOUSE SITTINGS

Hon. Mr. Wells moved that commencing tomorrow, April 20, the House will not sit in the chambers on Wednesdays unless otherwise ordered.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Wells moved that the first day for consideration of private members' public business be on the first Thursday following the completion of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and that in accordance with the order of the House of February 23, 1983, the order of precedence established in the first session and as amended from time to time be continued in the third session.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Wells moved that, due to the interruption of the consideration of private bill legislation occasioned by the prorogation of the second session of the 32nd parliament, application for private legislation relating to Bills Pr8, Pr9, Pr13, Pr20, Pr34 and Pr36, which received first reading in the second session, be considered during the present session without publishing further notice of the applications and without lodging further declarations proving publication, and that the application fees paid by the applicants in the second session be applicable for the continuation of the applications in the present session.

Motion agreed to.

DEPUTY CHAIRMAN

Hon. Mr. Wells moved that the member for York Centre (Mr. Cousens) be appointed deputy chairman of the committees of the whole House for this session.

Motion agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

EMERGENCY PLANS ACT

Hon. G. W. Taylor moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Eaton, first reading of Bill 2, An Act to provide for the Formulation and Implementation of Emergency Plans.

Motion agreed to.

MOTOR VEHICLE DEALERS AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Elgie moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gregory, first reading of Bill 3, An Act to amend the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone here today has heard of the Ontario travel industry compensation fund. In the past seven years, this fund has paid out more than $2.5 million to consumers who had claims arising out of the collapse of travel agencies and companies. This is the kind of industry initiative that deserves the full support and appreciation of the government and the public. I am pleased, therefore, to reintroduce today amendments to the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act that will set up a similar fund to compensate consumers who are caught in the collapse of a car dealership.

By way of background, the Motor Vehicle Dealers Act was set up in 1965. At that time a $5,000 bond posted by each of the car dealerships was enough to cover potential consumer claims but, as the industry has rightly pointed out, it is not enough today. Some dealerships are running trust accounts as high as $20,000 and acceptance of $1,000 deposits is commonplace. A $5,000 bond would not go very far if a dealership ever went under and the trust account was not intact.

As well, the industry has told us that posting bonds has become increasingly expensive and the processing of claims is time-consuming and cumbersome. After meetings with the industry, we have decided to amend the act to establish a compensation fund.

COLLECTION AGENCIES AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Elgie moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gregory, first reading of Bill 4, An Act to amend the Collection Agencies Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing for first reading an amendment to the Collection Agencies Act. By way of background, we have now in place a set of guidelines outlining the kinds of methods that should be used to collect debts. The registrar of the act ensures that all collection agencies are aware of these guidelines, which have been in effect for many years, but the industry feels it would be everyone's best interests to have the guidelines clearly spelled out in the act so that all agencies are following a set of rules enforceable by law. This would also give the public a clearer understanding of what collection agencies can and cannot do.

At present, the act only allows us to draft regulations governing methods. In the regulation, we are planning to formalize practices. The difference between a method and a practice is not clearly defined so we decided our best approach was to amend the act to enable us to draft regulations governing both practices and methods. Once this is done, the new regulations can be finalized.

These amendments to the regulations will include prohibitions on the following: (1) trying to collect money from someone who says he or she is not responsible for the debt, without checking all the facts; (2) phoning a debtor before he or she has been informed by letter that the account has been turned over to a collection agency; (3) demanding payment of a debt without first identifying the agency, individual collector and the creditor; and (4) launching legal action without first telling the debtor.

BOILERS AND PRESSURE VESSELS AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Elgie moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gregory, first reading of Bill 5, An Act to amend the Boilers and Pressure Vessels Act.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing for first reading amendments to the Boilers and Pressure Vessels Act aimed at eliminating unnecessary slowdowns when boilers, pressure vessels and plants need repair.

Section 32 of the act now requires that when a boiler, pressure vessel or plant is found to be unsafe, it must be examined by a ministry inspector both before and after being repaired. Since most boilers, pressure vessels and plants are insured, they are inspected by government certified inspectors. Clearly, the function performed by our inspectors can be performed by government-certified personnel from insurance companies. This bill would make this permissible but not mandatory.

Officials from my ministry have reached agreement with the appropriate insurance companies that their certified personnel will supervise and approve repair work done to boilers and pressure vessels that they insure.

In addition, under subsection 32(3), it would authorize the government chief inspector to exempt owners of plants operated around the clock from having major repairs approved by either a government or an insurance inspector when the chief inspector is satisfied that the repairs will be performed safely and properly by qualified personnel. Current provisions represent a hardship for refineries, petrochemical plants and similar operations which have their own trained inspection staffs which operate around the clock. There is little point in making them shut down while a government inspector checks their work. The terms and conditions of exemption will be clearly set out in regulations.

Amendments to section 2 will extend the definition of employer for the purposes of section 36 of the act and will eliminate the unnecessary testing of welders changing jobs but still employed members of the trade association.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AND PROTECTION OF PRIVACY ACT

Mr. Breithaupt moved, seconded by Mr. T. P. Reid, first reading of Bill 6, An Act to provide for Freedom of Information and Protection of Individual Privacy.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides a broad and comprehensive scheme for public access to and protection of individual privacy with respect to information held by government. While the topic of freedom of information was referred to in the speech from the throne in 1977, in 1980 and in 1981, no such reference was made yesterday. Since apparently the matter is no longer a great priority for the government, the bill again shows how seriously we in the opposition view the need for legislation in this important area.

SUCCESSION LAW ACT

Mr. Breithaupt moved, seconded by Mr. T. P. Reid, first reading of Bill 8, An Act respecting the Succession to Estates of Deceased Persons in Ontario who have Beneficiaries residing in Designated Countries.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, this legislation is commonly referred to as the Soviet estates bill. The purpose of it is to ensure that payments from the estates of persons domiciled in Ontario at the time of death are not made to foreign beneficiaries who are unlikely to receive for their whole benefit or use substantially the full value of any payments made under the estate and who reside in certain countries designated by regulation.

The bill provides for an application to be made to a court for an order permitting payments to a foreign beneficiary. The court may also order that no payment be made to a foreign beneficiary, in which case the court shall make an order disposing of the estate in accordance with the rules of succession contained in the Succession Law Reform Act with necessary modifications.

While the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) has in the past shown interest in this matter, and it was Bill 1 on one occasion, the failure even to refer to this subject in yesterday's throne speech is disappointing. Here is a bill that can do the necessary job, and I commend it to the Legislature.

ELECTION AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Breithaupt moved, seconded by Mr. Epp, first reading of Bill 9, An Act to amend the Election Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, this bill amends the Election Act for several purposes and is a repetition of the bill I introduced some time ago. The principal changes to the act include the following:

First, the British subject basis for qualification as a voter or candidate in an election is removed so that all voters and candidates must now be Canadian citizens.

Second, the chief election officer is given authority to set standards for convenient access to polling places by persons who are physically handicapped.

Third, the bill provides that so far as is reasonably possible all polling stations should be and all advance polls must be accessible to persons who are physically handicapped.

Fourth, persons who are physically handicapped are permitted to name voting proxies up to and including the day of the election.

Fifth, the political affiliation of candidates would be shown on the ballot.

Sixth, campaign material is prohibited from being brought into a place near a polling place on election day.

Seventh, the procedure for establishing the qualifications of a voter whose name has been omitted in error from a polling list is extended to all polling subdivisions rather than simply rural subdivisions.

Eighth, the restriction that limits a person to assisting only one blind person in voting is removed.

Yesterday the speech from the throne told us of the preparations for Ontario's bicentennial in 1984. The best way we can mark that anniversary would be to ensure that in any future general election in Ontario only Canadian citizens will have the right to vote.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Breithaupt moved, seconded by Mr. Conway, first reading of Bill 10, An Act to amend the Legislative Assembly Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, again I introduce this bill, whose purpose is to provide for the appointment of a curator of Queen's Park. The curator of Queen's Park would be responsible for advising the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly and the Lieutenant Governor in Council concerning the conservation, protection and preservation of the heritage of Queen's Park.

Again, the reference in yesterday's throne speech to our bicentennial reminds us that this 1983 is the 90th anniversary of this building. I suggest it is most appropriate to ensure that the fabric of our legislative heritage be maintained and strengthened for the years to come.

4:10 p.m.

LANDLORD AND TENANT AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Philip moved, seconded by Mr. Swart, first reading of Bill 11, An Act to amend the Landlord and Tenant Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, some members are upset that I have created more housing than the government, but this bill, which should have been introduced by the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Kolyn), is to protect his tenants. It is a bill intended to prevent the circumvention of municipal condominium conversion bylaws and section 60 of the Condominium Act by making it clear that, despite the recent unreported decision of the Divisional Court in Medeiros versus Fraleigh, the owner of a percentage interest or a share in an apartment building cannot evict a tenant under section 105 or clause 107(1)(b) of the Landlord and Tenant Act.

LABOUR RELATIONS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Mackenzie moved, seconded by Mr.

Breaugh, first reading of Bill 12, An Act to amend the Labour Relations Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, this bill would make the hiring of or acting as a professional strikebreaker an offence; prevent the hiring of persons to replace employees who are on a legal strike or are locked out except by agreement with the effective bargaining unit; and control access to work premises affected by a strike or lockout.

Transport, removal and handling of the employer's product would be prohibited during a strike or lockout except by agreement with the effective bargaining unit or by order of the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

A designated representative of the bargaining unit would be entitled to inspect the employer's work premises and the board would be empowered to make and enforce its actions concerning contraventions of the prohibitions contained in the bill.

CAMBRIDGE HORNETS

Mr. Barlow: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: I would like to point out to you and to the members of this Legislature that last night in the Shade Street arena in the great city of Cambridge the Cambridge Hornets returned the Allan Cup to Ontario and to Cambridge.

Interjections.

Mr. Barlow: I understand it was a little bit on the rough side. Unfortunately, I was not able to attend last night's game. It was the fourth time in about the past 14 years that the Allan Cup has rested in Cambridge. We are very pleased at that, and I would like the members of the House to join me in congratulating the Cambridge Hornets.

[Applause]

MOTION TO SET ASIDE ORDINARY BUSINESS

Mr. Mackenzie moved, seconded by Mr. Foulds, that pursuant to standing order 34(a), the ordinary business of the House be set aside to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the harassment of workers on legal picket lines at Central Precision and Alcan in Scarborough, which has led to numerous arrests, confrontations, some injuries and the death of a worker, Claude Dougdeen, and which undermines the faith of working people, particularly new Canadians, in the fairness of the justice system in this province.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to mention to all honourable members that the notice of motion under standing 34(a) has been received in time. I will be prepared to listen for up to five minutes as to why the honourable member thinks the ordinary business of the House should be set aside.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, what has been happening in the one or two cases I mentioned in the motion makes the case as well as I can. What is happening to faith in the justice system in this province is a serious question. No worker takes a strike lightly. If one has been through a few of them, either oneself or had the responsibility for them, one knows it is a decision which is a serious one for workers to make. I want to treat this matter in a responsible and serious manner.

Once a worker has decided his only recourse is a strike, a vote has been held and he is now in a legal strike position, he is up against the loss of his paycheque and the threat to his job. To get conditions he feels are fair to work under, he has had to make that decision and take that risk.

What happens and what has been happening? I do not know a case that underlines it better than the Central Precision strike in this city. Within a matter of hours of that strike starting, a private security firm, Securicor, had been called. What is the general practice from day to day? Almost from day one the security firm's cars are inside the plant. They move up to the picket line at 6:45 in the morning with the strikebreakers the company is hiring to try to keep that plant going, people who are seen by the workers as stealing their jobs, in effect, or trying to. The cars move up and the cameras start rolling, right as the cars come through with the strikebreakers in the operation.

What happens? The harassment is rather fantastic. One would think responsible people would not react to provocation, but it has to be understood it is their jobs at stake and they have taken a very serious decision already. What they get from inside the vans from the workers being brought in is the famous finger—if one likes, “up yours;” and I apologize to the House—and a series of provocations. Not only that, senior officials of the security firm in there have come up to the picket line with big grins on their faces to say to the workers and officers of the local: “Keep it up. It does not matter if a couple of cars get scratched. The longer you keep this strike up, the longer we are picking up $20,000 a week.” The kind of harassment there is fantastic.

What happens then? The security firm goes down to the local justice of the peace and swears out a warrant, usually for mischief. There have been 27 of them sworn out. On one occasion, April 6, the local police chose seven o'clock in the morning to arrive to arrest four of the key people in the strike, based on warrants which had been issued days before. This is a new wrinkle we are getting in the whole picket line scene. They arrest them on the line, demoralizing the workers there. They take them down. Three of those four workers spent the night in jail. They went through all the processes. Only one of them was released. We have now had 27 such warrants issued.

In one case, a young Portuguese worker who did not know the warrant was out for him was called by the union, went down to the police station and was immediately put in handcuffs. That was a mischief warrant that was sworn out. The union itself has great difficulty in filing charges with this same justice of the peace.

This is the kind of situation we have going on. One wonders why occasionally there is some trouble on that picket line. Those same workers see, after the confrontation has taken place, usually in the morning, the police car go across the street to the parking lot and the Securicor car park beside the police car. They roll down the windows, exchange smokes and talk for one half to three quarters of an hour right in front of the workers on that picket line.

One wonders why something happens such as happened at Alcan. While there had not been the immediate trouble on that line, they decided to run the trucks in the middle of the night without telling anybody. Then one wonders why the workers on those picket lines, more and more, just as in the case of injuries in another strike that came to me while I was preparing for the House today, say to us, "Where is the justice?" These are new Canadians. In this particular plant they are mostly Portuguese workers who came to this new country because they thought there was fairness here. They ask: "How can the police do this? How can the company do this? We are in a legal strike situation. Does it not mean anything?"

This is the danger, Mr. Speaker, that I am raising with you. We have a problem, and what is happening? Not just deliberate harassment but deliberate intimidation of the workers in legal strike situations. It is time this province took some action to deal with this kind of situation, and if that means legislation, then it is long overdue. Yes, there is a responsibility for what happened on this government.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, my party will support the motion as submitted by the honourable member for Hamilton East asking for an emergency debate on this very important issue, the issue of protecting workers on picket lines from the effects of strikebreakers. It is not only very important, but certainly in the case at Alcan, ultimately a very tragic circumstance.

It seems to me very important that this Legislature be offered an opportunity to debate this matter. It is a matter on which my colleagues have from time to time introduced private members' legislation. The late member for Sarnia, Mr. Bullbrook, introduced such legislation; my colleague the member for London North (Mr. Van Horne) introduced legislation dealing with the issue of strikebreakers back in 1979; and my colleague the member for Essex South (Mr. Mancini) also introduced legislation a few years ago.

I think it is very important that we debate this whole matter and then have the government present legislation that would bring Ontario into an area that has so far had legislation only from British Columbia and Quebec. It is certainly an area that is long overdue.

It is clear that the actions and activities, particularly of professional strikebreakers, organizations such as Securicor, in the long run damage good labour relations, not obviously at the time the strike is occurring, because good labour relations have already suffered a certain amount of damage, but they damage a recovery of good labour relations and a co-operative attitude between the two parties for months and sometimes for years after the end of a legal labour dispute. That is clearly not in the interests of either side and ultimately it is not in the interests of Ontario.

It is unfortunate, it seems to me, that we have given the right to strike to working men and women in this province and then have not taken action to ensure that they are not victimized by harassment and even worse by these professional strikebreaking firms during the legal dispute.

In reading this motion, I was bothered by one area, and I want to bring this particularly to the attention of the House. It is the section at the end of the motion that says, "and which undermines the faith of working people, particularly new Canadians, in the fairness of the justice system in this province."

I want to take quite strong exception to that because it represents to my mind and to that of my colleagues, perhaps in an innocent way, a very insidious attempt to introduce some kind of artificial distinction. Indeed, some would suggest that, perhaps inadvertently, using the phrase "particularly new Canadians" borders in a sense on some kind of racism.

Mr. Mackenzie: Obviously, you people are never in picket lines.

Mr. Wrye: I have been on a picket line. I do not need to be lectured by the member for Hamilton East.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wrye: I think the incidents are serious enough that they can be treated with real integrity and that the use of the wording "particularly new Canadians" tends to cheapen it. I think I would have wanted it to say at the end, "which undermines the faith of all people in the justice system of Ontario," whether they are new Canadians or whether they have been here for generations on end, because it ultimately does affect all of us here in Ontario when we have a situation where working men and women are subjected to the kind of problems that have occurred, most particularly with the professional firms at Central Precision Ltd. and those that have led to the tragedy at Alcan Building Products Ltd.

I hope the minister will stand in his place in a minute and indicate that the government is prepared to proceed with this emergency debate and that it will use the time and listen to members from all three parties during the emergency debate to hear the various legislative initiatives that members of all parties would like to see this government take, and that we will not stall with study upon study but move quickly so we can have legislative initiatives introduced during the spring session and passed into law, for they are long overdue in this province.

We have a multitude of examples not only from Canada, but from many of the states south of the border. I think the time for study has passed and it is time for the minister and this government to proceed and bring us legislation which will end this very shabby practice which really lowers labour relations in Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: The member's time has expired.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the resolution by the member for Hamilton East which calls upon this House to set aside its ordinary business and to conduct a special debate in respect to incidents which have recently occurred on the picket lines at Central Precision Ltd. and Alcan Building Products Ltd.

It submitted that the developments of recent days, including the tragic death of Claude Dougdeen, have served to undermine the faith of working people in the fairness of the justice system in this province. I cannot accept this statement.

At the outset, we must understand what picketing is all about. In Ontario the right of employees engaged in a lawful work stoppage to peacefully picket their employer's business premises has long been recognized. The primary purpose of the picket line is to communicate information concerning the dispute, to achieve solidarity within the work force, to influence other workers not to displace the striking employees and to appeal to the community at large for its moral support.

By and large, picketing in this province has been conducted in a peaceful manner without incident. Generally speaking, trade unions and their members are aware of their rights and obligations in relation to picket-line activity. Similarly, the police forces of this province are aware of the purpose of the picket line and are capable of ensuring that the rights of employers and employees are protected. In my view, the existing collective bargaining procedure with its attendant right to picket has well served the interest of the labour movement over the years.

Currently, we all recognize that the tensions inherent in the collective bargaining of a dispute often find their expression on the picket line. Understandably, emotions run high amongst employees who have experienced an interruption in their income, are concerned about preserving their jobs and are uncertain about the outcome of the dispute resolution process. Despite the potential for confrontation, the record shows that our system has generally accommodated these tensions without incident.

The resolution by the honourable member refers to two particular collective bargaining disputes, the facts of which are quite distinct. As I have noted and as I am sure all members of the House are aware, a member of the United Steelworkers, Claude Dougdeen, died as a result of injuries sustained on the picket line at Alcan Building Products Ltd. This was a great tragedy.

However, no evidence has come to my attention to indicate the improper conduct on the part of the employer or any of the employees on the picket line. It is my understanding that the investigation is continuing and that an inquest will be held. At the present time it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the precise circumstances of the tragic passing.

In contrast, there has been a great deal of continuing tension in the dispute between Central Precision Ltd. and the United Steelworkers of America. It is alleged by the striking employees that the security firm retained by the employer has engaged in improper surveillance and provocation. The consequent anger and frustration have been expressed by the striking employees establishing a picket line at the personal residences of officers of the company and by leafletting the neighbours of at least one of the company's officials. There have been a number of arrests and charges laid related to alleged unlawful conduct on the picket line.

I have spoken with my colleague the Solicitor General (Mr. G. W. Taylor), who is receiving detailed reports regarding the involvement of the Metropolitan Toronto Police in this dispute. The Solicitor General advises me that he has carefully reviewed these reports and has concluded that there has been no improper conduct on the part of the police in the performance of their most difficult and sensitive functions.

If the honourable member or any other person has any particular complaints in respect to the conduct of the police, he may wish to address them to the Solicitor General in question period or by telephone or letter. I am sure he would be interested in receiving any such information.

I understand that the justice of the peace before whom informations have been laid in this matter has in some cases issued warrants for the arrest of certain employees rather than proceeding by summons. I also understand that many of these informations have been laid by the agents of the security firm retained by the employer. The member will appreciate the decision as to whether a warrant or a summons should be issued is ultimately a matter of judicial discretion.

It is certainly not appropriate for the Minister of Labour to comment on the exercise of such discretion. If the member has reason to believe that this discretion has been abused he may wish to communicate his complaint to the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry), bearing in mind that that no minister would have the right to interfere with the exercise of judicial discretion.

4:30 p.m.

While I can certainly understand the member's concern, I believe the matters he has raised can be and are being adequately addressed in existing procedures. For this reason I would oppose the member's resolution for an emergency debate.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened with great interest to the submissions put forward by the representatives of all three parties in the House. I must say I do find some grounds for the debate. However, I must say, too, that because of the beginning of the throne speech debate we are going to have a better opportunity and more opportunity to discuss this and other matters without any time limit, as would be imposed if we were to discuss it this afternoon. Therefore, I am of the opinion that the motion should not be put at this time.

Mr. McClellan: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, you leave us no choice other than to challenge your ruling.

4:50 p.m.

The House divided on the Speaker's ruling, which was sustained on the following vote:

Ayes

Andrewes, Ashe, Barlow, Bennett, Bernier, Birch, Brandt, Cousens, Cureatz, Davis, Dean, Eaton, Elgie, Eves, Fish, Gillies, Gordon, Gregory, Grossman, Harris, Havrot, Henderson, Hodgson, Johnson, J. ORDERS OF THE DAY

THRONE SPEECH DEBATE

Consideration of the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. Brandt moved, seconded by Mr. Eves, that an humble address be presented to the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows:

To the Honourable John Black Aird, an officer of the Order of Canada, one of Her Majesty's counsel learned in the law, Bachelor of Arts, Doctor of Laws, Lieutenant Governor of Ontario:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has addressed to us.

Mr. Brandt: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say how pleased and proud I am to have the honour to move adoption of the speech from the throne. I would also like to suggest that no member be allowed to leave his place until I have finished my remarks.

This marks the opening of the third session of the 32nd Parliament of Ontario and I am especially proud to be speaking as a member of the great Progressive Conservative Party of Ontario.

Over the past year, being a member of this government has allowed me to contribute to many worthwhile activities. For instance, in my capacity as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay), a gentleman I have great admiration for, I had the opportunity and was able to guide through the House changes to the Workmen's Compensation Act, an act which, for one thing, changed its name to the Workers' Compensation Act in order to reflect this government's recognition of the growing role of women in this province and the role those women are playing in our labour force.

The bill also increased Workers' Compensation Board benefits to help recipients cope with increases in the cost of living. As I recall the debate at that time, there was concern from a number of members on the opposition benches with respect to the level of increase that was being provided by this government. I am proud to say that if one looks at the levels of inflation at this time and the increases that were approved by the government one will note that the workers' compensation benefits are substantially above the present level of inflation.

I have also been honoured to represent the Minister of Labour and the ministry on many other occasions, both in public and in government activities—none that were paid for by the government, members will be pleased to know, other than when on occasion I did make the odd trip where I managed to quite accidentally bump into certain members of the other parties.

Mr. Roy: I was a member of a one-man task force.

Mr. Brandt: I have had the opportunity to participate in hearings on the standing committee on resources development as it studied the Weiler report's suggestions for ways to revamp the entire system of workers' compensation in Ontario. I think the members of the opposition will agree with me, at least in this one remark, that this is essential and critical legislation that we will be looking at very carefully in the weeks ahead.

I have also been part of the select committee on pensions and of the standing committee on administration of justice as it examined both the government's economic restraint package and the rent restraint bill.

As the member for Sarnia, I was able to introduce a bill establishing the City of Sarnia Foundation, which would receive, manage and use donations for charitable purposes in the Sarnia community. Sarnia was once almost a forgotten part of this great province but I believe, now that representation has changed, that forgotten part of the province is now being remembered.

As a member of the government under the leadership of our great Premier (Mr. Davis), I would like to bring to the attention of the members opposite the number of different ways in which the Sarnia area has been remembered.

Highway 402, which goes through the London area, as the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker) will know, and is so important to our community in the Sarnia area, was completed in 1982, not only on time and not only as promised, but within the budget limitations as set by the Minister of Transportation and Communications (Mr. Snow). That is certainly different from some other levels of government that I might point to on occasion that have great difficulty in keeping their budgets in line.

Our community has received $2.75 million from the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development for the Sarnia Bay marina project. We expect this project to act as a catalyst for more development, both private and public, for the Sarnia area and, more particularly, to attract new visitors to our area from the United States. A boost in tourism will naturally create more jobs in the related service industries.

A little more than a year ago, the Honourable

Lieutenant Governor of Ontario was in this chamber to deliver the speech from the throne for the second session of our 32nd Parliament. The Lieutenant Governor noted then that this House was meeting at a time when the people of this province were facing severe economic difficulties. These problems were not endemic to Ontario, but were being experienced throughout Canada and by all nations in the industrialized western world.

The speech from the throne made it clear that the top priority of this government would be to put Ontario on as positive an economic track as possible. This government has honoured that commitment. A courageous budget, an equitable restraint program and innovative job creation and economic stimulation policies have not only helped the people of Ontario through a prolonged severe international recession, not of our making, but have placed us in a position to take full advantage of current positive economic developments.

I say with justifiable pride that in Ontario these positive developments have been encouraged and assisted by the programs and policies of the Progressive Conservative government.

Ontario now faces a time of great opportunity and challenge. There are many positive indications that our economy is poised to make a sustained recovery. Business confidence, especially when one looks at a number of current conditions, has strengthened very considerably in the last few weeks and months. Lower mortgage rates have stimulated the housing market at both the national and provincial levels.

Mr. Martel: Oh, you'll take credit for that too, will you?

Mr. Brandt: Well, we were being blamed for it earlier.

Nationally, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. reports that housing starts in March translated into an annualized rate of 177,000 units for 1983, and I might add that this is considerably higher than the 150,000 to 155,000 housing starts that were originally forecast for this year.

In Ontario, housing sales are extremely encouraging. Last month the Toronto Real Estate Board reported that March 1983—thanks in great part to some of the stimulative measures taken by the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett)—was the third best sales month in the entire history of that board. As the board noted, buyers have expressed their confidence in the economic upturn by investing one third of a billion dollars in homes over that period.

The stimulative effect this recovery will have on the furniture, lumber and appliance industries can only be estimated but it will be very substantial. Depleted inventories and increased demand should contribute to a healthy turnaround in those sectors and ultimately strengthen employment opportunities as well.

All indications from the automotive industry suggest equally brisk expansion in 1983. Canadian exports of automotive products increased sharply in January from their late 1982 levels. The country's current trade surplus in vehicles approaches $5 billion, and the parts shortfall has recently narrowed to $3 billion. Reduced United States inventories of Canadian-made car models have been supporting the pace of auto exports and production.

The effect of this recovery is already being felt in Ontario. For example, General Motors has recently returned to double-shift operations at all of its assembly plants.

Mr. Nixon: Who wrote this?

Mr. Brandt: As a matter of fact I did, I would like to say to the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk.

The stronger output trend has been equally beneficial to the province's steel industry, where activity has begun to accelerate after a very disappointing year of operation in 1982.

Although there has been a marked and real improvement in the performance of our automotive industry, there remain a number of problems that threaten the long-term viability of that very important sector of our economy. The speech from the throne demonstrates that this government is not only aware of those problems but has committed itself to help solve them. The introduction of a quota system for imported cars and the introduction of Canadian content rules strike me as being practical and effective solutions to the difficulties that beset this industry. I am sure all members of this House join me in applauding this government's determination to press Ottawa for the creation of these safeguards to protect the Ontario industry and Ontario jobs.

Mr. Conway: Where do you stand on the Lada?

Mr. Boudria: Does Jim Taylor still drive a Lada?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cousens): Order.

Mr. Brandt: I will see if I have time to tag it on to the end of this one; I know the speech well.

In the longer term, I think the idea that all imports of automobiles into the Canadian market should be governed by the same requirements as those set out in the Canada-US auto pact should be adopted by the federal government. I hope Ottawa will respond positively to Ontario's suggestions and recommendations with respect to the automotive industry.

Interest rates have dropped dramatically from the stratospheric heights to which they had been boosted by the policies of the federal government. At times it appeared that the federal Liberal government was unaware of the devastating impact high interest rates had on consumer purchases. People simply stopped buying and they are still proceeding only with great caution and uncertainty when it comes to major purchases. Fortunately this trend has reversed to some extent over the past couple of months, but only after causing considerable damage to our industries and considerable hardship for our people.

Lower interest rates cannot be anything but good news to manufacturers and consumers. Consumers will be encouraged to make purchases, particularly of big-ticket items, which they have postponed because of those high rates. Increased consumer buying will deplete already low inventories. Certainly the liquidation of business inventories represents a real opportunity for economic growth in 1983. More than $8.5 billion in stockpiled merchandise was siphoned off in 1982, sometimes at the expense of unemployed workers who remained inactive while inventories were reduced, but now the cupboard is bare in many retail outlets and that bodes well for accelerated employment and production.

Another factor that points to a recovery is the significant decline in the rate of inflation. In 1981 and 1982 the consumer price index grew at rates of 12.5 per cent and 10.8 per cent respectively. By 1983, on a year-over-year basis, the inflation rate had dropped to the six per cent to seven per cent range. This moderation in the rate of inflation will increase the spending power of consumers throughout Ontario.

Already there are signs of increasing consumer confidence. Statistics Canada reported that Ontario's retail sales in February had increased by 7.5 per cent, one of the highest of any province in the entire country.

All the elements necessary for an economic recovery appear to be in place. It is up to us to bring together and build on those elements. If we are to take full advantage of the opportunities offered to us, as the government we must do two things. First of all, we must design and implement policies that will enable us to exploit positive economic developments for the immediate good of the province. At the same time, however, these policies must not have the unintended effect of stifling those very sectors on which our recovery is being built.

We in this Legislature have the opportunity to make a real contribution to economic recovery by supporting legislation and programs that will enhance and speed the improvement of economic conditions. It has been the practice of this government in the past to constructively participate, as opposed to destructively interfere, in the economy of the province. We must continue this approach and act only in those areas where support or stimulation is required—in other words, in a very selective way. We must not compromise the opportunities before us.

The programs outlined in the throne speech prove that this government intends to continue its constructive participation in the economy of the province. The three-part program in particular represents a constructive response to the economic realities of the day.

The second thing we must do is to maintain a feeling of optimism and confidence both in this House and in the province at large. The world recession has created what is a crisis of confidence in the minds of many. It has made many of us fear the future and lose faith in our abilities because of the economic uncertainties that are all around us. This loss of confidence paralyses the will to act, to take risks, to invest and to persevere.

Just as important as the economic aspects of any recovery will be the recovery of our self-confidence, which I believe we need very desperately in this very difficult age. Indeed, we may not attain the former unless we at first achieve the latter. We must remember that we do not get the plum unless we have the courage to shake the tree. With this throne speech this government demonstrates that it is looking to Ontario's future with confidence and optimism, something that I wish was shared to a greater extent by some of the members opposite.

Interjections.

Mr. Brandt: Pessimists; purveyors of doom and gloom.

I share that sense of confidence in our strength and abilities, and optimism in our future. That is not to say that I do not on rare occasions experience moments of doubt when I question the ability of our province to successfully meet the many challenges that await us.

However, I have never fallen into the depths of despair and timidity that appear to be the natural habitat of many of the members opposite. Their unshakeable conviction that the sky over Ontario is falling is really exaggeration in the extreme. The gloom which emanates from that part of the House is nearly impenetrable. The entire area over there reminds me of a large black cloud that is constantly hovering above their heads.

I do not think the negativism of the opposition parties is in any way an accurate reflection of the mood or the spirit of the people of Ontario. Rather, I believe Ontarians have confidence in themselves and in the government of which I am proud to be a part.

I appreciate that one of the tasks of the members opposite is to attempt to convince first themselves and then anyone who will listen that the people of this province do not have confidence in this government.

I recall an advertisement sponsored by the Liberal Party of Ontario during the last general election. Other members may remember that particular advertisement as well. The video part of the ad showed a suitcase being snapped shut and labelled with stickers bearing the names of destinations to the west of Ontario. I am sure some of the members opposite recall that sparkling ad with great clarity.

Meanwhile, the voice-over was intoning that every 17 minutes somebody left Ontario. The ad made a particular point of telling us that many of these people were young people. The ad, I believe, concluded with some suggestion like, "What will your kids be doing 17 minutes from now?"

The intent and implication of the advertisement was quite obvious. The effectiveness of the ad and the rest of the campaign is evident in the seating arrangements in this House.

Mr. Nixon: More people voted against you than voted for you.

Mr. Brandt: Far more people voted against my friend and his collective cohorts, if I may suggest that.

Canadians have always moved within the federation in search of greater economic opportunity and for other reasons which, while they may have nothing to do with money, are of considerable importance to the individual's self-fulfilment.

Many Canadians exercise their mobility rights. Many who do exercise these rights come to Ontario. I believe the immediate past leader of the official opposition came to Ontario from Quebec. In fact, I think the family of the current leader migrated some time ago from western Canada to Ontario. I would venture to say that in each case, aside from their rather unfortunate choice in politics, each of these gentlemen has prospered here in Ontario.

Mr. Conway: You've been on both sides of the fence.

Mr. Brandt: That is why I am over here, because I have seen what the other side of the fence looks like.

Leaving that aside—I ask my friends to listen carefully to this, because I am going to return to the Liberals' 1981 theme; I think it is quite valid in the context of this debate—it is apparent that the Liberal Party was attempting to link the fact that Ontario had a net migratory deficit in 1981 to its claim that this government had mishandled the affairs of this province and had consequently reduced opportunities for its people. I believe that was the story they were attempting to tell in that fine ad they put on.

I will speak slowly so members opposite can follow this. If a migratory deficit can be taken as proof of mismanagement, then following the official opposition's reasoning, surplus should be taken as proof of good management. Would the reverse not hold? I expect that members opposite will be saddened to learn that in 1982 Ontario experienced a net interprovincial migration surplus of almost 3,500 people. So much for those great suitcase ads. Even during the 1981 campaign, I must confess that I found the Liberals' ad somewhat puzzling.

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Brandt: One of the provinces whose name appeared on the suitcase, supposedly a prime destination in this mass exodus, was Alberta.

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: Order. The honourable members are interjecting far too much.

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker: The Speaker is losing patience.

Mr. Brandt: In that ad campaign I believe one of the destinations being suggested by the opposition party was the province of Alberta. I would like to say that Alberta has two things to recommend it. First, they have oil, of which we would dearly love to have a larger supply here in our own province. But they also have a strong Progressive Conservative government, I might add. Those people who for whatever reason did leave Ontario went to a province that was also being served by a Progressive Conservative government.

There was another province which received mention on the side of the Liberal suitcase that was used in those infamous advertisements; it happened to be the province of Saskatchewan. I need not remind this House that the good people of Saskatchewan have recently elected a Progressive Conservative government as well. It seems that when the people of any province want sound, responsible management of public affairs, they turn to a Progressive Conservative Party.

Of course I am certain the Liberals would have preferred to have been able to put the names of provinces governed by the Liberal Party on their suitcase. However, that is just not possible in this day and age since there are no provincial Liberal governments anywhere across this great country of ours. That is the truth. I was hesitant in bringing it up, but I felt compelled to bring it up because of some of the questions that were asked across the way.

I would also like to point out to the members of the official opposition that since the member for Brampton (Mr. Davis) entered the cabinet, the Ontario Liberal Party has changed leaders on the average of once every 3.3 years. I would like then to ask them what their current leader will be doing 17 months from now, because that is the average tenure for a leader in their particular party.

This year this House reconvenes at a pivotal moment in the history of our province. All around us technological, economic and social changes are occurring at an incredible and at times bewildering rate. Ultimately these changes will affect every area of our lives—how we work, the type of work we will be doing, how our children are educated, how we will use our leisure time and where we will live.

Interjection.

Mr. Brandt: It ties in very directly if the member will listen carefully, I am sure.

To ensure a complete understanding of the nature of these changes and their impact on our society, this government intends to undertake an extensive and serious study of major projected developments. Knowledge gained from this study will ensure that we will be able to respond pragmatically and effectively to what may well prove to be a fundamental restructuring of our society as we know it today.

The way in which we respond to these changes and their impact on our social and economic lives will determine the type and nature of our society in the future. To manage these forces of change in a manner which will best serve and further the public interest will require imagination, flexibility and courage. The record of this government indicates it will be more than able to meet this challenge.

It is often said about government that as an institution it possesses the pivotal role in bringing together society's conflicting interests. Speaking personally, I see the role of government as one of mediation between opposing social forces; to improve the relationship between business and labour, between consumer and producer, landlord and tenant. Increasingly in our society, government has come to mean more to the citizens it serves. Today, in addition to its role as arbitrator of competing forces, government is being asked to accept the role of co-ordinator of harmonious interests. I staunchly defend an economic system that follows the principles of a free enterprise market, but I also recognize the importance of government as an institution of conciliation, of strategic planning and leadership.

In Ontario, as an example, the government's Board of Industrial Leadership and Development strategy is a perfect illustration of this new, evolving role of government. To date, 77 projects have been approved by BILD, part of the five-year, $1.5-billion program of new reindustrialization in this province.

First and foremost, BILD is a long-term plan, but in the past year alone 40,000 short-term jobs were created by BILD initiatives. Equally important, BILD is a multifaceted approach to preparing Ontario for the 1980s. If we exclude electrification projects and highway improvements, more than half of all BILD initiatives include private sector funding. In total, the private sector has committed more than $330 million to the BILD strategy, and support from the federal and municipal governments exceeds $120 million to date.

Mr. Conway: Was Morley Rosenberg part of BILD?

Mr. Brandt: Not the last time I looked.

Most important, BILD helps people in a very practical and very sensible way. Just ask the people of Sarnia, who will benefit enormously from the Sarnia Bay project, what they think of the BILD initiatives; or the citizens of Point

Edward, who will have an expanded arena, a project that will also enjoy BILD support.

In short, the BILD strategy is a timely addition to the economic priorities of this decade. On the one hand, it will help co-ordinate, primarily with the private sector, a growth-oriented approach to the Ontario economy—something that some of the members opposite would not understand. Witness the investment in technological expertise, in job training, transportation and electrical infrastructure.

But, on the other hand, BILD will bring communities together. It is very much a human approach to economic co-ordination. It is an approach that already has significantly improved the quality of life in my constituency and indeed in many constituencies right across the province. It is my belief that economic recovery in the future will belong to imaginative people who can come up with imaginative programs like the BILD initiatives taken by this government.

This government's plan to develop internationally competitive, world-class industries in Ontario will ensure that the future will belong to the people of this province. This may well prove to be the most significant and important program announced in the speech from the throne. This government recognizes it is essential that all our business enterprises be on top of technological innovation if they are to find inventive ways of reducing operating costs, increasing productivity, creating competitive products and achieving higher profitability.

If our firms do not modernize their production processes, if our industries fail to join the technological revolution that is sweeping the industrial world, they will be left far behind. It is the obligation and the responsibility of this province to see that this does not happen. Canadian businesses, particularly those in manufacturing, are facing the greatest productivity challenge since Confederation.

5:30 p.m.

Large segments of our manufacturing base are facing economic hardships, not to mention the possibility of elimination, due to an intense wave of international competition. The domestic tariff barriers which largely kept the Canadian market for Canadian-based manufacturers are currently being lowered by approximately 50 per cent as a result of recent General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations.

Many of our manufacturers use outdated, uncompetitive manufacturing tools and equipment. This is in stark contrast to their foreign-based competitors, predominantly in the United States, Japan and West Germany, which have invested heavily in modern computer-aided design and computer-aided manufacturing equipment, robotics and microelectronics.

As a result of all of this, foreign manufacturers are increasingly more efficient than their Canadian-based competitors and can sell higher quality goods in many instances at lower prices in both Canada and throughout the world. To assist our companies to effectively compete and survive in increasingly competitive domestic and international markets, BILD has taken steps to help our firms keep pace with technological innovation.

Our technology centres are focusing on the needs of smaller firms in specific sectors. Their primary purpose is to advise and assist small and medium-sized firms to apply the latest technologies to their operations. This confidence in the adaptability of smaller enterprises is well founded. Studies have shown that smaller firms are substantially more innovative compared to larger enterprises. Small businesses form the backbone of the economy of Ontario. They are by far the principal source of new jobs in this great province of ours.

A 1979 study conducted by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business found that Canadian manufacturing companies with fewer than 20 employees created jobs at 20 times the pace of larger companies. There are more than 240,000 small firms in Ontario, of which 14,000 are manufacturers and the remainder are service companies, retailers and technological enterprises.

Our government's policies and those policies which were reinforced in the throne speech are intended to stimulate entrepreneurial talent in order to take advantage of the opportunities offered by new technologies. The auto parts industry, for example, is dominated by small manufacturers requiring assistance to reduce process costs, to improve plant layout and product quality, and to resolve design problems for products and manufacturing processes in order to compete with the Japanese challenge of a high-quality, low-cost automobile.

For this reason Ontario established an auto parts technology centre in St. Catharines. The focus of that centre is to provide programs which will ensure, firstly, sustained productivity improvement; secondly, world-competitive quality; thirdly, timely delivery of parts; and, finally, product innovation. These four factors will be the keys to success for Canadian parts manufacturers in the new competitive environment we are going to face in the decade ahead. The centre will assist manufacturers in finding and implementing the managerial, manufacturing and product technology necessary to meet these factors for success.

In addition, the centre will help parts companies to identify and to capitalize on opportunities for diversification into related industries. That is the kind of government intervention that creates meaningful, long-term jobs. There are tremendous opportunities for converting many manufacturing and industrial facilities to using new technologies that are available today. One of our government's objectives is to work closely with small and medium-sized firms on identifying the needed changes in their operations and to assist them through this difficult conversion period.

The microelectronics centre in Ottawa, the CAD/CAM centre in Cambridge—home of the great Hornets hockey club that just brought back the Allan Cup for the fourth time in 14 years as I recall—and the robotics centre in Peterborough are currently in the position to demonstrate how these new technologies will affect productivity and profitability. All were initiatives of the government of which I am proud to be part. There is no doubt in my mind that these technology centres will be instrumental in facilitating the plant modernization and product innovation of small businesses in this province.

I might add for the benefit of some of the members of the third party that is where some of the new jobs are going to come from in the decade ahead, as a result of the initiatives and as a result of this kind of proper thinking taken by the government I represent on this side of the House.

The technology centres are but one example of how Ontario continues to demonstrate its leadership and fulfil its commitment to strategic planning and a more prosperous future for the people of this province.

During this session we will no doubt have a number of opportunities to discuss the issues of job creation and the problems of the unemployed. The topics of jobs and joblessness will still be important even as we head out of the present recession.

In the last session of this Parliament, the government undertook a number of immediate measures to create jobs. Those measures were intended to deliver jobs to those groups, regions and sectors of our province where they would do the most good and in a way which would produce the greatest impact per dollar spent.

Mr. Stokes: What about those one-industry towns in the north?

Mr. Brandt: I am going to mention those shortly.

Since those new programs were introduced, the number of jobs created actually exceeded the expected level, and the final count is not even in yet. In other words, the number we are going to reach is greater than we told the members.

All of us will remember that last May the government allocated an additional $171 million to create about 31,000 short-term jobs. We have been honest with the people of Ontario. We have told them these are short-term jobs to get over the immediate problem the economy is facing now. I might add we do not suggest, as members of the third party do so frequently, that one can simply legislate jobs into existence because one wills it so. It simply is not that easy. One has to work at it and one has to work at it in the way the programs of this government have been laid out for the members to look at.

I can tell the members that most, if not all, of these programs were very successful, such as the Ontario employment incentive program which funded some 8,000 jobs in many municipalities across Ontario, about 900 more jobs than anticipated. In being honest with the members, we always reduce the target somewhat so we can exceed it and so they will applaud our efforts, but still they do not applaud our efforts.

I am sure all of us have constituents who have benefited from the many programs this government has brought into being. To my mind, the most successful programs, such as the ones I have just mentioned, were those which did their job in the fastest possible time with the least amount of red tape and bureaucracy.

Another of the efficient programs whose popularity greatly exceeded expectations was the farmstead improvement program which created over four times the expected number of jobs and for which the Ministry of Agriculture and Food granted additional funding to keep up with the large demand.

But even with these measures in place, we all remember unemployment rates continued to increase until the start of this year. To create further jobs, Ontario and Canada each contributed $100 million to the Canada-Ontario employment development program, COED. As well, our government agreed to spend an additional $50 million to create 7,500 jobs co-ordinated through BILD. The COED program was established in particular to provide jobs for those who had exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits. It is currently well under way, providing employers and municipalities with opportunities to speed up and complete many worthwhile projects. For example, in my own municipality a number of projects have already been approved, ranging from a pollution study of storm sewers to additional programs for mentally, physically and emotionally handicapped children and for restoration work at one of our homes for the aged in the municipality of Sarnia.

The speech from the throne leaves no doubt that the creation of new employment opportunities for our citizens will continue to be the top priority of this government. There is also no question of this government's intention to continue to assist those of our citizens who require help in the job market. As noted in the throne speech, the recovery and the increased job opportunities that will result from it will centre mainly on the private sector.

It is my view, shared by most of the members on the government side, that the most effective job creation programs are those fiscal and development policies that will enhance investor confidence, encourage capital formation and stimulate growth in the private sector. Given that the private sector in Ontario over the last decade has generated well over 80 per cent of new permanent jobs, this approach appears to be a sane and sensible one on the part of this government.

In closing, in order to allow my colleague an opportunity to make a few very important remarks, I want to add that I listened very carefully to some of the suggestions offered by some of the members across the way. Part of the program for recovery that I hear so often is simply to spend more money, increase the deficit and, by so doing, increase the number of jobs that might be available to the citizens of Ontario.

Let me share with members a concern I have about taking that particular method of recovery on the part of this government. If it could be done as simplistically as that, simply by increasing the deficit, by spending more money and throwing it against the problems the unemployed have today, I want to tell members there would not be a poor country in the entire world, because they would simply continue to spend, to increase their deficits, and there would be a brighter day tomorrow. That is the fallacy of socialism. It simply does not work in the real world. That is why the policies and the directions and the objectives suggested by the third party in particular, and I might add quite often by the official opposition and its cohorts in Ottawa, will not work in this country and will not work in Ontario.

I am proud to represent this government and to move the throne speech on behalf of the members of this party and on behalf of the government of Ontario.

Interjection.

Mr. Eves: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if you would control the member for Cochrane North (Mr. Piché). He is eating into my time.

Having heard the remarks from the member for Sarnia—

Interjection.

Mr. Eves: Mr. Speaker, is it too late to change my mind? The member for Sarnia is always a tough act to follow.

Mr. Kerrio: Not this time.

Mr. Eves: Of course, I am always impressed by anyone who had a majority in the double digits.

Interjection.

Mr. Eves: Is that right? I did not know there were such people.

Mr. Brandt: It was an easy riding. It was a Liberal riding.

Mr. Eves: It is with great pleasure that I second the motion of my colleague the member for Sarnia that this Legislature accept the proposals set out in the government's throne speech. I know our Liberal colleagues opposite take a rather cynical view of throne speeches but that is hardly surprising, seeing as how their brethren in Ottawa have introduced only one since 1980. But in spite of opposition criticism our throne speech proposals are sound proposals. They are responsible suggestions, suggestions that are right for Ontario and right for the times.

It is true that our province has suffered along with the rest of the western world from the worst economic slowdown in over 50 years; no one is denying that, nor is anyone denying the seriousness of the plight of the unemployed. But our support systems are in place in Ontario and they are working. Ontario, in co-operation with other levels of government and by herself, is helping to provide meaningful work for the unemployed. Equally impressive is the fact that all of this was accomplished within a framework of financial and fiscal restraint.

Mr. McClellan: What is the unemployment rate in Parry Sound?

Mr. Eves: Maybe a little bit less than yours, sir.

Following a policy of restraint and responsible management has kept our province from the disastrous economic pitfalls stumbled into by other jurisdictions. We have only to look to our sister province of Quebec and, indeed, to the federal government for those examples. We do not face a staggering uncontrolled deficit, as does Ottawa, a deficit that we have now learned will perhaps run to over $31 billion this year if Marc Lalonde's recent leak can be believed.

In Ontario, our policy of restraint has helped us to weather those economic storms far more successfully than most other jurisdictions while still allowing us the leeway to hold out a hand to those Ontarians who have been hardest hit by economic conditions. This should be especially gratifying to my New Democratic Party colleagues who are quick to proclaim themselves the saviours of the socially disadvantaged. They have the only answers. These are the same NDP members who did everything in their power to block passage of our restraint legislation last session.

Our fiscal responsibility has given us a firm basis for future optimism. The economy is beginning to turn around and, as the throne speech indicates, our government will be doing all it can to help assist that recovery.

My colleague the member for Sarnia has taken a look at the overall picture, where our government's programs and policies have led and are leading the province. I would like to change the focus of this discussion and look at some of the individual projects and programs that are going on in various ridings across the province. Looking at our policies in this context is particularly appropriate, I think, because the story of economic hardship and recovery is one of real individuals and real communities pulling together.

Let us start with job creation, because that is one of the most important areas we have had to tackle during the past year. As the member for Sarnia has pointed out, the government's record in this area is more than impressive. The $176-million job creation package of the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) from the last budget far exceeded all expectations, with over 40,000 new jobs now being created. Since then ventures such as the Canada-Ontario employment development program have also proven effective in sending our people back to work.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson) was recently quoted as saying that the COED program has achieved very little. That kind of distortion serves only to weaken the credibility of the Liberal Party in Ontario. In fact, to date some 14,000 jobs have been created by some 1,700 approved projects.

Let me give members a few examples of the success of this program, starting naturally with my own riding. In Parry Sound—

Mr. Stokes: Is that in northern Ontario?

Mr. Eves: It certainly is, since 1977.

All 34 organized municipalities in my riding have received COED funding for job creation programs. The projects being carried out will help improve the quality of life in various communities. The township of Bonfield will be building a community centre with the help of the assistance it received; a new firehall will be built in the town of Parry Sound; McKellar township will eliminate safety hazards on various township roads; the village of South River will use grant money to help pay for renovations for a senior citizens' complex.

But they are not just limited to my riding or to government members' ridings. As a matter of fact I have personally assisted two projects that have recently been funded in the riding of the member for Renfrew North (Mr. Conway).

Interjections.

5:50 p.m.

Mr. Eves: A private sector project in the riding of my colleague the member for Sudbury (Mr. Gordon) will convert a fire-damaged building to a senior citizens' residence. Government funding for this project is over $200,000 and 25 full-time and part-time staff will be employed at the home after 35 construction workers have completed the conversion. I think that brings the total jobs created in his region to over 400.

Of municipal proposals, the riding of the member for Brantford (Mr. Gillies) recently had 14 projects approved for over $1.5 million which will provide 87 jobs in his riding, one of those areas of our province, few and far between as they may be, among the opposition benches. In the riding of the member for St. Catharines (Mr. Bradley), for example, the regional municipality of Niagara has received approval for six projects for over $3 million, creating 95 jobs; and in Windsor there are 28 projects for a total value of $2.2 million, creating 194 new jobs.

I could go on at much greater length but I think the message is clear. Not even the most negative member of the opposition benches could dispute the merits of the Canada-Ontario employment development program or the good that will result to these communities and the people throughout our province.

I could talk at great length about another important job creation program in the northern areas of our province, the Canada-Ontario job creation program sponsored by our own Ministry of Natural Resources and the federal government. Since February of last year, this program has seen our province contribute over $18 million to create 80,000 weeks of work for 5,600 laid-off workers in the resource sector of our economy.

Equally encouraging is the employment incentive program of the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett) which opened more than 8,000 new jobs in over 700 municipalities. I could list dozens of other initiatives. I could mention the renter-buy program, which has seen over 85 applications in my riding alone and which economists believe will create almost 40,000 man-years of work in construction and related trades across the province.

Impressive as these figures may be, I know the opposition will argue that these are temporary job creation measures, that they do not solve long-term economic problems and that we need long-term solutions. That kind of opposition response, although predictable, surprises me a little because when we get past the rhetoric the opposition is entirely bankrupt of ideas and has no positive alternative to offer.

On the other hand, I can offer a host of illustrations of our government's activities to create new long-term opportunities for businesses and individuals throughout our province. Obviously the biggest part of our long-term economic strategy is the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development program.

I would like to take a moment or two to highlight some of the smaller community-oriented projects which will prove just as important in our economic development. BILD projects to improve conditions at the Sarnia Bay marina, already alluded to by my friend; the Wye-Heritage Marina in Midland, which actually does exist, which will help bring new tourist dollars to these areas; as will the creation of the Cray Park marina in Peterborough, a project carried out with the help of $1.7-million BILD grant. Just think of the construction jobs that these projects will create, not to mention the economic boost they will provide their communities. These benefits will certainly be long-term.

BILD is also promoting the development and expansion of industries all over Ontario. In the riding of the member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. G. I. Miller), the Norfolk Fruit Growers' Association of Simcoe received $150,000 from BILD to finish a new apple packing line. By 1986, the association believes that this expansion will help them replace imports and increase exports for a total value of $6.5 million.

In the riding of the member for Etobicoke (Mr. Philip), the Farmers' Market at the Ontario Food Terminal has been expanded with the help of a $2-million BILD program to house 150 new stalls. This means more local farmers can sell directly to Toronto food and produce retailers. Obviously, the BILD program creates many jobs in many areas, a fact which I know every opposition member will appreciate.

BILD is not alone in its efforts, however. There are all kinds of other programs to help our businesses and industries get off the ground, expand and diversify. This kind of support is especially important in the north. The northern Ontario rural development agreement is helping to support and expand promising ventures in northern Ontario. In my riding alone, over $1 million in NORDA funding has been approved—for 13 ventures recently in the Parry Sound area alone for over $800,000.

The same can be said of our government's many other business support programs, such as the Northern Ontario Development Corp., Eastern Ontario Development Corp., the federal-provincial eastern Ontario subsidiary agreement. These encourage some flourishing businesses in the communities east of the Metropolitan Toronto border. Over the past two years $375,000 in provincial funding has gone to the riding of the member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. J. A. Taylor), to name just one example.

In my own riding I can sense a feeling of optimism and confidence in the future. Businesses and individuals are talking about economic growth and diversification, about making the most of our resources and about increasing our competitive edge.

Just let me use my own riding as an example of what can be accomplished, even during difficult economic times, with a positive attitude. The economic development commission, a fairly new idea for attracting new businesses in the west Parry Sound area of the riding, has proven extremely successful. They now have one in Mattawa, and on the east side of the riding as well.

The work of the EDC has brought to our region an electronics firm from California, a transportation firm, a whitewater rafting project on the Magnetawan River. Many of our established firms are proving themselves more than equal to the task of developing new opportunities, even during difficult times.

One of the most recent innovations to hit the boating industry is the new hydraulic trailer made by Stanley Machine of Parry Sound. This device is revolutionizing the work of hauling boats, lifting them in and out of the water, allowing one man to do the work of loading or unloading boats of up to 20 tons.

On the subject of boats, let me point out that Canada 1, the yacht now being prepared for this fall's America's Cup, was built in Parry Sound.

Mr. Martel: Is that part of the BILD program?

Mr. Eves: Certainly.

Again though, let me show members another approach; the cynical, pessimistic attitude often displayed by our opposition counterparts. The NDP member for Scarborough West (Mr. R. F. Johnston) indicates in a recent story that Canadians have been deceived into believing there is a recovery. He calls this a cruel hoax and says if anything things are getting worse, not better. The evidence of improving attitudes and conditions in my own riding is enough to disprove that pessimistic evaluation and all we have to do is look at the facts.

What about the recall of the 11,000 workers in

Sudbury recently? What about the fact that only 3.4 per cent of Chrysler's workers are now on an indefinite layoff, compared to 39 per cent

What about the recall of the 11,000 workers in Sudbury recently? What about the fact that only 3.4 per cent of Chrysler's workers are now on an indefinite layoff, compared to 39 per cent in the United States?

I could quote a recent Globe and Mail article entitled "Promising Economy Remains In Rebuilding Stage." I could cite the fact that Canada's inflation rate has hit a new four-year low of 7.2 per cent. I could tell members the prime rate yesterday was cut to 11 per cent by all major chartered banks across Canada.

I can tell members in no uncertain terms that a belief in our government, its proposals and its leadership is one important reason so many of our communities continue to be optimistic and plan for the future in the face of current economic problems. They know the economy is turning around. They have faith in Ontario's future; they have faith in this government and in its leadership.

The Deputy Speaker: I am wondering if at this time the member for Parry Sound would like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Eves: I have concluded my remarks, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

On motion by Ms. Copps, the debate was adjourned.

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Thursday, April 21, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

CONSTITUTIONAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that the government of this province will introduce in the near future a resolution to authorize, from Ontario's standpoint, an amendment of the Canadian Constitution regarding property rights.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am always prepared to share, as long as members opposite, who always love to share a credit, will also share in the responsibility.

Mr. Bradley: You are the last one to lecture on that—you and the feds.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Listen, the feds are your party. Do not try to dissociate yourself from your federal brethren. Do not try to do it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Interjections

Mr. Speaker: Now are we quite finished? Statements by the ministry.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have to ask you, Mr. Speaker, in terms of credit, who will be there when the courthouse is open, who was there at the sod turning?

Mr. Bradley: The member for St. Catharines.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, come on, who are you kidding?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member is a Tory when I am in his riding.

Mr. Bradley: That is the worst insult I have ever had.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Interjections

Mr. Speaker: Statements by the ministry. The Premier.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was interrupted, Mr. Speaker. I apologize.

The resolution will propose an amendment to section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms so as to include a right to enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Last month the first ministers met with native leaders in Ottawa to discuss aboriginal rights. Ministers and officials had earlier reviewed the resolution on entrenched property rights which passed unanimously in the British Columbia Legislature, and it was planned that the first ministers would consider the issue during their informal sessions in March.

Although agreement was not reached at that time, Ontario believes that the opportunity offered by the BC resolution should not be allowed to slip by. If within two and a half years Parliament and seven provincial legislatures with at least 50 per cent of the population pass similar resolutions, we will have entrenched property rights.

Interest in entrenched property rights is not new to either Canada or to this province. The protection of property rights has always been a feature of Canadian common law. In 1960 this tradition was expressed in statutory law. The Canadian Bill of Rights includes, as a human right and fundamental freedom, the words "enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law."

The Canadian Bill of Rights was introduced and led through the House of Commons by that great Canadian, John George Diefenbaker. I expect the benches opposite to applaud.

Mr. Kerrio: He flew it with the Arrow.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, the Arrow did fly. It did not fly long enough for my purposes.

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I had to fight an election on the Avro Arrow. I thought it was grossly unfair.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think we should recall the history. With all due respect to the member for Waterloo North (Mr. Epp), I want to remind members of a little of the history.

In the draft Charter of Rights and Freedoms of July 1980, section 7 included a reference to property rights. By August 1980 the federal government had removed the enjoyment of property from the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in response to concern from some of the sister provinces, primarily Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island, which felt that such provisions could adversely affect their existing legislation respecting land ownership.

On January 23, 1981, during the deliberations of the joint Senate-House of Commons committee on the Constitution, Perrin Beatty of the Progressive Conservative Party moved an amendment to section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to add "enjoyment of property." He was assured of government support for the amendment by the acting Minister of Justice at that time, Mr. Kaplan.

On January 26, 1981, the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien, appeared before the committee and withdrew the government support of the amendment, citing the opposition of many provinces. He also stated that Mr. Kaplan's consent was the result of a misunderstanding. I am not quarrelling with that. I think that is factually correct.

On January 27, 1981 the Progressive Conservative amendment in favour of property rights was voted down by the committee by a vote of 15 to eight. It is generally understood that this vote reflected the desire of the federal government to set this issue aside in the pursuit of a broader consensus among provinces and in Parliament. However, members will note that the Prime Minister has very recently reiterated his earlier willingness to see such a provision entrenched.

The reservations of some provinces have centred on the perceived limitation that such an entrenched guarantee would place on provincial responsibilities such as agricultural lands policy and expropriations. These are but two examples. It is our belief there will still be room for such important legislation. I do not think anyone wishes to intervene, say, in Prince Edward Island, in terms of how it perceives its land policies. It is a relatively small amount of real estate, and we are sympathetic to the concerns of that government that the land does not disappear into ownership in other places. As a result, my government will want to hear and discuss various positions on the implications that our resolution might have.

Members here will know—I know the member for Waterloo North in particular knows this—that this province has supported the inclusion of property rights in our Constitution since 1980. It was part of our position. The member reviewed it carefully, so I know he is aware that was the position of the government. Because this principle is one of our fundamental freedoms, such as liberty or the security of the person, it is our intent, as I previously noted, to proceed with a resolution to have property rights included in section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The charter aptly entrenches so much of what, by tradition, it has meant to be Canadian. Accordingly, it is very appropriate that the first two amendments, if this does carry in our sister provinces, to our new Constitution considered by this Legislature should be the recognition of the collective rights of aboriginal peoples and the individual right to enjoyment of property.

BUDGET

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the House that I will present my budget on May 10 in the afternoon.

ONTARIO COMMISSION ON TRUCK SAFETY

Hon. Mr. Snow: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to table this afternoon the recently completed report of the Ontario Commission on Truck Safety.

It is almost exactly 18 months to the day since I announced in this House the appointment of Dr. Robert Uffen of Queen's University to carry out this independent study of truck safety on Ontario's roads. His mandate was sufficiently broad to allow him to investigate all noneconomic matters pertaining to truck safety, including driver standards, vehicle standards and specifications, rules of the road, enforcement and sanctions, as well as public and industry perceptions and expectations.

When Dr. Uffen reported to me two weeks ago that he had completed his report, I felt it should be brought to public attention as quickly as possible. I assure members that the copies are, as they say, hot off the press. In fact, they were received from the printer just within the last hour or so.

Although I have not had an opportunity to evaluate its content in detail, I can say that my initial reaction to both his report to me and his written text is that he has made a very comprehensive, thorough and detailed investigation of his subject.

To accomplish this, he held nine public hearings, seven of them two-day sessions, in major centres across the province. Between the presentations made at these hearings and those sent directly to him, Dr. Uffen studied more than 80 briefs in addition to holding private interviews and considering the comments of interested groups from the industry and the general public.

As well, he arranged for a demonstration of the controversial overlength trucks. During the course of the demonstration he both rode in the cabs of these trucks and observed their operation on the highway and in traffic.

I point out these items only because I would like to emphasize that Dr. Uffen went to considerable lengths to accommodate the presentation of views from various levels of government, the industry and the public.

As a result of his intensive investigation, Dr. Uffen came up with a total of 61 recommendations. However, in the interest of highlighting the most important, he chose and expanded on what he considers the nine principal recommendations. A number of these pertain directly to the truck driver, his training, licensing, medical condition and driving habits. In addition, he highlights speed limits and following distances as well as a ring road for Metro Toronto, accident investigation procedures and overlength vehicles.

In outlining these nine principal recommendations, Dr. Uffen prefaced his comments with a statement which points out that most of the evidence indicates the major problem lies with human behaviour.

At this time I do not propose to elaborate any further on the report other than to say that Dr. Uffen will be meeting with the press this afternoon at 3:30 in the media studio to outline and comment on his report.

I believe that Dr. Uffen is with us today in the gallery. I thank you, Dr. Uffen, for being here with us.

In closing, I would like to say that his report adds a great deal to our knowledge and perceptions of truck safety. It also, in its thoroughness, calls for an in-depth study of the recommendations and possible implications. This will begin as soon as possible, and I propose to report back in due course when I have some concrete proposals to make in response to these recommendations. In the meantime, because this is a very important topic to a great many people, I will welcome any comments on the contents of the report from the public.

SERVICES FOR PRINT-HANDICAPPED STUDENTS

Hon. Miss Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, further to the commitment made by my colleague the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch) that services such as those provided by the audio library at Trent will continue, I am pleased to announce, on behalf of the social policy field ministers, a plan for continuing the provision of Braille and audio textbook and reference material transcription services for Ontario's print-handicapped post-secondary students.

The W. Ross Macdonald School in Brantford has been designated as the provincial co-ordinating agency for Braille and audio educational materials production and dissemination. This includes educational materials for kindergarten to grade 13 and the post-secondary services which are the subject of my comments today.

The school will work closely with post-secondary institutions and with the agencies currently involved with Braille and audio transcription. These agencies, which include the audio library service at Trent University, the national library at the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, PAL Reading Services Inc. and the Braille Centre at the University of Western Ontario, have agreed to participate in such an arrangement.

The W. Ross Macdonald School will receive requests from post-secondary institutions on behalf of print-handicapped students, will search sources for previously transcribed materials and will arrange for transcription as required. Transcriptions will be done as part of an annual contract arrangement with the previously noted transcription services.

An advisory committee, with representation from the community college and university sectors, the service providers and users, will assist the W. Ross Macdonald School in considering program policy, standard formats and future directions for the service.

Community colleges and universities should continue to facilitate the provision of day-to-day educational materials for print-handicapped students in their institutions. Such materials may include class handouts, examinations and short reference articles.

For the next three to four months, until the W. Ross Macdonald School has developed fully its co-ordinating role, I have requested that all of the transcription services continue to work with students' requests as they have in the past. Funds will be provided directly to these agencies in the interim period to continue their services to post-secondary students.

I should like to draw the attention of the members of the Legislature the enormous contribution made by hundreds of Ontario's citizens to the education of print-handicapped post-secondary students. The volunteer readers, the volunteer Braillists at the CNIB, at the audio library service and at PAL, and the volunteers at post-secondary institutions, provide an indispensable part of the continuing service for print-handicapped students.

VISITOR

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, I just thought I might draw to your attention and to the attention of members that one of our former colleagues in the House is in the gallery today. I am sure you would like to welcome to the House the former member for Victoria-Haliburton, Glen Hodgson.

[Applause]

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: I was wondering whether the government House leader was going to make a statement today to remove any confusion and to perhaps obviate any embarrassment that might have been created for the royal household as a result of that part of the speech from the throne, the last paragraph on page 23, which gave rise to press accounts. This certainly indicated in the minds of many members of this Legislature that there is some confusion. I am sure the government House leader, to say nothing of the leader of the government, would not wish to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order.

ORAL QUESTIONS

PHYSICIANS' FEES

Mr. Peterson: The Treasurer stated on several occasions that the participation of the doctors of the province in the restraint program was critical to the program's success. For example, just to quote from the September 24 North Bay Nugget, he said, "It will be important 'for the doctors to understand how the perception [of their status] is in society and how critical their reaction may be to the overall success of our program.'"

2:20 p.m.

I remind the Treasurer that this was some six months ago. Can he tell this House what has changed in the last six months, what has intervened to make him take a different view that he can afford to pay out to the doctors, depending on one's figures, $82 million, $70 million or whatever, when six months ago he thought it so important that they participate in the restraint program?

Hon. F. S. Miller: I would be very glad to answer that, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the honourable member realizes that at the time I made that statement Bill 179 was before this House. We were faced at that point with delegations either coming or about to come before the committee. We were faced with many people working for various levels of government in this province having a restriction on their salaries. This government had said it hoped that the physicians, although they were not employees, would understand that this was a difficult distinction to make in the eyes of many and that their participation on some basis that would need to be voluntary would help us greatly to sell to those people affected by the legislation the sense of basic fairness of that legislation.

That legislation has passed. The member asks me what has changed. The legislation has passed, and I have to give great credit to the people who are covered by it because they have reacted in a totally responsible way in Ontario, co-operating with the people they work for, in helping us fight inflation.

Mr. Peterson: So that I understand the position, the government did not take a hard line with the doctors then because other people were coming in and talking in committee about that legislation and the government was hoping they would voluntarily submit at the time.

Why did things change? The minister felt so strongly at the time that doctors should be involved to give a sense of fairness to that legislation. He knows the bitterness that legislation caused. He knows he has the control and he has the power to put the Ontario health insurance plan fees under that legislation. He had the power then and he did not take advantage of it. Then he tried to jawbone them into it voluntarily, and they refused his offer, for which I do not blame them. How does the minister expect anybody to submit voluntarily?

How can he go back now to people who have submitted and say, "We are going to carry the burden of restraint on the backs of the orderlies, the nursing assistants and the custodians but not on the backs of the doctors," and ask them to do their bit? How can he suggest now that this is fair when it was not fair then?

Hon. F. S. Miller: It is always nice for a party that has three positions on this matter to stand up. Let me recall the three positions his party had. The member for London North (Mr. Van Horne) said they were worth more; the member for Hamilton Centre (Ms. Copps) said they were worth less; the Leader of the Opposition said he did not know what they were worth.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, now that the government has finally decided to honour its contract with the medical profession, unlike the contracts it has signed with its own employees, which it tore up, and unlike contracts with hospital workers, which it tore up, will the Treasurer now insist and take the necessary action to make sure that the doctors honour their end of the contract and charge one fee for medical services rendered to citizens of Ontario, and that is the OHIP fee, as in the terms of any normal contract?

Hon. F. S. Miller: My friend knows very well that was not part of the contract or the agreement as it stands. He knows that the right to opt out for a physician has existed in Ontario ever since health insurance was introduced. It was not part of that deal.

Mr. Peterson: Obviously, the Treasurer had trouble with the morality of the whole question and his pragmatic instincts prevailed; either that or he was mugged in cabinet by the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman). Who knows what happened?

May I have the Treasurer's assurance he will not increase OHIP premiums and that he will not come back to this House as a rationalization, if he does try to raise OHIP premiums, and say to us, "We need them to pay the doctors more because we do not have money in the Treasury now"? Will he give us that guarantee now?

Hon. F. S. Miller: No.

Mr. Peterson: I could ask who is running the government, Mr. Speaker.

CLOSURE OF FACILITIES FOR THE MENTALLY RETARDED

Mr. Peterson: Let me ask a question of the Premier with respect to the closing of the centres for the retarded, of which he is very well aware. The Premier will recall discussions that were held during his estimates. I thought he demonstrated some sensitivity to the question then. As nearly as I can remember, he said he was prepared to look at that question sensitively if perhaps the government had made a mistake.

The Premier is aware of the vast number of petitions that have been filed in this House, both from members on his side as well as members on this side. Some 20,000 signatures have now been filed by way of petition protesting against the closing of those centres for the retarded and, at the very least, asking for a moratorium to start the consultative process that was not in place when the plan to announce those closings was made.

Given all that has transpired since the last discussion in this House about that matter, will the Premier now consider the very thoughtful and, I believe, reasonable position of the parents involved in those centres to declare a moratorium and make sure there are no further closings, with no more residents shipped back to larger institutions, until there has been a full consultation program? Will the Premier use his good offices to declare that moratorium so we can at least have some thoughtful discussions on this whole matter?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is a very sensitive area of government policy. I recognize this and I respect the concerns that have been expressed by a number of parents in a number of communities. In a personal way I have been rather closely associated with the programs for the mentally retarded ever since coming into this Legislature. I like to believe the policies of this government have not only been sensitive but in keeping with what we believe are the right directions to go.

I do not recall verbatim some of the discussions in the House because I did not research this at all, but my recollection is that when the government stated it was embarking upon a program of deinstitutionalization, if that is the right word for the approach that is being envisaged and what the ministry is doing, there was fairly general support for this as a matter of principle and of a philosophical nature. I regret it if the Leader of the Opposition is withdrawing what I sensed was his party's support for that general direction.

For those of us who represent smaller communities—and this is the case as it relates to some of these institutions—I think it is also realistic that there is a high emotional content, particularly when one is dealing with the parents of some of these people. I can speak with some knowledge of the sensitivity of the emotional feelings. I think the ministry has understood this. I have met directly in my own office with some of the people involved and other members of my staff have had meetings as well.

Because there is a period of time for some of these institutions, the ministry has been working with the people in the community. As an example, I think the honourable member is aware of the ongoing discussions that have been taking place in Elgin county with the centre in St. Thomas, where there is probably now a relative degree of acceptance. The honourable member shakes his head, but that is the impression we have.

While I am not for a moment saying there is a moratorium, because that would be misleading, I can only say that the government intends to handle all of these five or six situations with sensitivity and to have discussions with parents and representatives within the community. We believe we are going in the right direction in terms of the principle of the policy, but no one minimizes the concern that is being expressed by the communities and, more particularly, by the parents of the people who are affected.

Mr. Peterson: The Premier is aware we very well support the principle of deinstitutionalization, as do most members of the House, just as we support the monarchy, for example. We on this side of the House would never do anything to embarrass Her Majesty, but that is not the point.

The point is this: is the Premier aware that in closing the Brockville centre a number of those residents were shipped back to larger institutions? They went back to the Rideau Centre at Smiths Falls. Therefore, the Premier's stated aims of deinstitutionalization have not been carried out. We are taking people from medium-sized institutions that are working reasonably well to larger institutions that we all want to avoid, so the stated aim of the government's policy is not working.

Would the Premier reconsider what is transpiring in the light of those realities and in the light of the fact that we are not going to be able to have the group homes in place? There are problems with zoning in a variety of areas like Goderich.

Given those delays, will the Premier do the humane thing and call for a moratorium to make sure that everyone is satisfied that every single resident will be in the appropriate place when those centres are closed? Surely that is not an unreasonable request.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is a very difficult position for the ministry, because it is part of a longer process. The difficulty the ministry has is explaining, say, to the parents that in community A—and let us stay away from the individual communities; I will not cite St. Thomas—there will be a facility or a home in place.

Quite obviously if I were a parent and I saw the physical structure there, if I knew the accommodation was there, it would be more acceptable. Surely the Leader of the Opposition must understand that in order to bring this about one has to make certain decisions and then one implements the program in a sensitive fashion.

I do not think there is any contradiction. I am not the expert in this—I really wish the Leader of the Opposition would direct his more particular questions to the minister—but I have some sensitivity as to the general issues.

Once again, not referring to the people in St. Thomas, if the member would regard Cedar Springs as a larger institution, which it is in terms of size, if he has assessed the programs—and perhaps he has—and the physical accommodation in Cedar Springs I think he will find that while it is a larger institution in his definition of the word, it is none the less an excellent institution.

I do not believe there is a contradiction in the policy of deinstitutionalization. The fact that a person is being moved from what is a relatively small institution to a larger institution does not limit the program or the care for these people because of its size. I say that very advisedly. I know there are shortcomings in every institution dealing with issues of this nature, but in any objective assessment, whether it is of the Rideau Centre, Cedar Springs, whatever, I take some pride in thinking this province is operating first-class facilities for this important part of our population.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, does the Premier not recognize that in making the major step in deinstitutionalization that has been made it is important to adhere to the basic principle of deinstitutionalization? That is, no one from these institutions should be going to another institution. We should be getting them all into the community and providing that kind of assistance to them.

Will the Premier not accept that as an important principle and that the statement about sending people back to Rideau at this point is making many parents afraid that it is their children who will be going back to other institutions and not into the community in a real deinstitutionalization?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert. I cannot say what is the best in terms of every single young person or a mature person in this group. I cannot answer that question.

I cannot honestly say to the member that every person who is now in one of our institutions, whether it be small or large, should be totally within the community. I am not sure that the interest of the patient, if that is the right word to use, is necessarily best served by this. I think one has to look at them almost individually and try to determine what is the best program and location for that individual.

I am delighted, though, to sense that at least this honourable member supports the concept of deinstitutionalization and that his objections may relate to the fact, not as to the closing of some of these but as to where the present patients or occupants ultimately may go.

That is one of the difficulties, as I tried to explain to the Leader of the Opposition. It is difficult for the ministry to invest in or to develop, shall we say, the much smaller community facility if it is not in a position to say that if we invest in that we are doing so because this larger facility will be closing.

I guess it is a question of what comes first. Do we build it first and then say, "Here we are," or do we say to the parents: "This is the direction we are going. You have the assurance of the government that patients are not going to be moved where we have said there will be other facilities until those facilities are there"? That is the general approach we are taking.

I really do wish the member would ask the minister in a more particular sense, because I know of the general issue but I cannot give him the specifics.

Mr. Peterson: I must say I have real difficulty understanding what the Premier is saying. He is saying that moving people from a small institution to a large institution is deinstitutionalization.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I did not say that.

Mr. Peterson: It is not deinstitutionalization? I will check Hansard. Perhaps someone else in the room understood what he is talking about. I really do not.

Let me ask this question. The Premier is aware that a number of the residents in the medium-sized institutions had been in larger institutions—Cedar Springs, Huronia, Smiths Falls—and he is aware that the medium-sized institution was seen as an intermittent step towards the general objective of being out in the community in the small group home. But he is also aware, I am sure, that a number of residents have not been able to function in that community setting. I have talked with many parents who have had a lot of individual difficulties.

Would the Premier just stop, pause a bit and reassess what he is doing in consultation with each individual parent so he will be satisfied and they will be satisfied that the paramount factor will be the needs of each individual resident, not some grand program of either institutionalization or deinstitutionalization, whatever we want to call it, that has no particular relevance to the individuals concerned?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I regret that the honourable member had difficulty understanding what I was attempting to explain. I will assume responsibility for that, although I think there are several other members of the House who did understand.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Name one.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have a feeling the member for Scarborough West (Mr. R. F. Johnston) understood what I was saying. He may not agree with it.

May I point out a contradiction to the Leader of the Opposition? He is saying to me that he is in favour of deinstitutionalization, that he does not want some of these people going back into the larger centres, at the same time as he says that some of them are not comfortable with a smaller community orientation. He cannot have it both ways.

What is also relevant is not just the philosophy of deinstitutionalization but a recognition that some institutions will still be necessary for a period of time until we reach whatever the ultimate solution may be, and what is relevant for those people is the quality of the program.

I do not happen to be as up to date, for instance on Cedar Springs, as I was four or five years ago, but with respect to the program and the facility itself the member should understand it is probably one of the best that any government can develop anywhere in this country, and to say we should not have people go there shows a certain lack of judgement on his part which is consistent with some of his other views on some other issues.

PHYSICIANS' FEES

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Health. In the light of the fact that as a result of the settlement he signed with the doctors last year, in 1984-85 the average income of a physician in this province will be $122,000, does he not feel this is sufficient income for the physicians of this province and that as a result of this settlement there should now be no extra billing carried on in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, for most of the physicians in this province I feel that the average income, which is what it is, is appropriate. However, of course, when one considers the fact that there is nothing in the Ontario health insurance plan schedule of benefits or in the Ontario Medical Association schedule—which, as the honourable member knows, the OHIP schedule tracks—to reflect merit, to reflect years of service or to reflect competence—

Mr. R. F. Johnston: There isn't here in the Legislature either.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Obviously, or else you would really be starving.

2:40 p.m.

Mr. Rae: Why don't you stay on the point.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I know you are sweating a little bit today, Robert; now just hear the answer.

If that schedule were flexible enough we would be in a position where the continent's leading specialists and surgeons would be able to earn—let me say it quite openly—what I consider to be an appropriate amount of money for the 10 or 15 years when they are at the top end of their competence and ability. Those would be their years between perhaps 40 and 53 or 54. Yet there is nothing in the fee schedule that allows us to pay those doctors, frankly, more than the income the member cited.

So one of the problems with the system is that the schedule that is currently in place is flat in the sense that the young person who graduated yesterday makes the same and earns the same as a person who is at the absolute height of his or her professional competence. The reality is that for some of those surgeons the figure cited is less than they are worth here, I would suggest, and certainly in other parts of the world.

Unless we are prepared to face up to the reality that some of those people will decide to leave Ontario, as many of them in fact decided to leave Quebec a few years ago and have been lost to Canada, we will be accepting the proposition that we would rather have everyone opted in with a lower quality of medicine than some people opted out providing the highest quality of medicine that is available anywhere in the world.

That is the circumstance we have today. I would say to the honourable leader of the third party, the benefit of it is that the better-off in society pay the freight for those—

Mr. Speaker: That was a very complete answer. Supplementary?

Mr. Rae: That is a nonsensical answer. The figure I gave is an average and the minister knows perfectly well that virtually every specialist in Ontario is making well above that average figure. The minister is well aware of that fact and the average takes that into consideration.

Anyway, last week he was talking about there being too many doctors and the fact that they are all flooding into Ontario and now he is parading this horror about how they are going to flood out again. What a load of malarkey.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Rae: The Catholic Health Conference of Ontario, the Ontario Association of Professional Social Workers, the Medical Reform Group, the Patients' Rights Association, the Registered Nurses Association of Ontario, the United Senior Citizens of Ontario and the Consumers' Association of Canada, Ontario chapter, in the briefs they have presented to the minister for the conference he is holding next week, all have said they are opposed to extra billing.

I would like to ask the minister how many consultations it will take before the government comes to terms with the fact that the vast majority of citizens and health care professionals in this province think extra billing is unacceptable in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Might I say to those who perhaps did not have an opportunity to read and study my remarks with regard to numbers of doctors over the weekend, what I was referring to, of course, and what I made quite explicit at that time—and indeed the member's Health critic has heard me talk about it and could have informed his leader with regard to the problem—was that the problem is we would lose the doctors we need to keep and in some areas—

Mr. Stokes: Prove to the people in northern Ontario that there are too many doctors.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The member for Lake Nipigon is quite right, we do not have enough. Overall, we have too many, but I do not want to lose our best and I am not prepared to lose our best for the sake of having something that the member philosophically finds more comfortable, which is lowest-common-denominator medicine.

Mr. Foulds: Why are you not in medicine, then?

Mr. Rae: If that were true, the minister would be practising.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Let me also say I understand the problem. The Ontario Federation of Labour told the members opposite to tell us not to roll back the doctors; I understand.

In direct answer to the latter question, and there were two, as to how many briefs it will take from groups such as the member for York South has named to convince us to end extra billing in this province, might I say those very groups, almost all of which In direct answer to the latter question, and there were two, as to how many briefs it will take from groups such as the member for York South has named to convince us to end extra billing in this province, might I say those very groups, almost all of which I have met, have all indicated that the burden of taxation upon their people—be it retail sales tax, be it income tax, be it OHIP premiums—is very significant.

One of the things those people would quite justifiably complain about would be the consequence of what we might call the Emmett Hall formula which the member's party supported last year. Let us make it clear, that formula would end up paying those doctors more through an opted-in OHIP schedule of benefits. There is only one place for that money to come from. It is not only from the rich in society who are extra-billed. It would be from the retail sales tax base. It would be from the liquor, alcohol, all the other taxes that very many people at the lower economic bracket happen to pay.

Ms. Copps: What about OHIP premiums?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: And OHIP premiums.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the minister was somewhat chagrined yesterday when despatched from cabinet by the Premier to announce to the waiting press in the hall this very embarrassing decision that the government has made not to include the doctors in the restraint program. As I understand him to have said yesterday, the government's program now, its plan now, is to pay the doctors back in the next negotiating period for them not voluntarily submitting to the restraint program now.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I understand the Leader of the Opposition likes to threaten and operate that way. He really wanted to get on the radio this morning and punish the docs. I understand that, but we do not operate that way over here.

Might I say though, the member asked whether I was sent out and he said it was an embarrassing situation. What I call an embarrassing situation is the one the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) found himself in when he told—I do like to follow the meanderings of the Liberal members—the members of the Ontario Medical Association in Niagara Falls on April 8 that basically he was against rolling back the docs. That is what he told them. Now that is embarrassing.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Bellwoods.

Interjections.

Mr. McClellan: I was sure I heard a point of privilege from somewhere. It must have been an echo.

Mr. Speaker, by way of supplementary, I would like to ask—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Let us hear the question please.

Mr. McClellan: I would like to ask the minister, who keeps repeating the totally—

Mr. Kerrio: I am not embarrassed I said it.

Mr. McClellan: I cannot even hear myself.

Mr. Speaker: No, I know.

Mr. Kerrio: On a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, there is no privilege, no.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no point of privilege. The member for Bellwoods.

Mr. McClellan: I would like to ask the minister—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Now, if we are quite finished, the member for Bellwoods.

Mr. McClellan: I would like to ask the minister, who keeps repeating the totally false and preposterous statement that only the rich are being extra-billed—he repeated it again today; it is totally false and he knows it—if he would share with us the data, which undeniably he has if he is concerned that the average net takehome pay of general practitioners and surgeons, which will be $122,000 a year by the end of 1985, is inadequate for the doctors who are worth more money.

Would he be so kind as to tell us what his officials estimate will be the average net takehome pay of an obstetrician by the end of 1985, since 65 per cent of the obstetricians are opted out in Toronto and presumably are free to charge up to 40 per cent and in some cases 100 per cent above the OHIP fee schedule; and would he tell us perhaps what the average net takehome pay of a general surgeon will be at the end of 1985 and what the average pay of an anaesthetist will be?

Mr. Speaker: I think we will just deal with the first one, the obstetrician.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Obviously, to the extent that extra billing involves a free market decision with regard to the patients and what they are prepared to pay for those services, I could not estimate what the price of that service will be in 1985 any more than the member could estimate what the price of a litre of gasoline may be.

Mr. Rae: It is nice to know that private profit medicine is alive and well in Tory Ontario. [Later]

Mr. Kerrio: May I present my point of privilege now?

Mr. Speaker: I will listen to you now.

Mr. Kerrio: Thank you very much.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Health made a statement that he suggested was something I said in a meeting I had with the doctors of Niagara Falls. I am afraid the minister did not relate everything that was said at the meeting.

My position was very clear to the good doctors of Niagara Falls. The fact of the matter is that we did have a meeting so they could put their position to myself and the federal minister. In fact, the point was being made more to the federal minister, because Mme Bégin is talking about not letting the doctors opt out and of course they wanted a meeting so that such a thing should not happen to them.

My participation had to do with meeting with them and telling them that I felt the same way as our party did when we debated the bill, and that was that everyone in this great province should participate in the restraint program, those gentlemen as well as the rest of us.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I should take this opportunity to admit that I did not recite fully, as the member for Niagara Falls mentioned, everything he said. To clarify the record, he said further: "Basically I am in agreement"—

Mr. Nixon: What are you quoting from?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: From his remarks. "Basically I am in agreement, because I am in private enterprise and am on the right wing of caucus"—it gets better—"and influential in being a moderating force against people like Sheila Coppins."

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is quickly degenerating into a debate. I think you have both made your points very well. I have listened patiently and I have failed to identify a point of privilege.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, if you are going to allow—

Mr. Speaker: No, no. Order, please.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: I think I gave you the opportunity of refuting fully what was said about your position. The minister chose to respond with a further quotation. This could go on all afternoon. I am not prepared to allow that, because we have other pressing business before this chamber.

CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO WORK

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Premier has to do with property rights. As the Premier is aware, plants are closing across this province and a great many workers are being laid off. I am sure the Premier will appreciate that a great many of those workers feel they have a kind of property right in their job.

In the light of what is happening in this province, the number of layoffs that are taking place and the tremendous insecurity that is out there as a result of this very serious recession that is taking place, I wonder if the Premier would consider adding the words "livelihood" and "shelter" to the property rights concept which he wants to entrench in the Constitution and which we are quite prepared to support.

Given that we are writing a Constitution for 20th century Ontario, does he not believe that workers are also entitled to protection and to natural justice and fundamental justice with respect to their jobs and their protection, and that tenants are entitled to that same kind of protection as well?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think we have to be realistic and practical. I was one of those in support of a very all-encompassing preamble to the Constitution, which was not accepted. Now that goes back several years, where many of these hopes were expressed in such a preamble.

I think the senior citizen from Riverdale, who has now moved into the second row of that party's benches—and I would say to the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) that we over here respect senior citizens. He would have had the second seat in the front row over here any time at all. He would have, without any question. He would be right next door to the member for Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry (Mr. Villeneuve) and he could not have a better seatmate.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Dealing with this in a realistic fashion, I think all of us would like to express the philosophy or the hope that not only workers but some might even say politicians have security of employment. The leader of the third party and I both know that will never be the case, nor should it be the case in terms of people in our profession. Certainly as far as some of those members are concerned we are doing our best to see that their tenure is very brief, but that is part of the process. He understands that and I do.

To include this in the Constitution in a way that I guess he would then suggest should be legally enforceable in law, I think he recognizes the practical limitations of doing that. No one is quarrelling with the general idea that all of us should have gainful employment and that all of us want shelter. Those are commendable objectives, objectives which this government is striving to achieve, but I really question the wisdom of putting it into a charter.

Mr. Rae: I hope the Premier is not suggesting that because we are putting property rights into the Constitution it means everybody in the country is necessarily going to want to, or in all circumstances be able to, exercise that right of ownership. The Premier has trivialized the issue and trivialized the comparison. Surely the point is that people should not be deprived of their jobs and of shelter without due process of law.

Given the fact that his government has dropped its commitments to improvements in severance pay legislation and improvements in legislation on unfair dismissal, how does he expect the workers of this province or the tenants of this province or people who are affected by this kind of insecurity—farmers and everybody else—to take seriously his concern about their property rights?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I suggest the next time the leader of the third party has lunch in the Sanssouci room with the president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture he tells him the New Democratic Party is opposed to putting property rights into the charter.

Mr. Rae: I never said that. Point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the Premier. First of all, I want to thank him for making the statement today. But given the fact that a good number of the provinces are led by the Premier's Conservative colleagues across the country—

Hon. Mr. Ashe: Not too many of them are led by Liberals anyway.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Epp:—and given the fact that he has had over the last number of years an opportunity to discuss this same measure with his colleagues the Premiers of different provinces, can we conclude that all those governments will now support in their own legislatures the entrenchment of property rights? Could the Premier indicate to us that he expects those provinces will support a similar resolution in their own provinces?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I really do not think the honourable member expects me to give the answer he would like me to give. I understand his references to Progressive Conservative governments in different parts of Canada and a growing recognition on his part that within the next 18 months there will be a Progressive Conservative government in charge in Ottawa. I understand that feeling.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Premier prepared to comment on the question at hand?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am, but I thought a part of the question from the member for Waterloo North was whether I knew there were a number of provinces where they had the enlightened instincts to elect a Conservative government. Was that not part of the question?

Mr. Speaker: No, that was—

Mr. Nixon: No.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I heard that.

I shall answer very briefly and seriously. I cannot commence to speculate on the attitude of other governments. We know what British Columbia has done. There have been some discussions, but I cannot say what other governments will do.

Mr. Rae: Just for the record, I want the Premier to know that we in our party believe so strongly in private property that we think everybody should have some and not just the banks and the mortgage companies.

I would simply like to ask the Premier, does he not think the workers of this province whose jobs are threatened and who do not have protection with respect to unfair dismissal or with respect to adequate severance pay legislation, the farmers of this province, the tenants of this province and the many people who need shelter and who do not have shelter should be able to have the same kinds of legal protection as do those people with property rights as they have been defined up to the present time? Does he not think those people should have fundamental rights protected in our Constitution as well?

Hon. Mr. Davis: As I read the charter, I think "fundamental rights" are protected in the Constitution. I think the member is stretching it in his views on dismissal. I think that is a valid area for discussion and debate, but to include in the Constitution a set of economical parameters that are unrealistic is really not the job of a charter or a constitution.

While I do not have many farmers in my riding, I have far more in my riding than the member has in his, and I can still say in this House that while they are concerned about many other things, a lot of the farmers in my constituency want their property rights in the Constitution.

3 p.m.

CONVERSION OF RENTAL UNITS

Mr. Ruprecht: Mr. Speaker, I have a question to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. The minister is no doubt aware that the newest trick being employed by landlords to evict tenants and raise rents illegally is the nominal conversion of apartments into supposed hotel units. In the case of 200 Jameson Avenue in my riding, of the 97 units in the building that have been furnished and are now being advertised as hotel units, the landlord applied to the Residential Tenancy Commission for rent increases for only 48 units in the building, claiming the other 39 units were hotel suites and therefore not subject to review. The commission disagreed with the landlord's interpretation and the matter is now being appealed.

Before an avalanche of similar cases emerges, will the minister request that the board of commissioners of the Residential Tenancy Commission amend its guidelines to ensure that landlords cannot escape from the rent review process by merely furnishing empty units and calling them hotel suites?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, the important part of the question is the point that the issue has been appealed and it will be adjudicated by the appeal board. Therefore, it would be inappropriate for me to make any comment on it. I am sure the honourable member knows there are several other units related to the same ownership that are also under appeal at present, the commissioner initially having rejected the claim.

I am sure the member understands that there is a commission of inquiry sitting now reviewing matters related to rent review. I am certain that is a matter the commissioner will take into his consideration. It will be drawn to his attention.

Mr. Ruprecht: I do not think for one minute that it is inappropriate for the minister to comment on this issue. He is entrusted with a responsibility to protect tenants. That is the issue here.

The appeal hearing for 200 Jameson Avenue had originally been scheduled for March 31. It gets more complicated. It was postponed because the landlord wanted to amend his notice of appeal. On comparing the amended notice of appeal to the original one, it is clear the landlord has changed his approach.

Originally he disputed the commission's finding that the furnished units were rental units. On the amended notice the landlord states that the furnished units are rental units but that they have not been used as such for a period of at least 12 months prior to the commission's hearing. Precisely, that is the point.

I want to know from the minister what steps he is prepared to take. Perhaps he can tell us that today. If he is not prepared to intervene in the specific instance of 200 Jameson Avenue, which we have now made public, when will he intervene to protect the tenants in all of Ontario in this situation?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: This was a matter that was discussed at some length in committee last year. The member knows full well that this Legislature, when there was a minority government, did pass section 4 which provided for an exemption with respect to transient accommodation. He knows that the matters go before a commissioner for review. If he is suggesting that I should put myself into the place of the commissioner and direct him as to what to do, I have to tell the member I do not do that.

With respect to the protection of tenants' interests, I do not think there is anyone in this province who does not understand that this is what I am doing.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Cooke: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Treasurer. He is quoted in today's press as saying, "I challenge anyone to show there was not enough money in the federal budget for job creation." How can the Treasurer make such a silly comment when the federal budget says the unemployment rate this year will be 12.4 per cent? Next year it will be over 11 per cent, and it will be over 10 per cent until 1986.

Is the Treasurer satisfied that the $1.2 billion in the federal budget in the coming year is adequate to address the employment crisis? Can he assure us that he will take the employment crisis more seriously in his provincial budget than Mr. Lalonde has in his budget?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I learned long ago to look at the context of a quote. Those words, "I challenge anybody," do not sound like me. They easily could be me, and I could hear them back on a tape in the middle of one of the scrum discussions, but I do not recall even having that general thrust in my comments.

When somebody asked me if I would be spending more or whether there was enough, I think the words I used were something like "I challenge anybody to tell me how much is enough," or some words of that nature, because I really do not know how much is enough in this world.

It is very difficult to say what form the $4.8 billion that Mr. Lalonde referred to will take. It depends on whether one uses his pre-leak or after-leak figures. His $4.8 billion was actually aimed at both tax benefits and direct capital works programs. I think roughly $2.4 billion was aimed at capital works programs and $2.4 billion at some forms of stimulation of the private sector.

I have some difficulty in being able to translate exactly any method of proof that takes $2.4 billion of tax benefits and says it caused so many jobs. That is where the kind of challenge was being mounted.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, the minister will recognize that budget is spread over a four-year period and that unemployment is going to remain at the levels stated by the member for Windsor-Riverside (Mr. Cooke). Does the minister not find that intolerable? He has received letters from me and a second one which I passed on to him from one Jim Burkitt, who said the following:

"So I am currently living a limbo-like existence at the present time, searching for a job that will allow me to exist. Indeed, I don't see too much of a future, other than one that would allow for basic existence. I am thankful that I do not have a family to support. I can imagine the humiliation and exasperation of a man or a woman that has to explain joblessness to his children."

Does the minister not think that, as Treasurer, it is unacceptable to say that we will allow a continuation of 12 per cent unemployment so people like this man will continue to suffer over the next four years? Will he not today commit himself to having a major job creation component—direct job creation—by his government in his budget?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I would suspect if he asked, as I have been asking a lot of people around Ontario, where they really think jobs are best created, most would still say not in those major government job direct creation projects but somehow out there in small business and hopefully in big business, where the jobs not only provide an income for a family but also some addition to the gross product of this nation that can be shared by all of us, either through the tax system or some other route.

Government job creation activities are always important. No matter what members on the other side of the House may say, we have a very good record of having intervened in a bad year, 1982, with an effort which on a per year basis is at least equal to the figures Mr. Lalonde used over four years. One of the favourite new tricks of the federal government is to make everything for four or five years; so the figure used sounds great. If one uses it three or four times in the same speech, no one will know what it is.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, the Treasurer has some reservations, I gather, about public programs to create jobs. This is reflected in the actual numbers of jobs he will be creating through his programs this year, through the Ontario youth employment program and Experience '83. In fact, he will produce 16,300 fewer jobs this year than he did a year ago, even though we are facing record unemployment of 233,000 young people between the ages of 15 and 24, some 22.2 per cent.

Since he believes the private market should take up these jobs, can he tell us how many jobs he is going to create through the private market, with any help he is prepared to render? What are his targets?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, my target, of course, is a job for every able-bodied man and woman in this province who is seeking one. That is the only legitimate target of any government. The big difference is how to do it. I suggest to the honourable member again that the people of this province have a great deal more faith in the government of Ontario's ability to deal with their problems than it has in the federal government's or, indeed, his.

3:10 p.m.

ACID RAIN

Mr. J. A. Reed: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources. Can the minister indicate what studies are being done by his ministry to determine whether the maple killback in the Parry Sound area is related to acid rain? Will he tell the House whether he now can table an inventory of that kill?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to get that information for the honourable member if it is yet available and get back to him when it is ready.

Mr. J. A. Reed: Will the minister also report to the House as to what level of investigation is taking place? In other words, how seriously does his ministry take this maple killback? Is he liaising with other parts of Canada that are experiencing a similar phenomenon? Is he also, through his ministry, liaising on the research work that is apparently being done in Europe to determine whether acid rain is actually killing off maple forests?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Both as the Ministry of Natural Resources and as a government through the Ministry of the Environment, we do have a research and scientific relationship with European jurisdictions. I happen to believe that Ontario and Canadian jurisdictions lead the way in this kind of scientific research, and I will be pleased to share that information with the member.

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, when the minister is replying to the honourable member who just asked the question, will he also reply to my question of yesterday about the loss of two jobs in the Huntsville sign shops of the Ministry of Natural Resources?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, my answer is contained in my letter to the honourable member, dated April 7, 1983, of which he knew when he asked the question yesterday.

MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. Samis: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour, by which I would like to switch the focus from the $122,000 doctors to the working poor of Ontario.

Can the minister tell this House why in the past 18 months he has failed to do anything to improve the minimum wage in this province when within that same period of time his government has increased welfare benefits, Family Benefits Act benefits, Workers' Compensation Board benefits and pension supplement benefits? He has done nothing. Why?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, the matter of the minimum wage has been under review in our ministry. I remind the honourable member that the minimum wage in Ontario is the same as the federal minimum wage. At the moment we have no plans to raise it.

Mr. Samis: Can the minister tell the House and the working poor of this province why the minimum wage in this province is the lowest in all of mainland Canada? Why are we below such have-not provinces as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: The member has to take into consideration the difficult times in which employers and employees are during this recession.

WHITE FARM EQUIPMENT

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry and Trade, having to do with the status of White Farm Equipment in Brantford. He may recall that about a year ago this House approved a combination of grants and loans of about $5.5 million for the company. Can he explain to the House why, with that sort of support, the company employment has fallen from about 1,000 to a mere handful of custodians and one or two office workers?

Can he comment on rumours in the community that the company is about to cease functioning altogether?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the honourable member is that the entire industry is really down and has been down for some time. The anticipated turnaround expected just a short while ago did not occur, and the industry certainly has continued to be in a very difficult state ever since. That is true whether one looks at Massey-Ferguson, at White Farm Equipment or even at John Deere, which in terms of profitability is probably the most successful one at the moment; but even that firm is down substantially, with a substantial number of people on layoff.

White Farm Equipment has only 146 people working there now out of the total number that could have been there. That number is very unfortunate. International Harvester is having a lot of difficulty now and is basically on partial shutdown. In essence, the firm is not going to be producing in a short while; so there is a period of shutdown. We hope it will get back.

All we can do is hope that the entire industry does return. One has to relate it to interest rates; one has to relate it to commodity prices; one has to relate it simply to the ability of farmers to buy the equipment that is there, and all of us know some of the difficulties that the farming communities across the world have gone through.

I simply have to say to the member that all we can do is hope for a restoration of the industry. If that happens, it will obviously mean a restoration of the employment levels, including that of White Farm Equipment; if it does not materialize soon enough, then it is going to mean some very difficult times for some of the industries.

Mr. Nixon: Since the minister was one of the people who was in a position to approve or disapprove the American buyout a year ago, is he negotiating with any of the American owners or their representatives for any more financial or other types of assistance? And is he not aware that Massey has brought back one full shift and is turning out combines, although White seems to have made no effort whatsoever to continue any sort of production or even to stimulate sales?

Hon. Mr. Walker: It is conceivable that there could be some discussions going on between people at White and people within the ministry, but to my knowledge we are not negotiating with the American owners. When this was subject to discussion last year, as the member will recall, the only alternative to the agreement then entered into would have been the complete closure of the industry. That being the case, I think even the member would have found it unacceptable.

Mr. Nixon: That was not the only alternative.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That, I think, was the case.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, in his first answer to the previous questioner, the minister enunciated four major firms that had suffered severe losses in jobs and employment creation opportunities. What happened to his commitment, when he assumed this portfolio, that his top priority was going to be jobs, jobs and more jobs? Are the only jobs he has created those nine in the factory in southwestern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member should not be asking how badly Ontario is doing; he should be saying how well it is doing, given the fact that the entire world economy is down. I think he is the one who is merely making a fuss over it.

If one looks at the level of unemployment that Ontario has sustained, if that is the only way to measure it, it ranks infinitely better in comparison with all the industrial states that surround us; they wish they had our problems. The problem with the member opposite is that he looks at everything with a black cloud. For a change, why does he not look at something and say we should be giving some support to the economy, some support to business? When he starts doing that, people will give the members opposite more credence.

Mr. Laughren: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether you could have the Minister of Industry and Trade pass on what he just said to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay) in view of the Minister of Labour's comments about not being able to raise the minimum wage.

FUEL TAX ACT REGULATIONS

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Revenue, who on several occasions now has had the complexity of the manner in which taxes are collected in Ontario questioned in the Legislature and in the courts.

I want to refer him to the latest report of the standing committee on regulations and other statutory instruments, on this occasion talking about the Fuel Tax Act, 1981, and Ontario Regulation 772/82. If I might just quote briefly, the committee said, "The refund is made to the middle man in the transaction, and the committee can find no statutory authority in the three extracts quoted above or elsewhere to authorize such a provision in the regulation."

When is the minister going to make this process legal?

Hon. Mr. Ashe: Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to respond to that question without having the particular reference and the regulations in front of me. If the honourable member will provide them to me, I will be happy to get back to him. I can appreciate the concern, and I will be happy to respond in due course.

Mr. Breaugh: The minister has had it brought to his attention on several occasions now that the legality of the techniques used to collect taxes has been challenged, particularly when the government is very fond of using retailers, for example, to collect the tax on a particular product. That has been challenged, and we are interested in knowing when the minister is going to make this process, of which he is so fond, a legal process.

Hon. Mr. Ashe: The last statement by the member is incorrect. The process of the collection of sales tax at the distributor or wholesale level, in the case of motor vehicle fuels and tobacco tax, has not been challenged in the recent reference. It was a case of prosecution for illegally importing cigarettes from another jurisdiction. The defence used that and the judge threw out our charges on the basis of that, but it was not a challenge per se.

Frankly, we see no great problems from that. If there are any, we have an obligation to protect the revenues of the province and of the people of Ontario and we will do so if need be.

3:20 p.m.

DEATHS AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Ms. Copps: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: In view of the article in this morning's Toronto Star and in view of various news reports with respect to the calling of a public inquiry into the investigations at the Hospital for Sick Children, I wonder when we can expect a statement on this matter from either the minister involved or the government.

Mr. Speaker: I think you should put that question at the appropriate time.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the same point of privilege, it is a matter of real concern to members of this assembly that repeatedly, time and time again, matters dealing with the Hospital for Sick Children and other urgent questions have been released to the Toronto Star and other newspapers, but particularly the Star for some reason, before commitments that have been made to this assembly have been honoured.

Mr. Speaker: I have to rule that is not a proper point of privilege.

Mr. O'Neil: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Foulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: We already have one. Sorry.

CAPITAL GRANTS FOR EDUCATION

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, the members on this side of the Legislature thought the Minister of Education (Miss Stephenson) might be releasing to all members this afternoon the capital grants for the different boards of education across the province. I wonder whether that information is going to be provided today.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously she did not, and I have no way of knowing whether she will or will not. Maybe we could—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Maybe we could all wait until tomorrow.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question should more properly have been placed during question period.

Mr. Boudria: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Education has permitted other cabinet ministers to announce today the capital grants for education in my riding. That minister is here right now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of privilege.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Foulds: If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, I have an extremely urgent and serious point of order. I wonder whether it is too late to move that the ordinary business of the House be set aside so that the exchange between the Minister of Health and the member for Niagara Falls—

Mr. Speaker: You are indeed too late.

PETITIONS

INDIAN FISHING RIGHTS

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on Indian fishing rights, addressed to the Minister of Natural Resources, which states:

"The Conservative government of Ontario has signed an agreement with the status Indians of Ontario giving them the right to harvest fish at any time of year by whatever means without a licence or authorization. Also, certain lakes will be zoned such that they will be reserved for the exclusive use of Indian people.

"Should the federal government sign this pact, it will become law and cannot be terminated for at least five years. If the agreement is signed, it cannot be produced or referred to before a court except for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the agreement.

"Therefore, we the undersigned strongly disagree with the signing of the agreement by the federal government. We demand that our Ontario government retract their signing of this agreement."

It is signed by 145 disconcerted residents of Ontario.

Mr. Hennessy: Mr. Speaker, I have a petition for the Minister of Natural Resources, signed by 2,600 people. The letter reads as follows:

"This letter is written in regard to the Indian fishing pact signed on December 17, 1982, between the Ontario Conservative government and certain status Indian bands. Due to concerns of conservation and the apparent lack of study regarding possible environmental problems and the economic impact of all user groups, I strongly disagree with this pact.

"I request you, as my parliamentary representative, to ensure that the interests of all user groups are heard and considered. Only after such input and study can we have an acceptable agreement which may result in better fisheries management."

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CLOSING OF CENTENNIAL SECONDARY SCHOOL

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by more than 7,000 people opposing the closing of the newest and best secondary school in the growth area of the city of Welland, the Centennial Secondary School. I would like to pass this petition over to the Minister of Education.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

VITAL STATISTICS AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Elgie moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Drea, first reading of Bill 13, An Act to amend the Vital Statistics Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, this is reintroduction of the same bill that was in the House last session.

3:30 p.m.

LAND TRANSFER TAX AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Ashe moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Ramsay, first reading of Bill 14, An Act to amend the Land Transfer Tax Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Ashe: Mr. Speaker, this bill will ensure that a nonresident may not avoid the 20 per cent tax imposed on conveyances of agricultural land. Under the current Land Transfer Tax Act, it is possible for a nonresident to avoid payment of the proper rate of tax through the purchase of shares in a company that owns Ontario agricultural land or by acquiring the beneficial interest of a trust that owns agricultural land.

As well, a number of administrative amendments are included in the bill that will extend the notice of objection and appeals provisions, allow nonresident purchasers to pay the lower rate of tax on acquisitions of agricultural and recreational land in Ontario for certain specified purposes, recognize the single consolidated affidavit and provide for the determination of the value of consideration on certain conveyances.

CONSUMER PROTECTION AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Newman moved, seconded by Mr. Wrye, first reading of Bill 15, An Act to amend the Consumer Protection Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Speaker, this bill requires that every product offered for sale by a retailer that is marked with the universal product code must also be clearly marked with its individual purchase price. This would ensure the purchaser or the consumer the privilege of comparison shopping rather than simply shopping without knowing the price of the article.

ELECTION AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Boudria moved, seconded by Ms. Copps, first reading of Bill 16, An Act to amend the Election Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, this bill would provide for a procedure of voting by mail for the convenience of persons physically incapable of attending a polling place. This system would be an alternative to the present procedure of voting by proxy.

The bill was introduced in the last session and has since received the approval of the Ontario March of Dimes, the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada, the Muscular Dystrophy Association of Canada and several other groups.

MOTION TO SET ASIDE ORDINARY BUSINESS

Ms. Copps moved, seconded by Mr. Nixon, that pursuant to standing order 34(a), the ordinary business of the House be set aside in order to debate a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the recent decision on the part of the Ontario cabinet not to include the doctors of Ontario in the province's wage restraint program, thus necessitating the expenditure of large sums of public moneys to meet the increases in the doctors' fee schedule, funds which could more properly be applied to job creation programs to help alleviate this province's continuing unemployment crisis, particularly among Ontario's youth.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to advise all honourable members that the notice of motion has, in fact, been received in time. I am prepared to listen for up to five minutes to why the honourable member feels the ordinary business of the House should be set aside.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, first of all, it is with regret that I rise, and I am sure with regret on the part of the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) that I have to rise today, to move such a motion. I can understand why the minister would resort to the kind of ghoulish spying tactics he used on the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio), because when somebody is going down he must go down kicking and screaming.

If we look back at the comments that have been made by the Premier (Mr. Davis), the Minister of Health and the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) over the last six months, we certainly cannot understand why they would not have supported legislation which would have brought the doctors into the program.

I think we have all had our fun here in the House and, believe me, we have all enjoyed the spying tactics of the Minister of Health. But, at the same time, there is a fundamental principle involved here, which obviously the NDP are not involved with in the sense that they support the position of the doctors receiving the amount of money they are going to receive; therefore, since they are out of the play, they must of necessity come on the attack as well.

There is a fundamental principle involved here. I am sure any of you who joined with me in the 1981 provincial election will remember that there were hospital workers at that time who were forced to go out on an illegal strike in order to make a point for economic remuneration. Since that time, we, as a party, and the government of the province of Ontario have called upon the people of Ontario, the public servants of Ontario, to make extraordinary sacrifices above and beyond the call of duty in view of the dire economic straits that this government has led this province into.

We, as a party, supported that legislation. We supported it because we believe that these are extraordinary times that require extraordinary measures. The government espoused those measures last December. I think all of the government members must sit and really feel rather embarrassed about what has happened in cabinet in the sense of how they can go back to their ridings. How can the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay) speak to the labouring people of this province and ask those people, ask the private sector, ask the public sector, to make the kinds of sacrifices that have been required by legislation under Bill 179 at the same time that we do not have the courage of our conviction when it comes to the highest income group in Ontario? I would have to agree with my leader, who yesterday said that the sheer hypocrisy of the position taken by this government has been absolutely unbelievable.

For the record, I would like to read some of the comments made by our esteemed Premier in the month leading up to his hint that the doctors would be brought in under the restraint program. "I will deal with the medical profession. I know those people would love to legislate those doctors back as all public servants on a salary. That is the stated objective of the New Democratic Party. I would say to the honourable member I recognize the sensitivity of the issue. The medical profession is aware that we are calling on all people in public life and people in the public service to recognize the serious nature of the situation."

Again, there were comments made by the Minister of Health as late as September 30, 1982. Mr. Grossman said, "The province needs the doctors' co-operation to fight inflation because the more people that are involved in setting an example in all the private sector, the better the program will be. That is the whole point of the exercise." Mr. Grossman said the doctors had forced the government's hand. Well, that is clear enough. Mr. Grossman told reporters, "There is a chance the provincial government would bring the doctors under provincial restraint if no voluntary plan is offered."

That was tough talk that, unfortunately, collapsed when the chips were down. It seems to me that if we, as a government, as an opposition party and as a people, are to send a message of restraint out to our public sector and to make those demands and to ask those sacrifices of our public servants, the cleaning ladies and medical aids in the hospitals, as well as those who are involved in other public and parapublic sectors, we cannot do it on the backs of the lowest paid of the public servants while we do not demand the same example from the highest paid.

Frankly, if we look back to Bill 179, if we look back to the section on price restraint, I think it will be found that our motion is in order and the government should move in this direction.

3:40 p.m.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the emergency debate resolution before us this afternoon. I had a series of reasons why we needed an emergency debate, and we obviously have an additional reason today. Perhaps in the course of the debate over the whole afternoon, the Liberal Party will be able to arrive at a single, coherent position on the issue.

Mr. Foulds: Now that the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) is out of the House, they might.

Mr. Conway: So are Morty Shulman and Ed Ziemba. I mean let him with a stone, sin—cast the first stone, or whatever way it is.

Mr. McClellan: He without stone will cast the first sin.

I point with amazement at the absence of the leader of the Liberal Party, who only this morning said he had never been so angry in his entire life as he is and was over the question of the doctors. Of course, that was before the terrible ghoulish spying of the Minister of Health blew the whistle on the positions variously of the members of the Liberal Party. It is unfortunate that the performance of the Liberal Party here this afternoon has been so clownish that it has trivialized the issue, because it is an important issue.

The position the New Democratic Party has taken from the beginning of this fiasco—and it is a fiasco—is that the OHIP contract between the government and the Ontario Medical Association should be binding on both parties. It seems to me to be a fairly elementary proposition that a contract between two parties ought to be binding on both parties. We are saying it should be binding on the government—

Ms. Coppins: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: Just in terms of position—

Mr. Foulds: No, no, not during the five minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No, no.

Ms. Coppins: Okay.

Mr. McClellan: A contract between two parties should be binding on both parties. The OHIP contract should be binding on the government, and the government has taken the position that it will honour the contract. Even though it is tearing up the contracts of its employees and its hospital workers, it is honouring the contract with the doctors on its part.

But there is no obligation on the part of the medical profession to honour its side of the contract. They are perfectly free to disregard the OHIP contract, the contract which sets the OHIP fee schedule. They are perfectly free to charge whatever the traffic will bear. It is as crude as that. We have evidence that in some hospitals in the city of Toronto obstetricians are charging up to 100 per cent above the OHIP fee schedule for a full-care childbirth. I raised examples here in the Legislature at the conclusion of the last session.

I want to stress that the terms of Bill 179 with respect to the administered price section and how that section would apply to the doctors was a fake from the start. My colleagues in the Liberal Party knew it was a fake from the start. The government could easily have written legislation that made it absolutely clear that the OHIP fee schedule was included in the definition of administered price. The government said from the beginning with complete callous and open hypocrisy that it intended to exclude the doctors.

Nevertheless, my colleagues in the Liberal Party supported Bill 179. They supported it from day one. They supported it when it became absolutely clear that the government had not the slightest intention of including the doctors and that the highest paid group in Ontario would be excluded. They still voted for Bill 179. I believe they voted for it at least five times, on five separate occasions. Now the leader of the Liberal Party and the health critic for the Liberal Party come into the Legislature shedding crocodile tears about the outrageous behaviour of the government. Where were my dear friends when they had the opportunity to oppose the government?

They cannot have it both ways. A contract is a contract. We would not rip up the contracts of the hospital workers and we would not rip up the contracts of the civil servants. We would not allow doctors who are being paid such extravagantly lavish salaries, which will return a net income of $122,000 a year before the end of the contract, to break the contract by charging fees in excess of the OHIP fee schedule.

We would be pleased to debate this further this afternoon if you so rule, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wrye: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: I have sat by and listened to the end of the speech by my friend from Bellwoods, but I cannot let it go by, when he talks about hypocrisy, that his party launched the filibuster that prevented our amendment from coming to the floor for—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is no privilege. The Minister of Health. He just dropped his speech.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: But I haven't lost my marbles like others.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: David Peterson. He sits in the middle over there. I remember.

Mr. Speaker, the issue to which you have to address yourself is whether this is a matter of urgent public importance and warrants an emergency debate, which you would have to decide has to be held this very afternoon. I would point out that in the notice of motion it is suggested that it is a recent decision on the part of the Ontario cabinet not to include the doctors in the province's wage restraint program. Of course, it would be inaccurate to suggest that it is a recent decision; it is a long-standing decision made last September.

Second, I would point out that there has been no change since that time, no change in the funding available to the health care system. In fact, there has been an increase, if anything, in the funding available to the health care system.

There is no imminent problem that has erupted since yesterday. The province's financial status has not changed one bit as a result of the confirmation yesterday that a decision made last September was not being changed. With regard to the imminent public importance of this matter with respect to provincial revenues, it will be about four or five weeks until the payments go out based on the new fee schedule; so there will be no change in the provincial balance sheet as of this afternoon.

Finally and most important, the real issue here is whether there is a need at all to discuss it today in view of the fact that the budget is coming down several weeks from today. The thrust of the motion is that the decision made last September somehow has created a situation that makes it difficult for the province to help alleviate the continuing unemployment crisis, particularly among Ontario's youth.

That, as the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) has already stated, will be the main thrust of his budget. It would be difficult if not impossible, and certainly useless, to debate this matter today without having the benefit of the Treasurer's financial picture as he will lay it out on May 10, without having the benefit of his analysis of the revenues available to this province and without his analysis and decisions with regard to where he intends to spend the money we have available.

Without that information it is obviously quite premature to purport to have a discussion with regard to the allocation of funding to employment programs or any other programs at this time. The budget debate will ensue after May 10 and that gives sufficient time—indeed, some would argue more than sufficient time—to debate the very issues that have been talked about in the last few moments, whether the money could have been used elsewhere. I would argue, and I am surprised the Health critic moving this motion did not suggest it, that the funds should go to the health care system if there were some savings to be effected.

But all of those decisions really more properly can only be addressed and will only be a matter of urgent public importance importance from and after the date of the next budget.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest you have little option but to rule there is nothing today that warrants withholding the ordinary business of the House to have an emergency debate. There is nothing new, no emergency, and plenty of time to discuss this with far more information, far more details and far more analysis available upon which these decisions can be made.

3:50 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened with great interest to the positions put forward by the three members representing each of the parties and I must say I have some strong feelings about this motion. However, in all honesty and fairness, having made the decision I did on the former motion based on the fact that we are engaged in the reply to the speech from the throne plus the fact, and I must refer to this, that standing order 34(c)(i) reads, "The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration". The problem I have with this, of course, is that nothing has changed from the original announcement that was made some months ago and therefore it is not immediate. I therefore rule that in my opinion the notice of motion should not be debated at this time.

Ms. Copps: I have no alternative, Mr. Speaker, but to challenge the ruling of the chair.

4:24 p.m.

The House divided on the Speaker's ruling, which was sustained on the following vote:

Ayes

Andrewes, Ashe, Barlow, Bernier, Birch, Brandt, Cousens, Cureatz, Dean, Eaton, Elgie, Eves, Fish, Gordon, Gregory, Grossman, Harris, Havrot, Hennessy, Hodgson, Johnson, J. M., Jones, Kennedy, Kerr, Kolyn, McCaffrey, McCague, McLean, McNeil, Miller, F. S., Mitchell;

Ayes 52; nays 40.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, like a dog chasing its own tail, the government's recent speech is nothing more than a rehash of old promises in a flickering of fading hope. While Ontario burns, the Premier (Mr. Davis) fiddles, fiddles with the future of thousands of unemployed Ontarians across this province by offering nothing more than a rehash of last year's wait-and-see provincial position—wait and see what the federal government is doing; wait and see what happens to interest rates; wait and see what happens in the private sector; wait and see whether the Premier will actually stick around provincial politics long enough to bring our economy to a complete standstill.

Yes, the Premier is engaged in an insidious and untimely charade of Trivial Pursuit. For those of you who are unfamiliar with the game of Trivial Pursuit, the object is to achieve a pie. The key question, to achieve a pie in Ontario, is what Ontario politician who has never balanced a budget would actually have the nerve to present himself as a potential saviour of our country? That is right—William Grenville Davis. But then it should not surprise us that the expansiveness of his present audacity is equalled only by his government's past record of unfulfilled promises.

Let us refer for a moment, and I am sure my friends in the NDP who were decimated back on March 19, 1981, would want to refer for a moment to the comments made by the Premier when he dissolved the Legislature on February 2, 1981, in anticipation of the realities of March 19.

4:30 p.m.

His signal to close the session was, and I quote: "It is clear that a sitting of the present Legislature would be dominated by political rhetoric"—can you imagine political rhetoric?—"and manoeuvring as the various parties elbow each other on their way to the starting line. This is exactly what Ontario does not need at this particular time. What we do need"—and remember this is back in February 1981—"is a new parliament with a strong economic agenda for the next four years." That came, two years ago, from a government that has led us into a period of unprecedented high unemployment and economic stagnation.

Despite the grandiose promises of the "bilge" program, unemployment in Ontario has climbed to almost 600,000 people. Almost one in four young persons in this province does not have a job. The government's response? Consistent cutbacks over the last seven years in the amount of money set aside for summer youth employment. Funding for direct job creation in the last fiscal year totalled only $231 million, although unemployment rose from 8.7 per cent to 12.6 per cent. This when the government does not even mention in its throne speech the difficulties facing steelworkers in my own community and across the province.

What hope does the Tory promise hold for young people struggling to find a place in the Ontario job market? Our former leader predicted this bleak situation back in 1981. The smug response of the government? He was called "Dr. No," "Dr. Negative." If Stuart Smith was Ontario's "Dr. No" the Premier was the "Goldfinger" that rubbed bare to reveal nothing but fool's gold on the government side of the House. He says his slogans worked. In the short term maybe they did, but in the long term a philosopher once said, and the Premier should take note: "Propaganda is a soft weapon. Hold it in your hands long enough and it will move about like a snake and strike the other way."

Again quoting from the Premier's pre-election promises: "We seek a mandate to sustain and improve our major social programs, to continue to ensure that the education of our young, the care of our sick and the provisions for those in need are comparable to the best in the western world." Where have we heard that phrase before? Always "the best in the western world." This from a government that has the highest tax in Canada on those earning between $15,000 and $20,000, in terms of OHIP and personal provincial taxes, of any province in Canada.

"We seek a mandate to take practical and effective measures to control Ontario's environment. Nowhere in North America has more leadership been shown in efforts to control such major concerns as acid rain and liquid industrial waste." This from a government that has allowed the Niagara River to become the dioxin delta of the northern hemisphere, as well as continuing to stand by while Hamilton's Windermere basin is deemed one of the most polluted water bodies in North America.

"We seek a mandate to combat inflation through smaller and more efficient government, avoiding tax increases." This from a government whose first hysterical reaction to majority rule was to go out and purchase a $10-million jet to carry the Premier to fewer than half the airports in Ontario. This from a government that moved in immediately to lower the taxes on brandy and cigars and dining at La Scala while introducing a nickel-and-dime squeeze on every toothpaste user, woman and low-income earner in the province.

This from a government that invested $45 million in Minaki Lodge to protect its own loans. Not only does the government never expect to recover this investment, but the lodge will serve no one but the rich. This from a government that has spent nearly half a billion of taxpayers' dollars on land banking. Finally, this from a government that has invested $650 million of taxpayers' money on Suncor and has lost more than $50 million on its investment to date. This $50 million could have been used to create more than 2,000 Ontario jobs.

What is the member for Leeds (Mr. Runciman) saying to his constituents today about the free enterprise party that bought a quarter loaf of Suncor?

Again from the Premier's statement: "We seek a mandate to stimulate the growth and development of our important resource industry in all parts of the province, but particularly in northern Ontario." I know the member for Nipissing (Mr. Harris) will be interested in this. This from a government that has refused to present a single program to stimulate our mining and forest industries, even though unemployment rates in these areas are almost 30 per cent and 27 per cent respectively. This from a government that has never presented a single policy, even though promised as far back as 1977, that would lead to diversification of the economy of the north and deal with the problems of one-industry towns. People have been forced to leave the north because there simply are not enough job opportunities.

Again from the Premier: "We seek a mandate to improve and enhance the cultural life of this province on a number of fronts." This from a government that followed up with a threatened 15 per cent cutback in budgeting for cultural programs and then increased budgets in communities like my own—a paltry one per cent for the major botanical garden in the whole of Canada.

"A fair-minded and creative approach"—"creative" I will grant—"to Ontario's many cultural and linguistic communities can and must sustain the cultural opportunity of our province." This from a government whose respondent to the throne speech Tuesday did not even have the courage to refer to his leader's recent about-face on French language in Ontario. I guess it is all right to say it in French. C'est okay de le dire en français, mais Ernest Eves n'ose rien dire au sujet de l'école à Mattawa parcequ'il est un exemple typique de l'hypocrisie du gouvernement. The Carleton by-election lives on.

Again from the Premier: "We seek a mandate to take initiatives, not only to assist our farming community but to promote the use of Ontario farm products by our people in the greater interests of self-sufficiency." This from a government that twiddled its thumbs while 176 farmers in Ontario went bankrupt last year, the highest number in Canada. This from a government that appoints an asphalt farmer to oversee the survival of agribusiness in this most crucial time, when his main rural purpose seems to be garnering delegates for the greatest nonleadership race in Ontario's history, and has yet to introduce any single program of its own to deal with the plight of our farmers. This from a government that promised financial assistance to young farmers but then used them as whipping boys for their deficit.

"And, above all, we seek a mandate to make constant and consistent efforts to continue and expand our industrial base, create more jobs, not only through encouraging new and expanded enterprises but also through efforts to enlarge markets for the products and services developed by the working men and women of our province." This from a government that has heralded unprecedented heights in unemployment, stagflation and the destruction of the economy. This from a government that contracts its own personal celebration of the Canadian Constitution, a coin, to an American firm, even when local Ontarians could have done the job. This from a government that would purchase peaches from South Africa, even though we sit in the heart of peach country right here in southern Ontario.

How significant is the future for a steelworker in my community, with unemployment more than 45,000 and prospects for rejuvenation of heavy industry dim? Where are the alternatives for a steelworker?

"In a province with the promise of Ontario, the people we serve will not be content only with a record of past accomplishments. They want a government that could look ahead, plan ahead and assure that our future will be as significant as our past." This from a government that has as its planning source for tomorrow the Innovation Development for Employment Advancement Corp., which in two years has yet to produce any ideas.

"There is every reason to look to the future with confidence and optimism." That confidence and optimism so trumpeted by the Premier was swept away by the realities of March 19.

To quote again from that infamous speech of February 1981: "The people of Ontario have that kind of government today. We must have the courage to do better in terms of our national industrial strength, our job creation, our international competitiveness, our national battle against inflation."

4:40 p.m.

Oh, where have all our promises gone? Two years later, and the only thing the government can offer in its throne speech is more empty rhetoric, more vapid verbiage, more broken promises of the variety that were trumpeted in the realities of March 19.

What of substance has sprung from the recent throne speech? A recognition of women, they might say, with the panacea of one-chauffeur authority in a government that refuses to make a public commitment to equal pay for work of equal value; a government that vetoes a country-wide accord on the seven-year opt-out provision for women in their child-bearing years; a government that refuses to make a universal commitment to accessible day care and sees its own advisory council as a resting place for tired Premier's hacks.

We might say at least the government has finally recognized the need for developing new alternatives to traditional job patterns that are fast disappearing. But what is the government's reaction to the new technology? Quoting from the throne speech: "My government intends to undertake an intensive, extensive and serious study of these projected developments." The Premier studies while Ontario burns.

This throne speech is a disappointment to the farmer who is looking to Ontario for leadership, while the government is spending a smaller percentage of the provincial budget on agriculture than does any other province in Canada.

This throne speech is a disappointment to the steelworker who cannot find a job at the same time as the Ontario Manpower Commission has predicted a shortage of 45,000 skilled workers within three years.

This throne speech is a disappointment to tenants and landlords alike. Our rental housing stimulation program could increase vacancy rates and provide up to 26,000 jobs in the construction and related fields, but the throne speech thought the issue was important enough to accord it two paragraphs.

This throne speech is a disappointment to working people, those who have jobs and those who have lost them through industrial accidents. What happened to the major reforms promised in the changes to the Workers' Compensation Act? Has the fair deal of the last election campaign become the foul-weather friend of labour? Do not force workers to their knees, to begging on the front steps of the Legislature when this government has the means to bring about major and equitable social reform. Do not set up another bureaucracy. Do not set up another level of bureaucracy in the Workers' Compensation Board. Offer a fair deal to workers who have given up their right to litigate in return for income security during compensable illness.

This throne speech is a major disappointment to all members of the social development committee and those across the province who have been victims of perpetrators of spousal assault. An all-party committee thought enough of the problem to issue a unanimous report recommending major funding changes to help transition houses survive, yet this government has chosen to ignore the whole issue in the throne speech.

The speech is a major disappointment for those who are very concerned about creeping privatization in Ontario's health care system and the state of health care in Ontario as a whole. I am sure the Minister of Health is well aware of my comments in the past on creeping privatization. Since he seems to have people at every meeting copying down words of people who say things in private, he will no doubt be aware that I have been very concerned and my party has been concerned for a number of months about the creeping privatization that we see affecting the system.

AMI (Canada) Ltd. is the thin edge of the wedge. Extendicare buying out a potential chronic care wing of an acute care hospital is the thin edge of the wedge. An increase in OHIP premiums is the thin edge of the wedge. A study undertaken by this government into user fees is the thin edge of the wedge.

The Treasurer suggests OHIP fees will be increased for the third time in four budgets and repeats publicly that he would like to see user fees introduced to help cover health care costs. I am sure the Minister of Health is aware of the position of his Treasurer on user fees, and yet this speech mentioned nothing about health care.

This speech is a major disappointment to those who look to the government for leadership. The so-called sound management lauded in the speech is typified in the bloated budget and borrowing of Ontario Hydro. With almost 50 per cent more generating capacity than it needs to serve Ontario, Hydro justified its overproduction by expensive advertising campaigns to convince consumers that bloated is better.

What leadership has this government shown with the restraint package and the noninclusion of doctors? What leadership has this government shown with respect to the tragic deaths at the Hospital for Sick Children? The Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) has placed all of us on a dizzy merry-go-round of innuendo, rumour and delay that makes a mockery of whatever justice may ever be brought to bear in this painful situation.

This speech was a painful vacuum for those families with children in the six treatment centres for the developmentally handicapped across Ontario. The government, in typical fashion if we refer back to the whole problem of mental health deinstitutionalization, has moved ahead to close first, plan later, even though living memories of the mistakes of the mental health system make front-page headlines with regularity in communities across this province.

Where other jurisdictions lead, we follow. But government by Gallup is catching up.

J. E. Chamberlain said: "I would like to live in a nation in which I would never be unconscious of the struggle of its stubborn nobodies, and in which the ideal excitements of mind and spirit would be implicated in the realities of its circumstances."

This government has long since abandoned the forgotten nobodies. This government has long since traded in excitement of mind and spirit for the banal certainty of tracking opinion polls. Let us dare to challenge our people—challenge them with a $1-million construction program that will bring 15,000 units into the market; challenge them with skills training integrated into the final years of secondary school.

In this fast-changing world, skills obtained in the past can quickly become obsolescent or unmarketable. The government should move to provide extensive skills retraining and updating programs so as to ensure that individuals do not find themselves without a marketable skill and that our economy does not stagnate as a result of a mismatch between the skills we have and the skills we need. Such a program will necessarily involve government and business support and must be designed so that any individual may be self-supporting during the retraining period. Challenge them with opportunities so that small business people and farmers, the backbone of our economy, will not have that backbone crushed.

I happen to have a brother—he is here in the audience today—who is in the job market himself and who, like many young people, faces disappointments and disillusionment. Let us not disillusion the young people of this province. Let us not send them to other provinces, to other countries. Let us challenge them so that we can provide a tremendous future in this province.

A joint government-business task force to examine the potential for the private sector to provide a wide range of products and services now provided by the government would be a start. As opposed to the government's present ad hoc, Band-Aid approaches to the agricultural industry, there must be a dedication and commitment to ensure a sense of security for the future. There is urgent need for the implementation of a strategy for agriculture within which farmers are able to make long-term farming decisions.

For the young and starting farmer, there must be a long-term financing program. The young farmer of Ontario has even more difficulty competing, since every other province in Canada has a better long-term agricultural program for young farmers. Challenge them with a health system where prevention, not treatment, is the primary objective. Challenge them with a social system that stimulates personal initiative without destroying the safety net so vital to a humane society.

Challenge them with job opportunities. The single most pressing issue by far, which the upcoming budget must deal with, is the unemployment crisis in Ontario and the need for job creation initiatives. The bulk of job creation in the province must come from the private sector, and the government must do everything it can to provide a favourable climate for this sector. But when shortfalls occur, as they have on a massive scale in the past few years, direct action by the government is required.

Cutbacks in spending on youth employment at this time are entirely unconscionable. This government is already spending 23 per cent less on aid for unemployed youth than it did two years ago, and it is cutting back programs while unemployment rises. The young people of Ontario do not deserve to be treated so callously. We must challenge our youth with programs that will give them jobs.

We must provide our young people with hope, not despair. We must offer our farmers solutions, not bankruptcies. We must offer our workers jobs, not promises. We must offer a government of leadership, not hollow promises and unfulfilled dreams. For, in the words of Arthur Meighen: "Loyalty to the ballot box is not necessarily loyalty to the nation; it is not even loyalty to the multitude. Democracy has failed and fallen in many lands, and political captains in Canada must have courage to lead rather than servility to follow, if our institutions are going to survive."

The Deputy Speaker: Ms. Copps moves, seconded by Mr. Nixon, that the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session be amended by the addition of the following words:

"This House, however, regrets that the speech from the throne fails to address the most serious problems facing Ontario today, reflecting a total lack of government initiative, leadership and policy necessary to resolve these concerns, namely, the continuing unemployment crisis, particularly among this province's youth; the pressing need for a definitive industrial strategy, particularly the need for massive training and retraining programs; the urgent need for affordable housing in this province; the preservation of Ontario's health, social and educational sectors, and particularly support for hospitals, day care, services for the elderly and post-secondary institutions; the continuing problems facing farmers during these recessionary times. Therefore, this House declares its lack of confidence in the government."

On motion by Mr. Laughren, the debate was adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Gregory: Mr. Speaker, there will not be a statement of business this afternoon, but it will come tomorrow. Tomorrow we will be on interim supply.

The House adjourned at 4:54 p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Friday, April 22, 1983

The House met at 10 a.m.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

PILOT PROJECT IN TELECOMMUNICATIONS SERVICES

Hon. Mr. Wiseman: Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure for me to be able to share with the House initiatives designed to identify new ways of saving money. The Ministry of Government Services is undertaking a pilot project that should not only identify dollar-saving opportunities but will also provide information to enable us to improve service to the people of Ontario and our client ministries.

More than 85 per cent of all government business is conducted by telephone. That amounts to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 130 million telephone calls to and from government every year. We want to know how efficiently and effectively we are using our telecommunications system. We want to know how and where we can save money and we want to know how we can improve our service.

In order to collect this information, the Ministry of Government Services is testing a data-gathering system which will enable us to determine such things as the volume of calls on a telephone, how many times the phone rings before being answered, the number of calls coming in after normal working hours, as well as the chargeable calls to information.

Private sector corporations have shown savings of up to 25 per cent in telecommunications costs through this type of evaluation process, a very attractive figure in this time of constraint. During the trial period the datapulse system will be located solely at the Ministry of Government Services within the Queen's Park complex on a limited number of telephones.

The information we are gathering is purely statistical in nature. There is no capability in this procedure, nor would anyone want there to be, for monitoring conversations. We simply believe there is always a better way of doing things and we want to know how.

I would like to point out this is just one more example of the many initiatives being undertaken by this government and my ministry to identify potential cost savings as well as to promote new ways of better serving the people of Ontario.

NIAGARA RIVER WATER QUALITY

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring the honourable members up to date on my ministry's continuing efforts to safeguard water quality in the Niagara River.

Late last summer, members may recall, I initiated an exhaustive study of the many factors that led to the gross contamination by waste chemicals of the Love Canal area in Niagara Falls, New York. Between 1942 and 1952 Hooker Chemicals and Plastics Corp. deposited an estimated 22,000 tons of chemical waste along the course of this abandoned waterway. Later, the city of Niagara Falls added municipal garbage. In addition, both during and after the Second World War, various United States federal agencies deposited unspecified toxic chemical wastes on this site.

Subsequently, of course, the President of the United States declared a state of emergency at Love Canal and the area was evacuated of some 2,000 residents. Since that time the United States state and federal agencies have conducted various studies and embarked upon certain initiatives to keep the contamination where it is and, above all, to keep it away from the shared resource, the Niagara River. At its closest point Love Canal is only a quarter mile from the Niagara River.

Quite frankly, neither I nor my officials have ever been completely satisfied with the progress the Americans are making. While the drinking water in communities on the Canadian side of the river is perfectly safe, as shown by our constant monitoring, we are conscious of the potential threat that exists if abandoned dump sites, such as Love Canal, are not properly controlled.

Members will recall that I have reported to them the discovery of trace amounts of dioxin and other chemicals as the result of our intensive, ongoing monitoring of water and testing of fish in the Niagara River and its tributaries. Most of these contaminants, we are convinced, are from American sources.

It was against this background of concern that last summer my ministry engaged a highly reputable engineering firm, Geologic Testing Consultants Ltd. of Ottawa, to carry out an independent technical review and interpretation of the hydrogeologic conditions of Love Canal. We wanted reliable, up-to-date data on which to base our future actions.

This report has now been completed and has been reviewed, resulting in a series of urgent recommendations which I am presenting to the government of the United States. The government of Ontario is asking the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, to convey these recommendations to the government of the United States and to use the full weight of his office to make sure they are forwarded to the United States Environmental Protection Agency.

I would also hope and expect that the federal Minister of the Environment, the Honourable John Roberts, will add his own endorsement to the recommendations that are being put forward and with which, I might add, his staff are in full agreement.

In summary, this what we are asking the appropriate American authorities for: the provision of funds for the cleanup—not just further investigation, as things now stand—of sewers, creeks and outfalls that have been contaminated from the Love Canal area; the dredging of contaminated sediment from Cayuga Creek, which both we and the Americans know to be heavily contaminated and which drains into the Niagara River; a monitoring system to establish the long-term effectiveness of remedial work already planned by the Environmental Protection Agency; additional monitoring programs designed and put in place to show whether there is a possibility of ground water at the site moving downward into the bedrock below.

If all the actions contained in these recommendations are implemented, together with the remedial measures already in hand by the Environmental Protection Agency, I believe that the problems caused by Love Canal will in large measure be contained; and if the other waste disposal sites adjacent to the Niagara River are controlled to the same extent, we will have made a tremendous stride towards protecting and improving the river's quality.

In conclusion, we must all realize that Canada and the United States are the joint custodians and protectors of the Niagara River. As the province which shares this waterway, Ontario has the mandate and the responsibility to take action on behalf of its residents.

DEATHS AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, I have a statement regarding the deaths of patients at the Hospital for Sick Children in 1980 and 1981. I have two basic matters to discuss and I would like to provide as much background information as possible on events leading up to the decisions through what has been an exceedingly challenging time for all involved.

First, no criminal charges will be laid at this time against any person who may be responsible for these deaths. Although this case is exceedingly complex, the reason for the Metropolitan Toronto Police and my senior criminal law advisers coming to this conclusion is simply that there is not sufficient evidence at this time to warrant the laying of any additional criminal charges.

I have personally reviewed the extensive police report, the report of the Ministry of Health and the Centers for Disease Control, the so-called Atlanta report, as well as other material, and I have met on numerous occasions with my officials and the police. I agree completely with the consensus reached by the police and my legal advisers as to the laying of additional criminal charges.

I hope honourable members will note that twice already I have used the phrase "at this time" in relation to the decision regarding charges. I want to assure members that if evidence ever becomes available to warrant the laying of additional charges, the public can be assured that charges will be laid and a vigorous prosecution pursued.

The second matter I want to discuss has to do with the process of accountability to the public in relation to the deaths and the circumstances surrounding them. Members will recall that the Ministry of Health announced a review of conditions and procedures in place at the hospital after the deaths. This extensive and comprehensive review was conducted by Mr. Justice Charles Dubin of the Supreme Court of Ontario and a team of medical experts. Their recommendations have either been acted upon or are under very active consideration by the hospital staff and administration. I should also add that there have been no unexplained deaths since March 1981.

I have already referred to a very extensive report of the Centers for Disease Control, which dealt with both patient care issues at the hospital and the cause of death of a number of infants. I need not repeat what I said in the Legislature on February 21 about that report and its conclusions except to indicate that all issues relevant to patient care were brought immediately to the attention of hospital officials. Even though there have been these two intensive studies by two separate authorities, as well as a lengthy preliminary hearing of the criminal charges lasting some 44 days, it is my view that a further public forum is required to deal with the circumstances surrounding the many tragic deaths at the Hospital for Sick Children.

On my recommendation the cabinet has decided there is to be the establishment of a royal commission of inquiry to look into and report publicly on the circumstances surrounding the deaths at the hospital and the subsequent criminal proceedings. The commissioner is the Honourable Mr. Justice Samuel G. M. Grange, a member of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, formerly a member of the High Court of Justice for Ontario, a most experienced, distinguished and respected jurist. He will have available to him the resources necessary to conduct the inquiry, including the authority to engage counsel, investigators and any other staff who may be necessary for his purpose.

I would like to explain briefly some of the considerations we have had to face in the last few weeks in what has been one of the most difficult and complex situations I have encountered as Attorney General. I hope you will recall my statement of February 21, in which I said, "we as a government are committed to providing the fullest possible accounting of the events and circumstances that led to this tragedy." That commitment will be met.

The terms of reference for the commission, a copy of which is attached to my statement, expressly provide that the inquiry is not to involve any conclusion of law regarding civil or criminal responsibility. This provision was made to ensure that the commission would not function or be regarded as a criminal or civil trial. Trial by commission of inquiry is simply a concept that is totally foreign to the laws and the traditions of this province.

While it is understandable that many members of the public would wish to have an inquiry to determine responsibility for the tragic deaths, this cannot be the function of a royal commission. The purpose of a public inquiry is not to attach criminal culpability. It is not a forum to put individuals on trial. The just and proper place to make and defend allegations of crime or civil liability is in a court of law.

In this context I am reminded of the remarks of an eminent Ontario jurist, Mr. Justice Riddell of the Ontario Court of Appeal, whose observations almost 50 years ago are equally applicable today: "A royal commission is not for the purpose of trying a case or a charge against anyone, any person or any institution, but for the purpose of informing the people concerning the facts of the matter to be inquired into. The object of a royal commission is to determine facts, not to try individuals or institutions, and this consideration is sufficient to guide the commissioner in the performance of his duty."

This principle is particularly important and relevant here because there have been criminal proceedings in relation to the deaths and civil proceedings are pending with respect to the initiation and prosecution of those charges. We are very sensitive to the need not to interfere with or undermine the rights of any litigant whose matter is now before the courts or who may come before the courts in the future.

I am advised that there is no precedent for an inquiry of this nature. To our knowledge there has never in Ontario been a commission of inquiry into deaths which are thought to have been the result of deliberate criminal acts by a person or persons unknown. Questions of that nature are ordinarily resolved in a court of criminal jurisdiction. Questions of unexplained deaths are ordinarily resolved in a coroner's inquest. Both of those mechanisms serve as the traditional methods by which the public obtains full knowledge of the circumstances of death.

Having determined that there will be no criminal trial in the immediate future and having considered the jurisdiction and procedural limitations of a coroner's inquest, we are of the view that a full public inquiry is the only method available to ensure a full public airing of all the facts referred to in the terms of reference.

The deaths, the legal proceedings which followed the deaths, and the subsequent inquiries and investigations, some of which have not been made public, have left unanswered questions of great public concern. It is in the interests of the parents of the children, the dedicated personnel at the Hospital for Sick Children and the administration of justice generally that the many issues raised, to the extent that it is humanly possible, be dealt with in a public forum.

It would presumably not be necessary for the commission to repeat all of the work done by the Report of the Hospital for Sick Children Review Committee chaired by the Honourable Mr. Justice Charles Dubin, the Report on Mortality on the Cardiology Service in a Children's Hospital in Toronto, Canada, by the Centers for Disease Control and the Ontario Ministry of Health and the 44 days of proceedings at the preliminary hearing. The terms of reference refer to the undesirability of duplicating unnecessarily the work done by them or unnecessarily subjecting witnesses to further questioning.

Mr. Justice Grange is therefore empowered to draw from such reports and the preliminary hearing whatever evidence he deems relevant and appropriate and to dispense with the hearing of any testimony that he considers unnecessary. This would ensure that witnesses and institutions are not subjected to unnecessary repetition of previous questioning, but it does leave the commissioner the widest possible discretion to hear whatever evidence he considers relevant.

The commissioner is given the full power under the Public Inquiries Act to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents and other relevant material. He has been given a specific mandate to hear whatever evidence he considers necessary to ensure full public knowledge of the completeness of the matters referred to in the terms of reference.

The specific matters to be inquired into are referred to as follows, and I am quoting directly from the order in council, which is attached in part:

"To inquire into and report on and make any recommendations with respect to how and by what means children who died in cardiac wards 4A and 4B at the Hospital for Sick Children between July 1, 1980, and March 31, 1981, came to their deaths;

"To inquire into, determine and report on the circumstances surrounding the investigation, institution and prosecution of charges arising out of the deaths of the above-mentioned four infants."

These terms of reference are designed to provide an opportunity for the fullest public knowledge of the circumstances of the deaths and the criminal proceedings that followed them. The qualification to which I referred earlier, that the inquiry is not to express any conclusion of law regarding civil or criminal responsibility, will, I repeat, serve to protect the interests of any past, present or future litigant in civil or criminal matters.

While it confers this protection, it does not restrict the commissioner from making the fullest findings of fact and any observations or recommendations he may have, short of determining any question that is or may ultimately be a matter for determination in a court of law.

I would like to say a brief word about the police investigation and about the parents of the children involved. As a parent of six, I have some understanding of the anguish and frustration these parents have felt over this tragic matter and have had to endure for over two years. At the conclusion of the police report of their investigation, the homicide squad officers asked that the parents be personally advised of any developments. They wrote:

"It is our firm belief that their feelings should be considered above everything else. No arrest, no particular line of investigation nor any particular type of public inquiry will ever bring their children back to life. For the most part the parents simply want to know, 'Was my baby murdered?'"

The police have again been in contact with the parents in recent days in an attempt to keep them informed of developments. The police investigators, together with my crown law officers, are now preparing a detailed written report for each family, setting out to the fullest extent possible in the circumstances the medical circumstances of each death.

Thousands of hours of diligent work have been put into this case by the homicide investigators. Expert help was provided by my ministry and other ministries whenever required. Medical specialists from throughout North America were made available as analysts and consultants. For several months we engaged experts from York University to analyze the enormous amount of information and statistics. We installed a terminal at the hospital and connected it to my ministry's computer to help digest the material and assemble it in useful formats for the investigators and scientists.

The police made use of the expertise available through the behavioural sciences section of the Federal Bureau of Investigation academy at Quantico, Virginia. A full-scale epidemiologic investigation was completed, using the resources and experts of several Ontario ministries as well as the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta and outside consultants in paediatric cardiology, pathology and pharmacology. With the consent of the parents involved, nine exhumations were carried out at the height of the investigation. Our own Centre of Forensic Sciences conducted the analysis of tissue samples preserved at the time of death and obtained after exhumation.

I mention this to give members and the public at least some indication of the scope of the investigation and the complexities that were encountered. It is worth noting that although they approached these deaths from different perspectives and backgrounds, the police investigators and the medical investigators came to essentially the same conclusions. As well, it is important to keep in mind that these deaths represent a tragedy of horrific proportions, simply unprecedented in Canada's history.

In conclusion, I would state that there is no guarantee that all of the unanswered questions will be resolved as a result of the inquiry. However, it does present the most appropriate mechanism for a high degree of public disclosure. I am sure its deliberations and findings will underline the importance of the accountability of society's great institutions to the people that they serve.

ORAL QUESTIONS

DEATHS AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Attorney General.

In the terms of reference in the statement he tabled today he seems to make some limitations. If one looks to term of reference 4, he states that the public inquiry has been empowered with the responsibility of inquiring into determining and reporting "on the circumstances surrounding the investigation, institution and prosecution of charges arising out of the deaths of the above-mentioned four infants."

Can he clear up that the investigation will be empowered with the possibility of looking at institutions and all of the full details, not only surrounding how the babies died, which is referred to in order in council section 3, but also the treatment by the Attorney General's office and by the police after all of the 28 deaths were discovered?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, I hope there is no confusion over the two areas that will be inquired into.

First, all the deaths that occurred between the dates of July 1980 and March 1981 will be the subject matter of the investigation. The other fundamental aspect of the inquiry relates to the police investigation and the prosecution of charges. That is where the four specific infants are involved because the criminal charges arise out of the deaths of four infants. The inquiry in so far as the cause of death of infants in that period is concerned will cover all children who died in the cardiac wards during that period.

Ms. Copps: Not having had the opportunity of seeing the full details of the Atlanta Centers for Disease Control report, which I understand the minister has been studying for a number of weeks now, it was my understanding that was the mandate of the Atlanta Centers for Disease Control and that they determined, as a result of information which the Attorney General issued in the House, that at least seven of the deaths were purposeful overdoses of digoxin.

The question I would like to determine is whether the public inquiry will be mandated not only with looking at the conduct of the crown attorney, the Attorney General's office and the police, as well as events following the laying of charges in the case of the four deaths, but also with looking at the treatment by the Attorney General's office and the police and the whole series of events following the discovery of 28 potential overdoses?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I would simply ask the member to read the terms of reference. I think they are self-explanatory.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, can the Attorney General please explain to this House why the terms of reference do not include a specific section which addresses the question of the investigation by the hospital authorities themselves of those 28 deaths which occurred between 1980 and 1981? Why is that question not being specifically addressed? Surely that is central to the question of restoring public confidence in the hospital and answering the question that the parents have, which is, "Why was my child allowed to die?"

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference are very broad in that respect. They simply say, "to inquire into, report on and make any recommendations with respect to how and by what means children who died in cardiac wards 4A and 4B at the Hospital for Sick Children between July 1, 1980, and March 31, 1981, came to their deaths." I think that is a very broad term of reference and appropriate in the circumstances.

Ms. Copps: I think the second issue that certainly must be highlighted in the statement made by the minister today is that he continues to insist that the possibility of charges being laid has not been eliminated. In fact he repeats, for all and sundry who may not have heard, that "at this time" are the operative words in his statement. I am sorry that over the last few months the minister has operated more by rumour and innuendo.

I wonder if the minister can confirm to this House that the police investigation has been completed and that there will be no charges laid. If the police investigation is not complete, what has changed since the time when we called for a public inquiry one year ago and the minister said he could not call for a public inquiry as long as the police investigation was going on?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I will try to explain it once again. We said that as long as there was an active police investigation it would be inappropriate to have a public inquiry. I repeat what I said a few moments ago, which is that the fact of a public inquiry into deaths which are believed to have been deliberately caused is simply without precedent in this province. I would hope the member would appreciate the reason for that.

We are satisfied that the police investigation has been concluded as far as an active investigation is concerned. Obviously we expect, as has happened throughout, that additional information will come to the police that will have to be investigated. In this province charges have been laid, on occasion, many years after the deaths. Obviously one would hope that will not be the case here, but to suggest that the police investigation has been concluded absolutely and for all time when the simple fact is that the belief is there have been children who have died as a result of a deliberate overdose of digoxin is simply a ludicrous suggestion.

NEIGHBOURHOOD SUPPORT SERVICES

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Provincial Secretary for Social Development, or the superminister. The minister will be aware that in recent days the report of the Joint Task Force on Neighbourhood Support Services has been released here in Metropolitan Toronto. As she knows, that task force report paints a dark and sorry picture about the state of community-based social service agencies in much of Metropolitan Toronto.

I am wondering, and I know other members are as well, as are the many client groups and the people they serve—the elderly, the singles, low-income families and others—what precisely will be the reaction of the government of Ontario vis-à-vis the report I have referred to.

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, through you to the honourable member, I have not had an opportunity to read that report. I have not seen the report. All I have seen is the comments in the newspapers. It has been brought to my attention by the front page of the Toronto Star today that the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea) has already indicated there is more money available for many of the agencies referred to in that report.

Mr. Conway: Will the superminister for social development give this House an undertaking that she will read this report as soon as possible, notwithstanding the commitments made by her junior colleague, one of the line ministers, the member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Drea)?

Will the superminister not want to agree that the government's social policy turns on healthy community-based services, particularly in the social development area, and that this report indicates clearly that those social service agencies with a community base here in Metropolitan Toronto face an immediate critical situation? Will she not agree that is a situation of immediate concern that ought to be redressed at the earliest opportunity?

Will she also give an undertaking to look seriously at the proposal for a neighbourhood support fund, estimated to be worth in the first instance roughly $21 million with a large share of provincial lottery funding? Will the superminister give an undertaking to the people of Metropolitan Toronto, the disfranchised, the alienated, the lonely, who are everywhere reported in this report, that she will give that recommendation very serious attention and report back to this House at her earliest convenience?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: This government has always been concerned where there are any disadvantaged people who are not receiving the amount of support they should be. Unfortunately, those who wrote the report and prepared it have not seen fit to send it to my office. I will attempt to have one delivered to my office and then I will read it.

To the rather snide remarks of the opposition member, I would also like to respond that I do not consider myself a superminister and there are no junior ministries within our social policy field.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I think there is a general agreement around the House, Mr. Speaker, that nobody thinks she is a superminister.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Interjections.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: It was only meant in a funny way, not in a serious way, and was hardly snide at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Question, please.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I am sure the minister has a sense of humour, as I know.

Mr. Speaker, what specific plans does the minister have to make sure there is a comprehensive and not a gap-filled network of neighbourhood services in places such as Metropolitan Toronto and other places in the province? While she is answering the question, would she perhaps hand us a copy of the little briefing notes that the junior minister gave her a few minutes ago?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, I have no comments to make to that very snide and uncalled-for question.

DEATHS AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the inquiry that he has established today, I would like to ask the Attorney General if he will please explain again to me and to the Legislature why the inquiry in a sense is being restricted.

I simply ask the Attorney General to look at sections 3 and 4 of the terms of reference. As I read section 3, it is essentially a medical inquiry into the cause of the deaths of either the 36 or the 28, depending on what the numbers are, that took place between July 1980 and March 1981. Section 4 is limited to an investigation of the charges arising out of the deaths of the four children who were the subject of the criminal prosecution against Susan Nelles.

Does the Attorney General not think a third question is being left unanswered, and that is, what were the management practices, the investigative practices, the general administrative practices of the hospital between 1980 and 1981 that allowed that number of deaths, for a time at least, to go undetected and unreported? Does he not think this question, which deals in a sense with the accountability of the hospital administration and procedures itself, has to be addressed by the public inquiry if we are going to restore full public confidence in the hospital?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: First of all, Mr. Speaker, if the honourable member will look at Mr.

Justice Dubin's report again, as I recall, he devotes a whole section to that issue.

Second, I should point out that the matters of the internal procedures in the hospital during that period may very well be relevant to the cause of deaths if there were inadequacies, as has been suggested or implied in the question, and those obviously can be looked into, in my view, within these terms of reference. If there are any internal procedures in the hospital that could have contributed to the cause of these deaths—and this is what we are interested in—then they certainly can be inquired into under the terms of reference that have been given to Mr. Justice Grange.

Mr. Rae: The Attorney General knows full well that Mr. Justice Dubin's inquiry was limited and that it was specifically related to the future. He says time and time again, "I am looking to the future; I am not looking to the past." It was not primarily an inquiry into what had taken place in ward 4; it was primarily an inquiry into what kinds of changes could be made for the future. It was not the kind of inquiry that is needed to restore full public confidence with respect to the events that occurred.

I simply ask the Attorney General, given the fact that he stated in the House today he is willing for the inquiry to look into this question, why he does not make that a specific item in the terms of reference. He knows very well that once the public inquiry has been established he is no longer in charge of it and Mr. Justice Grange is limited by the words I am sure he is going to be reading very strictly, as will counsel for the hospital and counsel for everybody else included in this affair.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I repeat essentially what I said a few moments ago. Mr. Justice Dubin did have to examine the procedures that were in place during this period. That forms part of his report, if the leader of the New Democratic Party would care to look at that report. I repeat what I said a moment ago, to the extent that the procedures in place at the hospital could have contributed, or the inadequacy of any procedures could have contributed, to the deaths of any of these infants, they will be inquired into. To me that is quite clear on the face of the terms of reference.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, frankly I am shocked that the Attorney General has such a fundamental misunderstanding of the purpose of the Dubin inquiry. I think if he goes back and reviews the statement made by his colleague the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) in calling the Dubin inquiry, the minister specifically stated that the inquiry was to look at present procedures as they existed in the hospital and was restricted from looking at the events surrounding and leading up to the deaths of the four babies on wards 4A and 4B at that time.

Will the minister not agree that the terms of reference as stated here in the House today are limited, that the refusal, or perhaps the decision not to include the other 24 deaths in the expanded terms of reference included in point 4 could seriously undermine the possibility of getting to the facts, the post-mortem treatment of this issue by the hospital, by the Attorney General's office, by the crown attorney and by the police investigation, and in particular the treatment of the parents involved in all the 28 deaths?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, if the honourable member has read the terms of reference I would say she has clearly misunderstood them. I would simply ask her to reread the terms of reference and she will see that all the relevant matters relating to the deaths of all the children during this period will be part of the inquiry.

Mr. Rae: I think one of the problems in the way the government has handled this whole affair, from the time the Minister of Health established the Dubin inquiry and in regard to the extraordinary delay in the decision to launch this royal commission, is that the critical question in the minds of not only a great many citizens of this province but I suggest in the minds of the parents of those children who so tragically died in those months, may well go unanswered.

That critical question surely is not simply the spectacular, headline-grabbing question of murder or nonmurder, but a much more difficult question: How is it in a hospital that is a world-class institution, an institution whose reputation we all want to protect and defend, 36 deaths could have been allowed to occur in the months in question and many of those deaths were unreported, certain conclusions not being drawn quickly enough to get to the root of this thing? Why were they allowed to remain undetected and unreported over such an extended period of time?

I think the Attorney General has an obligation to the people of this province and to the parents of those children to deal specifically with that question and to stop fluffing around and leaking things and shuffling it off on other inquiries that never had to address that question. He should simply add another term of reference that will deal specifically with the question of how it is that this number of deaths could have gone undetected and unreported for such a long period of time in the Hospital for Sick Children.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: If the leader of the third party harboured the slightest sense of responsibility about anything, he would not be deliberately attempting to confuse unnecessarily a very tragic, complex issue. I think he should be embarrassed by the nonsense he is spouting. It is quite clear the terms of reference are adequate for the commissioner to inquire into anything that is relevant. The member knows that, and the fact that at this time he wants to turn this into a petty issue of political partisanship hardly does him very much credit.

Mr. Rae: It is called accountability, something the Attorney General does not know very much about.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

SECURITY OF TENURE IN RENTAL UNITS

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, by way of a second question, I would like to ask the Attorney General whether or not he is aware of an increasing practice in Metropolitan Toronto whereby the Landlord and Tenant Act is being undermined by buildings being sold to limited companies, to tenants in common in those limited companies, which is resulting in many tenants fearing that they will be evicted as a result of this loophole, in a sense, in the Landlord and Tenant Act.

I know the Attorney General is familiar with a recent decision of the Divisional Court in the Medeiros case, which has given rise to concern among a great many tenants. The Attorney General should be aware that there are tenants at 41 Lake Shore Drive, 22 Allanhurst Drive, 30 Allanhurst Drive, 785 Brown's Line, 3621 Lake Shore Boulevard West and 3625 Lake Shore Boulevard West, where there are literally hundreds of apartments which are now being threatened by this practice, which is increasingly common.

I would like to ask the Attorney General, is he aware of this development and is he prepared to introduce amendments to the Landlord and Tenant Act right away in order to provide some security of tenure for the tenants who are currently in these buildings?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are aware of this, and I think it is fair to describe it as a problem. This is a matter that has been under active review by our ministry, the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing and the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations. Some specific proposals are being discussed at this time and I would hope that within the next 10 days we will be able to make a joint statement to the House as to what might be appropriate legislation.

Mr. Rae: I would simply indicate to the Attorney General that this is not an academic issue. In the gallery today, Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce to you and to the Attorney General Mrs. Bozene Zapletal, who is a 74-year-old widow living at 30 Allanhurst Drive and who has received an eviction notice from someone who is a part of one of these tenancies in common. That eviction notice takes effect on June 30, 1983.

I want to ask the Attorney General whether he will bring in legislation as soon as possible to protect people like Mrs. Zapletal who are going to be facing eviction unless something is done very soon.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I repeat, we are aware of the situation and the matter is under very active review. I cannot commit the government to introduce any specific legislation until it has, of course, been approved by the executive council of this province. I indicated that I expected we would be in a position to advise the House as to what we intended to do and obviously it would be desirable if we could do that as soon as possible, but I cannot commit the government in advance of a decision by the cabinet of this province.

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, the Attorney General will recall that on Wednesday, at a meeting with representatives of the Federation of Metro Tenants' Associations, he was advised by a lawyer acting on behalf of tenants that a number of cases of evictions would come up by the end of May. He will also recall that he was asked to examine a private member's bill which I introduced on Tuesday as a possible solution to the problem.

Has he examined that bill and is he prepared at least to assure the House that legislation will be put before us by the end of May before those court cases are heard?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say anything other than what I have already said. This is not a decision to be made by an individual member; it has to be made by the government of this province. I expect a decision will be made in the very near future and the House will be advised accordingly.

TILE DRAINAGE

Mr. Ruston: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture and Food with regard to tile drainage. In view of the ongoing need for tile drainage of agricultural land, which can increase production yields of up to 50 per cent and return $18 for every dollar invested, will the minister assure us that the interest rate under the program will be reduced to the former eight per cent level in recognition of the present low cost of borrowing to the government, and will he adjust the program so it covers 75 per cent of the drainage projects rather than the present 60 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, I expect to be announcing details of the 1983 tile drainage program within the next week.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, in view of the government commitment through the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development program, which stated that one million acres of land would be drained in eastern and northern Ontario, the high interest rates the government has placed on that program now render it totally ineffective. In the case of one municipality in my riding, the township of Russell, where last year when we had lower interest rates there were 23 applications, only two people are waiting this year. Does this not make the program totally ineffective?

Is it not a fact that while the government is continuing with these high interest rates it will never achieve anything close to its objective of draining one million acres in eastern and northern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely sure what point the honourable member is trying to make, but let me remind him that last year the program was restructured. The member may recall that while the legislation says support may be granted for up to 75 per cent of the work, in earlier years the level of support ranged very widely from as low as around 30 per cent in some townships to as high as 75 per cent in a very few townships. I recommended to all municipalities last year that they grant support at 60 per cent, which is roughly the average level of support of earlier years.

In addition, we indicated from the outset that the priority areas were eastern and northern Ontario. Every township in eastern Ontario in 1982 got, to the penny, what it asked for to spend on tile drainage, including in Prescott and Russell, to the—

Mr. Boudria: That is not the point. Nobody is using it.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: It is the point.

Mr. Boudria: No, the program is ineffective. Nobody is using it. Your interest rates are too high.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think you have answered the question. Thank you.

NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES LTD.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Attorney General and it relates to the decision of his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Elgie) and the Ontario Securities Commission not to proceed with charges under the Securities Act against Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., Conrad Black and Edward Battle.

I refer to his colleague's comment on April 19 that "the Attorney General, in conversations and correspondence with me a week ago today"—that is, April 12, the day of the expiration of the limitation period—"indicated that some of his crown law officers had a differing point of view and asked if, in the light of that, I would ask the commission to review its decision." It goes on to say that this he did, and that his representative attended the meeting of the commission on April 12.

What exactly did the minister ask of his colleague with respect to that investigation carried on by the Ontario Securities Commission?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that we received a copy of the report of the Ontario Securities Commission investigators on April 9. It was reviewed and our law officers—having been injected into the process at an early stage, which was unusual, but given the ongoing criminal investigation; that is the way events unfolded—were of the view that the recommendations in that report were sound. When we learned they were not going to be accepted by the OSC, I was of the view that the interests of the administration of justice required that I at least request the minister responsible for the legislation to ask the commission to review its decision.

As the member for Riverdale knows very well, and he has some real degree of expertise in these matters, this legislation is largely regulatory legislation and any prosecutions under it require the consent of the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations.

In my view, the Legislature, in structuring the legislation, obviously was of the view that a certain amount of prosecutorial discretion should reside within the responsibility of the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. As I understand the legislation, in exercising that prosecutorial discretion as to whether to give a consent, the primary advisory body for him is the Ontario Securities Commission because it possesses a degree of expertise in relation to the regulation of the securities market as to what is in the interests of the market and the public interest that does not necessarily reside within the ranks of the crown law officers.

It was simply our view that, given the evidentiary base as we understood it, this matter merited reconsideration by the OSC and I advised the minister accordingly. I really do not think I can say anything more at this time because the criminal investigation into these matters has not been concluded.

Mr. Renwick: Since his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations did not direct the commission to proceed, since the limitation period expired at midnight on April 12 with respect to the offences under section 118 of the Securities Act, and since his colleague indicated quite clearly he had not had any request from the Attorney General with respect to giving his consent if he were asked and, if he were not asked, asking him to direct the commission to lay the charges, is the Attorney General now precluded, as a result of that decision, from considering the laying of any charges under section 118 of the Ontario Securities Act, and is he now limited in his ongoing police investigation to the question of whether charges should be laid under the Criminal Code?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: With respect, and it may be that there are some who have other views, it is my view that the member for Riverdale is in error in part of his remarks.

First, if he will consult others and review the statute he will find that the minister in that statute has the power, under earlier sections, to direct an independent investigation into some issues, and as a result of those investigations, to direct the securities commission to do certain things. However, if the commission investigates matters on its own initiative, then the role of the minister is to consent to be requested, with respect to a consent to prosecutions if the commission so requests. I would like to point out that distinction to the member. That is my understanding and, therefore, If I am correct, he is in error in what he said.

Mr. Renwick: We will have ample opportunity to deal with it on another occasion. I want to know from the Attorney General, so that the question is clearly understood, does the action of his colleague and the failure of the Attorney General to ask his colleague to direct the commission to lay those charges mean that for all purposes of the ongoing police investigation, about which the Attorney General advised me it may be by the end of May that the decision will be made, it is now limited entirely to questions of whether charges will be laid under the Criminal Code?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The limitation period has expired but I want to make it very clear, and I think the member fully appreciates this, that it would have been quite improper for the Attorney General to direct the minister to direct the Ontario Securities Commission how to exercise its prosecutorial discretion.

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Obviously the credit I gave the member for some modest understanding of this legislation was probably misplaced.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, now that the Attorney General has entered his condescending phase on this subject, as he does eventually on all others, I will give him a chance to fulfil that feeling. Would he not think it would fulfil his responsibilities better to this House, as well as those of his colleague the minister who interjected a moment ago, if the two of them undertook to make a full and complete statement on this matter to the House, even stooping so low as to take the two stories from Maclean's and to answer the situation point by point?

Would he not agree the indictment from Maclean's is an extremely important one that should not be dealt with in this House simply by the condescending answers to which we have been treated in regard to specific questions in question period which cannot possibly cover the field of this important and far-reaching situation? Without doing that, does the minister not realize we can only assume there is something to the charge of protection of people in high places or else serious incompetence?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, as has already been pointed out, there is an ongoing criminal investigation. When that matter is concluded, we will be advising the House accordingly in relation to that and in relation to any other matters which may be relevant at that time.

EDUCATION FOR MENTALLY HANDICAPPED

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Education. Is the minister aware of the concern of parents of severely and profoundly retarded children that the implementation of Bill 82, instead of having a positive effect, will have an adverse effect on the education and care of these children?

At present they are under the auspices of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, fully funded and educated in developmental centres. If the minister is aware of this concern, is she prepared to entertain the idea of amending Bill 82 to permit boards of education to purchase services from associations for the mentally retarded and, therefore, maintain the developmental centres and/or modify the Education Act to provide for the category of severely and profoundly retarded, which would allow the school boards to deal on a different basis with these children and those who are categorized as trainable mentally retarded?

Hon. Miss Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I doubt amendments to the act would be necessary since I think the honourable member understands that school boards are currently permitted under the act to purchase educational programs from other boards. The care and treatment of children does not fall within the ambit of responsibility of boards of education or school boards.

What we have been attempting to do is to find ways in which arrangements can be made to provide educational programs to pupils or children who are in care in institutions or in other kinds of arrangements. That certainly is a part of our intent in terms of the implementation of Bill 82.

In addition, I could tell the member that the definitions which are necessary in a broad way to implement fully, for example, the identification and placement review committees, are being examined and defined right now by the Advisory Council on Special Education. That activity has not been completed. They have most certainly looked at the area of the developmentally handicapped in a way which I think is somewhat similar to the direction the member was suggesting.

Mr. Bradley: These parents and others have expressed concern about the availability of elevators and ramps, supervised busing, student-teacher ratio, administration of medication, assistance with toileting and length of the school year for the profoundly and severely retarded individuals.

My colleague the member for Kitchener-Wilmot (Mr. Sweeney) during the debate on Bill 82 under subsection 7(9) suggested and had accepted an amendment which said, "Where the board determines that the pupil is a hard-to-serve pupil and the parent or guardian of the pupil agrees with the said determination, the board shall assist the parent or guardian to locate a placement suited to the needs of the pupil and reimburse the parent or guardian for any expenses incurred by the parent or guardian in locating such placement."

In view of the fact that that exists already in the act, and I know it is in the general part of the act as opposed to the other, would that circumstance permit what the people who are the teachers and the parents of the profoundly and severely retarded want? Can they achieve it through that section of Bill 82?

Hon. Miss Stephenson: If the member will read that section carefully, he will understand, as I said earlier, that under no section of the Education Act, nor within the philosophy of the educational activity within this province, are boards of education responsible for the care and treatment of children they are educating. That is a responsibility that lies outside their area of jurisdiction.

What we had proposed, which was modified slightly by the member for Kitchener-Wilmot, was that boards would assist parents in attempting to find appropriate placement for children who had educational difficulties as well as difficulties in other areas. What I hear the member suggesting is that those children who are currently being cared for within centres for the developmentally handicapped should have their educational program or their care in that program subsidized by the boards of education, and that is not a part of their responsibility.

As I said earlier, what we are making, and we have achieved it in a number of areas, is an arrangement that allows a board of education to provide an educational program for children who are currently being cared for in a different kind of circumstance. That is there already, and if there is an impediment in terms of dealing with the profoundly and severely retarded, the group the member defines, then I will most certainly look at that to try to remove any impediment.

EDUCATION FOR MULTIPLY HANDICAPPED

Mr. Grande: Mr. Speaker, my question likewise is to the Minister of Education. The minister is aware that regulation 617/81 of the Education Act states that in no case should the enrolment in a multiply handicapped class be more than six students. I am talking about students who have profound deafness, profound sight impairment, are mentally retarded, quadriplegic, etc. Why does the Scarborough Board of Education have a policy that is in direct contravention to that regulation of the Education Act in the sense that it is placing nine children in a multiply handicapped class? Is there an explanation for that?

Hon. Miss Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure it would be accurate to suggest that board has a policy about this, but the matter, which was raised by the member several months ago, has been addressed by the central regional office of the Ministry of Education. I would remind the member that this regulation is currently under review as a result of the activities involved in implementation of the amendments to the Education Act contained in Bill 82. Most certainly if a board is in violation of the regulation, that will be addressed vigorously. At this point I am not aware that there is an intentional violation, but that certainly is being investigated.

Mr. Grande: Surely the minister or the ministry's special education department ought to be aware that in the needs assessment progress report and plan for 1981 and for 1982—and the ministry has had these reports for two years—the Scarborough Board of Education, while it makes mention of regulation 617/81 and the fact that enrolment should not be more than six pupils, states very clearly and very bluntly, "Your officials believe that Scarborough's policy of placing up to nine pupils in each multiply handicapped program with a special education teacher and a teacher's aid has been a viable one." Is this or is this not a direct policy of Scarborough and, therefore, a total contravention of the regulations of the province?

Hon. Miss Stephenson: I believe the document the member is referring to is one of the planning documents developed by the Scarborough board as a result of its activity in the pilot year for the implementation of Bill 82, all of which he knows is continuing under discussion. The inclusion of that clause in the report suggested to the trustees of the Scarborough board that the arrangements they had suggested as being reasonable in that area were reasonable arrangements. They were also trying to draw to the attention of the ministry that perhaps we should be re-examining whatever it is we have in place in terms of that pupil-teacher ratio.

I think it is the responsibility of boards to do that but if, as I said, there is a real contravention of a regulation currently in place without valid supporting arguments, then obviously it will have to be addressed vigorously. It is in the hands of the central regional office now.

NIAGARA RIVER POLLUTION

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. The minister must be aware of a study conducted by a PhD student from Michigan State University that has found more dioxin in fish in the Great Lakes and rivers, and that the highest amount of dioxin was found in carp and suckers taken from the mouth of the St. Clair River, upstream from Windsor and Fighting Island—586 parts per trillion, more than 10 times the amount that the Ministry of the Environment showed in some of the fish it has tested. The dioxin content of the fish averaged 200 parts per trillion, 10 times higher than the amount the ministry considers safe in fish.

Every study taken by independent and government researchers builds up the threat of dioxin in the supply. Is the minister not aware that we must do something before we find traces too high to do anything about? Because of the fact that the federal government has given some $4 million to improve the facility at the Niagara Falls plant, is the minister going to make sure they put in the most modern active carbon filters and any advanced filters that are going to do a proper job in the event that these dioxin figures continue to increase?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the answer is yes, but I am just trying to figure out how many questions there were.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you. That was a very complete answer.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I would caution the honourable member about jumping to any conclusions on the basis of the PhD student's results.

Mr. Kerrio: You got the same ones.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I am not trying to undermine them or say that they have not caused some concern within the scientific community and my ministry, but so far they are uncorroborated. They are so out of line with all the other testing that has been done that they are subject to question by the scientific community. So I think it would be folly on the member's part to jump to any conclusions until those results have been replicated.

Mr. Kerrio: On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the student's study—his name is Mr. Kaczmar—has been validated by a distinguished panel of four experts for his doctoral dissertation, including the director of the Michigan State Pesticide Research Center, the director of Michigan's Institute of Water Resources and the pesticide expert from the Michigan department of wildlife. So the minister can see that this young gentleman's studies have been validated.

I want to remind the minister that it was a student from the University of Western Ontario who first discovered mercury in Lake St. Clair.

Mr. Speaker: Now for the question.

Mr. Kerrio: I make the point that dioxin continues to be a greater and greater threat. Because the minister made comments in his statement this morning that do not deal with one of the major concerns of the Niagara area, that is, the sewage treatment plant in Niagara Falls, New York, which is accepting toxic chemical waste from industries and not treating it at all—he has not mentioned it in his whole subject matter—it would appear that he has a long way to go.

I wonder when the minister is going to address himself to putting filters in before the toxic material becomes a danger to the people who are drinking the water.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, these questions range across the whole province. I wish I had time—and I know I have not—to give an equally full-ranging and complete response.

Mr. Speaker: He was speaking specifically of filters.

Hon. Mr. Norton: The honourable member keeps dredging up issues to which he already knows the answer. For example, in the case of the Niagara Falls waste water treatment plant, he knows very well that this ministry intervened in the United States on that issue and it resulted in a withdrawal by New York state. There was a complete review of the thing, a revision downward to make more stringent standards apply to that waste water treatment plant.

The member also knows that as a result of efforts by this government—and we were given credit for it by the immediate past commissioner of the Department of Environmental Conservation in New York state—the Environmental Protection Agency released several million dollars to New York so that plant could be put back in operation.

The member should not stand there and imply in this House that we have not been doing our duty. It is the vigilance of this government, and not the government of Canada I might add, that has resulted in the substantial progress that has been made on a number of these critical issues in the Niagara River area.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kerrio: I am glad those people on the other side are joining us because we are going to need all the help we can get to fight that—

Mr. Swart: You always need all the help you can get.

Hon. Mr. Norton: You need all the help you can get just to keep up with us. That is your problem.

Interjections.

Mr. Kerrio: Oh, no. This is one fight we have to win together.

Mr. Speaker: Now having established your positions, I will recognize the member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Speaker, the ministers of the crown all seem slightly touchy this morning.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Charlton: The issue which the member for Niagara Falls raises is a very serious concern. We have raised with the minister a number of times the issue of the increasing dioxin levels found in the fish testing which his own ministry has done. Can the minister tell us when we can expect to see the next round of results from Lake Ontario fish testing for dioxin content?

Hon. Mr. Norton: The answer to that is, as soon as they are available. I have never delayed the release of that information to the public. As soon as the results of the ongoing testing are available they are released to the public.

Again, the perception of a dramatic increase in dioxin that the member is trying to propagate is not substantiated by the facts. What is happening is that our degree of sophistication as leaders in this field internationally has enabled us to detect the presence of dioxin at much lower levels; for example, in water it is measured in parts per quadrillion.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Norton: If one looks at historical results one will see that—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Interjections.

OHIP TEMPORARY ASSISTANCE

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Treasurer about the Ontario health insurance plan temporary assistance program. As members know, this program is designed to give free OHIP coverage to people whose income is temporarily interrupted by unemployment.

As closely as I can determine from the Ministry of Health's statistics, a relatively small percentage of the number of people who are on unemployment insurance in Ontario are receiving temporary assistance. Somewhere in the vicinity of 87,000 unemployment insurance recipients are receiving temporary assistance out of a total of 427,000 such recipients in the whole province.

Does the Treasurer not agree there is a serious problem with the temporary assistance program when it does not provide coverage to unemployment insurance recipients for the reason that the average weekly unemployment insurance benefit exceeds the eligibility cutoff line for temporary assistance?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I was just getting some statistics from the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) because, obviously, I would not know the exact figures. He is the minister who administers OHIP assistance through that office.

I would think there are a number of arguments one could use to determine whether the figure the member has used, 87,000 or whatever it is, is accurate or not. The other point one must remember is that many people in the work force are covered by other people's policies. If it is the only worker in a family or if both workers are out of work, I would think there is obviously a requirement for some assistance when resources run down. In the last three or four years I think we have been remarkably effective in making people aware of the general levels of assistance for OHIP. Compared to statistics of a few years ago, I believe there has been an improvement.

Mr. McClellan: I would agree with the Treasurer that they have improved, but the fact remains that there is a total of only 155,000 people on temporary assistance in Ontario. If he quibbles with my figure of 87,000, he still has tens of thousands of people who are receiving unemployment insurance who are not receiving temporary assistance under the OHIP premium assistance program. This is in addition to all of the other defects that have been documented since the select committee sat in 1978.

Does the Treasurer not think that surely it is time now? The evidence is overwhelming that the premium assistance program is not a success. It is too riddled with defects to be tolerated. Does he not think the time has come for him to implement the policy statement made in the 1979 budget that all low-income people in need of assistance should receive it—that is what the government said in 1979—and bring in a tax credit related to OHIP until such time as the government is prepared to move to additional reforms? Would the Treasurer not indicate today that he would be willing to consider in his next budget replacing the whole premium assistance program with a tax credit?

Mr. Speaker: Just one question, please.

Hon. F. S. Miller: If that was the question, the answer was no.

Mr. McClellan: So much for his concern about low-income people.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Premier regarding the announcement yesterday by the Premier which supported the amending of section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to include the principle of the "right to enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice." Since this is the policy of the government of the day and this party supports and has encouraged the government in debate to seek amendments to section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, will the Deputy Premier, along with the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. Pope) and the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett), now reconsider the present government policy regarding flood plain mapping in that the regulations now in effect do interfere with property rights and freedoms?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to direct the attention of my colleague the Minister of Natural Resources to that question. However, the honourable member will recall that in our area, that is, in the great Niagara region, the Minister of Natural Resources did sponsor a series of public meetings on this whole subject. Indeed, I think many people from the member's area were there making certain representations to a Mr. Ferguson.

The minister himself has met on two or three occasions with representatives of an organization that has been established under the chairmanship of a former mayor of Fort Erie to review this whole matter. It was my understanding that the minister would be getting back to the members of that association in due course after he had had an opportunity to reflect upon the report of his official and to give some further thought to the representations made to him directly by those people.

Mr. Haggerty: I do not think the present Minister of Natural Resources is moving in that direction as perhaps he should. I suggest that the Deputy Premier should be twisting the minister's arm to some degree for him to meet with the public in the Niagara Peninsula, not the deputy minister or some special assistant to his office. I suggest there should be a meeting called here before the Legislature to meet with them, along with the minister, perhaps under the standing committee on general government.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Perhaps the honourable member did not understand. The minister himself was there. He has met on two occasions. First, he was there speaking to the annual meeting, I think, of the St. Catharines Game and Fish Association. He came early and spoke to them. I think there were 30—

Mr. Haggerty: On this topic?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Yes, on flood plain mapping.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, recognizing that there is a need for flood plain mapping, but recognizing the arbitrary nature of the present legislation—that there is very little consultation and no route of notification or appeal by the individual—when the Deputy Premier is talking to the Minister of Natural Resources, would he suggest to him that perhaps this whole procedure should be brought under the Planning Act, where the notification, appeal and hearing procedures are laid out, so that it would lose its arbitrary nature?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I think that has been the emphasis in the representations made by a number of people. Indeed, in the honourable member's own constituency, as he knows, where those meetings were held, I think many responsible people have urged that particular approach on the minister.

Mr. Rae: Are you suggesting he is not responsible?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Oh, no, he is very responsible.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please.

Hon. Mr. Welch: No doubt the Minister of Natural Resources will have an opportunity to comment on that when he is next in the House.

RELEASE OF INFORMATION

Mr. Nixon: On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker: I raise a matter that has been brought to your attention more and more frequently over the last few months, and that is the growing fact that government information and policy are released to the press before they are announced in this House.

I know it is your view that there is nothing you can do about this without a specific action of the House, but I want to draw to your attention that it is my recollection and clear understanding that always in the past the head of the government and the ministers have considered it their responsibility whenever possible to make announcements of government policy and of any new information that would be of importance in the province in the House first. Now more and more it has become difficult to determine what falls into that category, and more and more the ministers are having difficulty retaining the information among themselves and among their staff until such time as it can be announced.

I was particularly concerned when I read in the Globe and Mail this morning the following quote: "Adrian Hines, whose baby's death is one of the ones being investigated by police, is angry that word of the public inquiry is out and parents have yet to be informed." On another level of annoyance I read on the front page of the Toronto Star today, "MPP Ross McClellan is concerned because the Star knows about some government plans and reports before he does." The whole connotation is that there is something childish about any member getting up in his place and objecting to our privileges being infringed.

In my view, privilege being infringed means that our ability to do our job and react as we are supposed to react on behalf of our constituents is being diluted and depreciated. It may be that there is nothing you can do about it, Mr. Speaker, even in a case as blatant as the one that happened over the last two days, where general information was released and then the minister, who probably has the very best press secretary of anybody in the government except possibly the Solicitor General (Mr. G. W. Taylor), gave out a specific piece of information, the name of the royal commissioner himself, for publication in the Globe and Mail. Maybe the Globe was a little sensitive that the Toronto Star had got ahead of it and somebody was balancing it up.

Frankly, I think the time has come when the government should do something about it if we cannot do something about it. I should just say as a suggestion that if this happens to a minister, the thing that really sets it straight for him personally is to indicate to the House that these leaks are without the minister's knowledge and that he is going to do something to try to tighten it up so that his first responsibility to the House is unimpaired.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk for raising this matter and again express a concern that I tried to raise yesterday with respect to it. The fact is that the information that there would be an inquiry into the deaths at the Hospital for Sick Children has been before the public for two full days without the terms of reference of that inquiry being available to members of this assembly, to the parents or to the general public for purposes of public scrutiny and discussion.

The problem is precisely as my colleague said. We are unable to do our job. It is not a question of being scooped or some petulance; it is a matter of not being able to do our job as opposition members to scrutinize, comment on and analyse the public business when information is being released to the public, if I may say, through media manipulation, through carefully arranged leaks to the press. The pattern suggests that is what is taking place and it is a violation of our privileges inasmuch as we are unable to do the job that we are elected to do if the government chooses to use this route to release information about its activities to the general public.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, speaking generally on this, the point that has been made by my friend that this is somehow a case of government manipulation, prerulease of information and so forth, is just not correct. It is as much an embarrassment and a problem to us as it is to the members. It was as much an embarrassment to me as a member of this government to pick up the Toronto Star two days ago and read about something I knew my colleagues the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) and the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) wanted to announce in this House and intended to announce, as was done this morning.

There was no manipulation or prerulease of that information, and the matter of how it got to the media and how the Globe and Mail and the Star had the name of the judge will still have to be studied and found out by the appropriate ministers. We believe, as the member believes, that the information should be made public in this House and it should be available to all members. I think there is a legitimate degree of concern.

Mr. Nixon: Is the minister sure the Attorney General agrees with him?

Hon. Mr. Wells: Yes, he agrees with me.

Mr. Nixon: He has never said so. Why does he not say so in here?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Members have a legitimate concern in this matter and in this area. If a minister goes out and holds a press conference and releases information rather than doing it here, we will argue on the grounds of whether that should be done and why that should be done. But in this case the intention of the government was to release that information and report and to make known the terms of reference and the name of the commissioner here in the House this morning in a statement. That it happened to get out before was not something this government wanted. The terms of reference were not completed until yesterday, well after that story appeared in the Toronto Star.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I really do not want to prolong this, but my colleague the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk has pointed out that surely it was incumbent upon the Attorney General to get up and say something about it or preface his remarks with that. I bring to your attention another example, after what the Conservative House leader has said.

The Premier (Mr. Davis) and the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea) held a well-attended and well-manipulated press conference yesterday at five o'clock in the Premier's office, in which they announced a program that is of concern to my colleague the member for Parkdale (Mr. Ruprecht) and others, without having made any statement about it at all here in the House. I understand even the Minister of Health did not know what was going to be announced at five o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I find it amazing that the very people who encourage people to get documents to them or to the press, people who went around in a committee last year waving a stolen document with great glee, are now standing up and talking about how the minister makes public announcements.

Mr. Speaker: Dealing with the alleged point of privilege the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk raised, and as he himself has acknowledged it is not a proper point of privilege, as I have said before, it is beyond my jurisdiction. I just do not have any control on this. The government House leader has made his point clear.

The point of privilege raised by the member for Rainy River is something quite different and separate, and again not a point of privilege but rather a matter of courtesy. You have made your point and I am sure the government will take it into consideration.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of privilege. I would just like to say that I hope I was not incorrect in my feeling and remarks to you a moment ago in indicating I did not feel it was a point of privilege. I think I said I thought there was very little you could do without a motion of the House, because I believe anything that interferes with our ability to do our job should be raised as a point of privilege and corrected by the Speaker, if he possibly can.

I would also like to point out to the Speaker that much can be accomplished by even his comments on a matter like this. If he is quick to say that is not a point of privilege I would not say there is a sigh of relief over there, because they are not too concerned about these matters anyway, but do not let them off the hook too easily. I believe it is a point of privilege and if you were really to express just a little personal concern as our principal spokesman, our Speaker, these birds might smarten up.

Mr. Speaker: That is an interesting observation. I did not think I had responded too quickly. As a matter of fact, I heard the representatives of each of the parties and I gave it due consideration before I came to a conclusion. However, you know as well as I do that I am governed by the standing orders and precedents and so on.

Just before we proceed any further, I think it is incumbent on me to acknowledge again and say thanks to the members for their conduct during question period. It is certainly a great improvement over past performances and I would hope it augurs well for the future.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Ruston moved, seconded by Mr. Boudria, first reading of Bill 17, An Act to amend the Legislative Assembly Act.

Mr. Ruston: Mr. Speaker, this is not a raise in pay. The purpose of the bill provides for a deduction of $100 from a member's indemnity for each day of absence from the assembly while it is sitting unless the absence is because of illness, pregnancy, childbirth or other official business.

DENTURE THERAPISTS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Swart moved, seconded by Mr. McClellan, first reading of Bill 18, An Act to amend the Denture Therapists Act.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, this bill would amend the present Denture Therapists Act to refer to denturists rather than denture therapists and would permit denturists to make, repair and market partial dentures without requiring supervision by dentists or dental surgeons.

11:40 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to indicate the business of the House for next week. We will continue the debate on the speech from the throne. The leadoff speech from the third party will be on Monday afternoon, followed by other speakers taking part in the debate.

We will start night sittings next week. The throne speech debate will continue on Tuesday and Thursday afternoon and evening and on Friday morning. It will also continue on Monday, May 2, and on Tuesday, May 3, in the afternoon and evening. We expect the vote on the throne speech debate will be at 5:45 p.m. on Thursday, May 5.

It has been agreed to ask the table to calculate the time after the leadoff speech from the third party until Tuesday evening, May 3, and apportion the amount of time to be used by the speakers equally among the three parties. The final windup speeches will be apportioned equally for time on the Thursday afternoon.

Next Wednesday morning, as is the custom the usual three committees may meet.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. F. S. Miller moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Wells, resolution 1:

That the Treasurer of Ontario be authorized to pay the salaries of the civil servants and other necessary payments pending the voting of supply for the period commencing May 1, 1983, and ending June 30, 1983, such payments to be charged to the proper appropriations following the voting of supply.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, since the Treasurer has not leapt to his feet to add to his motion I presume he does not have anything to add or say in this regard.

Carrying on from the points of order raised by the Liberal House leader earlier, we are being asked this morning to vote to give the government authority to spend something like $5 billion, if not more, between now and the end of June. I was glad to see the Treasurer withdrew his motion for a six-month approval by the House, and I therefore withdrew my motion making it a three-month period.

However, I think it should be incumbent upon the Treasurer to say something. I am disappointed in the Treasurer in this sense. I am referring again to the discussion that took place on the point of order. We had a federal budget three days ago in which the federal Minister of Finance outlined his views on the economy and what is going to happen not only this year but for the next four or five years. The House has not heard anything from the Treasurer in this regard except through the press. The comments that were attributed to the Treasurer, of course, are always editorialized, cut down and sometimes even misrepresented.

I was amazed the Treasurer of Ontario thought Mr. Lalonde should resign because of the so-called budget leak. I recall that last year in one of our ethnic newspapers there were two or three items, one particularly relating to the retail sales tax, that certainly seemed more of a budget leak in the sense that somebody could benefit by it than has happened at the federal level. The Treasurer, of course, pooh-poohed the thought that he should resign or even bother or deign to investigate that matter.

My point is this, I really think it was incumbent upon the Treasurer to stand in his place and tell us what he thought and what the view of Ontario was in terms of Mr. Lalonde's budget and how it was going to affect Ontario. He did not have to give us any thoughts, comments or previews of what the Ontario budget was going to be.

It is instructive that a few years ago, when Mr. Crosbie's budget came down, the Treasurer leapt to his feet to tell all and sundry, those who would listen with any interest at all, what he thought of that budget at that point. One can only presume from his relative silence that he thinks the federal budget was a relatively good one.

I am not here to say nice things about the federal government. I am more interested in finding out what the Treasurer and his staff of hundreds have done about analysing that budget and what impact it is going to have on Ontario. I have suggested before that I think it is incumbent upon the Treasurer of Ontario to make what I have called the reports on the state of the economic situation for Ontario at some relatively stated times.

The Treasurer or his ministry puts out a report about every three months in which the revenues and expenditures are delineated and so on, and it would be incumbent upon the Treasurer at that time to give us an update on how he sees the economy of the province.

As I say, we are being asked to vote $5 billion for the ordinary expenses of the province to pay civil servants' salaries and all that sort of thing, and the Treasurer has not deigned to give us any idea of, first of all, what amounts he will spend until the end of June without specific approval of the Legislature through the estimates procedures and, second, how he sees the economy of the province going.

I want to talk about one other matter. I want to know what the Treasurer anticipates he will be spending. I want to know how much of that will be going to job creation and, specifically, that of youth employment.

My colleague the member for Kitchener-Wilmot (Mr. Sweeney) asked the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett) on April 19 about Ontario youth employment. My colleague pointed out at that time that the moneys coming from the Ontario government for this most important aspect of the unemployment situation in Ontario had been reduced by this government.

Both in terms of the program through the minister's budget and through the Experience program there has been a 22.2 per cent increase in the number of employed but the amounts of money have fallen from $34 million to this year's $23.7 million, and from serving 57,000 young people to only 41,000 this year, the youth experience program, through the government, has fallen by at least 300 people and there has been a cutback of funds in that area as well.

I do not wish to prolong the debate, but I do want to hear the Treasurer's reflections on the federal budget, its impact on Ontario and what amount of money we are voting. If he can give us a handle on that, because Management Board keeps a running tally month by month, and how he feels about the unemployment situation in Ontario and what, if any, moneys—I am presuming anywhere from $5 billion to $7 billion—will go into creating jobs in Ontario.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me say that we certainly do not intend to prolong the debate on this motion, but before you get your enthusiasm up too high there are two or three major matters I would like to deal with.

The first point I want to raise with the Treasurer is that in my moments of recreational reading I occasionally browse through the Ontario Gazette. I noticed in the Ontario Gazette on Saturday, April 16, 1983—which was Purolated up to my office in Thunder Bay because it contained matters of such great pith and moment—there was a Management Board order for 1982-83 dated March 1, 1983. It had to do with the Ministry of the Attorney General and it looked as if there were substantial increases in the area of salary revision. It had to do with vote 1404-1 which, when I look at the estimates book, has to do with the criminal law division under the crown legal services. It had to do with vote 1406-3 which has to do with county and district courts, and it also had to do with vote 1406-5 which has to do with provincial courts.

Because I am new to the economic field, I would like to know why it was necessary for the Management Board order to be issued at that time. Is it because over the next couple of months substantial increases have to be spent in those areas and the minister needs that approval before he brings the estimates directly to the House? I noted vote 1406-3 in the Gazette, in particular, had additional funding for work load increase. I wonder if we could have a bit of explanation on that.

The major thing I want to talk about is my sense of disappointment that the Treasurer has not made at least a tentative official response to the federal budget. I know his budget is coming down in a few weeks and I certainly do not want him to scoop himself in terms of whatever press he can get out of that, good or bad. I found it just a bit disturbing, once again in terms of the matter we brought up earlier, that any response the minister has we get through the press rather than in a clear statement in the House. I think a short 10-minute statement this morning might have been extremely important and extremely worth while if we are to take the government's plans for economic recovery seriously.

The economic situation we face in the province is so severe and the unemployment situation is so serious that we need clear and decisive economic leadership at the provincial level. I have been unable to distinguish anything that differs between the federal Liberal government and the provincial Conservative government when it comes to general economic leadership in the last 10 years, because both governments for the past 10 to 14 years have relied on four or five major operational modes.

One is, to try to pump the economy they have either given small tax concessions or holidays on consumer goods for brief periods of time. More important, they have tried to give concessions or incentives or giveaways to corporations.

During expansionary times and good times they have expanded their own budgets, but they have also budgeted deficits, and that is the most disturbing economic pattern that emerged in the last 14 years: that in good times they not only expanded their own spending but also expanded the deficit; there was deficit financing.

Now when times get bad, what do they both do? They engage in cutbacks, restraint—however we want to phrase it—and budget deficits. So although I have never been a great believer that deficits are necessarily bad, what has emerged is that in the last 14 years there has not been any pattern or sense or use made of budget deficits when they were necessary.

The most disturbing thing about both levels of government, even though it may have had overwhelming public support, is the fact that in the last year the wage restraint on public sector employees was the only economic initiative taken by either the federal or the provincial level of government. Frankly, I believe that both levels of government, by following the Reaganomics from south of the border, have deliberately created unemployment.

I want to put to the Treasurer that unemployment is the major problem and I want to put to him that unemployment in Ontario is the major problem; that there is no economic recovery worthy of the name until we start really creating jobs. Even though investor confidence may be up, even though banks may be making slightly more profit, even though companies and corporations may be making slightly more profit, all of that is to no avail for the populace as a whole until we start creating positive and full-time jobs. The depression, or the great recession—whatever term you want to use—is not over until those people start having jobs.

In the six weeks that we had off between sessions—

Mr. Conway: Off?

Mr. Foulds: We did not have them off; we had them back in our constituencies. They were a very important experience for many of us. They certainly were for me, because every week in the office we see unemployed people, men and women, coming in to try to talk about the dignity of getting a job.

I will just use as an example a man who, because he was on unemployment insurance, moved out to the rural part of my riding where he had the opportunity of shelter at no cost. He had an opportunity for a job in the city, but he could not take that job in the city simply because he did not have the money either to get into housing in the city or to pay the transportation costs between his home in the country and his city job. There is no way around that in the bureaucracy, no way to find him a supplement, no way to find him public housing.

Then we realize that people are getting into very desperate straits and we know it is a depression and not a recession when one is shovelling snow in the driveway and the kid who delivers flyers stops to chat and asks if I can help his father find a job. We know when people take that kind of time to talk to us that we are in a very genuine depression.

I do not want to go on too long, but I think the statistics over the last three or four months certainly bear that out. The thing that is depressing is that the statistics are not getting any better when it comes to unemployment. The latest ones indicate that Sudbury still has an unemployment rate of 27.1 per cent, Hamilton has an unemployment rate of 15.7 per cent, St. Catharines-Niagara has an unemployment rate of 17 per cent, Windsor 17.4 per cent and Thunder Bay 14.6 per cent—the first time in three or four months that Thunder Bay has been below the 17 per cent level. It is a major condemnation of this government that there are still 750,000 people in this province out of work.

To put it in a nutshell, I believe the strategy that was used in the Lalonde budget of an investment-led recovery is false. With the amount of unused capacity we have in our manufacturing sector in industry and with the debt load a number of corporations have, the kind of thrust Lalonde has tried will find the money simply going to retire the debt load rather than into new investment.

It is about time Treasurers called into serious question the theory of giving corporate grants and incentives. Recent studies in the research and development sector, for example, have indicated that government programs in Canada are relatively generous and relatively good in comparison to other jurisdictions in the world, yet we know the investment in research and development in Canada is relatively low.

Therefore, we have to get away from saying it is all right for governments to intervene to give corporate benefits, hoping the private sector will take those benefits and create jobs. If they are going to intervene and the objective is actually to create jobs, then the government must intervene more directly.

I would like to touch on two short-term and two long-term steps the Treasurer should consider while he is making his budget.

First of all, housing: Instead of cutting back on funds for nonprofit and co-operative housing—and I admit the federal government has done more of that than this government—funds should be dramatically increased. We still desperately need housing and single-family housing that people can afford. One of the few dynamic and growing areas that make that possible is the co-operative housing area.

Although I have no quarrel with municipal or provincial nonprofit housing, I think the co-operative housing area is one we could look at very creatively over the next year or so. That is what this government should do.

We still desperately need senior citizen and family units in every urban community in this province. As well as generating construction jobs in every major urban centre, that would, in my own parochial view, have a spinoff effect in northern Ontario because it would take up some of the slack in the woods and sawmill industry.

I also want to put in a plea that in the social services area we still desperately need crisis housing for battered women and children. Once again, renovation jobs, which would not be major ones but small ones spotted all over in every community in this province, would come first and then long-term social service jobs would follow.

I just want to mention three points in the long term; they all have to do with import replacement.

First, we could create 10,000 full-time, year-round jobs over the next 10 to 15 years if we simply developed a manufacturing industry for mining machinery we currently import to replace the mining machinery in this country that is worn out—building and manufacturing it here. I am sure we could create a similar number of jobs by producing the manufacturing machinery for the woods industries and pulp and paper industries in this province.

Second, I think it is crucially important that we start on a five- to 10-year plan to diversify the manufacturing base of the province. Despite the current catch phrase about the importance of high-technology industry, and I have no quarrel with that, I do have the slight worry that both economists and government are looking at high tech as a quick fix, that for the next 10, 15 to 20 years our major jobs are going to be in our traditional industries, in manufacturing and the resource sector. Therefore, we must diversify that industry, both in northern Ontario and throughout southern Ontario.

Third, I think simply by insisting on our fair share of the auto parts manufacturing sector, we could dramatically improve the situation in southwestern Ontario and the Niagara Peninsula.

Those are the major suggestions I would like to make to the Treasurer at this time while he is thinking of putting together his budget. I would like to emphasize that I would like the Treasurer to seriously consider job creation in areas that are labour or job intensive, rather than capital intensive.

We do not need the kind of promise we got from Marc Lalonde that said, "We are on our way to recovery, but we can expect unemployment rates at the 12 to 10 per cent level for the next three years." We all know what an unemployment rate at the 12 to 10 per cent level means. It means continuing to have enormously high unemployment such as 27, 17 and 15 per cent in major urban centres in Ontario.

I would like to put it to the Treasurer that it is his job, now that there has been a failure to create jobs in the next two or three years at the federal level, to do so here at the provincial level.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take the first opportunity—and this is the first opportunity and it is in order under a motion with respect to supply in the assembly—to bring to the attention of the assembly the serious default in the administration of the Ontario Securities Commission in the case of Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., which was before the commission and which has been the matter of question and discussion in the assembly. I want to do it as succinctly and as briefly as possible.

It is my misfortune, despite what—

Hon. F. S. Miller: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: May I ask is that in order for this interim supply debate?

Mr. Foulds: If I could speak to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that we are giving the Treasurer interim supply, that is, the money that the government spends in every ministry under the jurisdiction of the government in the next two months. That includes the expenditures under the estimates of the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) and the Solicitor General (Mr. G. W. Taylor) estimates, and I imagine it is the Attorney General's estimates under which expenditures for the Ontario Securities Commission come. Therefore, it is my contention that the topic of my learned and honourable friend the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) is very much in order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, if I may just speak to the point raised by the Treasurer, I believe that the subject is in order as well. I frankly think it might be discussed on some other occasion, but I know that whatever the honourable member is going to say about it will be useful and important. I would agree with what has already been said, that the funds made available for the next two months are going to be distributed among all ministries, unless the minister can assure us differently that they are channelled in some specific way other than that. I think our experience in the past over substantial objections has been that Mr. Speaker has allowed as wide a debate as the members of the Legislature saw fit to undertake.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rotenberg): The point of order has been raised by the Treasurer. I would have to indicate to the House that a supply motion does cover funds for all agencies of the government, including the securities commission. I cannot comment on the wisdom of whether or not it should be raised at this time, but if an honourable member wishes to raise any matter that involves the spending of public money, that is in order.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the wisdom of it either. I obviously assume it is wise and important that the matter be raised at this time.

I have raised it because there is a very serious misunderstanding going to the root of the administration of the securities commission that must be cleared up. I want it to be understood that in the course of what I am saying this morning I am not making any imputation of any kind against any of the staff of the commission. I am not making any imputation of any kind with respect to the integrity or honesty of any member of the commission or of the staff. I am not making any comment, judgement or otherwise on the persons who are involved in the matters under consideration and the judgements that are involved in connection with them, nor am I making any comment with respect to the ongoing police investigation into these questions.

What I do, however, want to say to the assembly I say because I happen, despite what the Attorney General said this morning, to have the misfortune to be one of the few members of the assembly who have some knowledge of a very specialized statute, the Securities Act of this province.

The securities commission exists solely and entirely by virtue of a statute of this assembly. It is not necessary in a parliamentary system of government to have a minor lecture in political science 1 at a university to say that the principle of government is that the minister is responsible to this assembly. I want to point out very clearly and very simply that the Securities Act describes and defines the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations as being the minister to whom the administration of this act is assigned.

Under the statute, a commission is created, the Ontario Securities Commission, which is responsible for the administration of the act. That commission is responsible to the minister and the minister is responsible to this assembly. The funds that are available to the commission are funds that are voted under the estimates of the government. The payments that are going to be made in this interim period are payments that are going to be made through the authority of this assembly.

With that minor introduction to the fundamental nature of the Ontario Securities Commission and its relation to this assembly, I want to say very clearly to the assembly that there has been a miscarriage of the administration of that commission in the matter relating to Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. and to the persons who were under investigation by the staff of that commission. It is a difficult question to get across to the assembly, a difficult point to make, but I am asking the members of the assembly to understand what I am saying.

The members heard on Tuesday of this week and again this morning the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) and the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Elgie) refer to something called their version of that commission. I want to say to each of them and to my colleagues in the assembly that the statute provides the method by which investigations will take place by the commission when it is investigating questions that relate to offences under the Securities Act or offences under the Criminal Code.

The first point is a very simple and a very direct statement, and that is that the decision by any body at any time as to whether charges will be laid against any person cannot be described as a legal matter or in any way as an administrative decision. It is in legal terms a quasi-judicial decision and that decision has to be made in accordance with the principles of natural justice. The investigation that was conducted in this case by the Ontario Securities Commission was an informal investigation. It was not carried out pursuant to the statute. The decision of the commission was made on the basis of informal information placed before it as a result of a very thorough investigation, and it had to do with the reputation of businessmen of prominence in Canadian business affairs.

As a citizen, I would object very seriously if a body was investigating me and making a decision with respect to whether I would be subject to any charges and that investigation was being carried out by the Ontario Securities Commission and it dealt with it as an administrative matter in accordance with the internal regulations of the commission when there is a statutory code that says how it is to be conducted.

That statutory code is set out very clearly in subsection 11(1) of the Ontario Securities Act, which states: "Where upon a statement made under oath it appears probable to the commission that any person or company has, (a) contravened any of the provisions of this act or the regulations; or (b) committed an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada) in connection with a trade in securities, the commission may, by order, appoint any person to make such investigation as it deems expedient for the due administration of this act, and in the order shall determine and prescribe the scope of the investigation."

When that investigator has been appointed, he has very significant powers and authorities granted to him in the Securities Act. In addition, he has the power to take evidence under oath and he has the obligation then to report to the Ontario Securities Commission. The commission, in making its quasi-judicial decision as to whether a charge will be made, must have regard to the provisions of section 12 of the Securities Act, which states: "Where upon the report of an investigation made under section 11 it appears to the commission that any person or company may have, (a) contravened any of the provisions of this act or the regulations; or (b) committed an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada) in connection with a transaction relating to securities, the commission shall send a full and complete report of the investigation, including the report made to it, any transcript of evidence and any material in the possession of the commission relating thereto, to the minister."

Those are the salient considerations that we in this assembly by statute passed in 1978 detailed for the commission as the guide to be used if it was to proceed with any question about whether charges should or should not be laid against a person.

Now I want to come to the very specific case which was of concern to the commission and very briefly try to make clear to the assembly what the question in issue was, what procedure was followed by the commission and why that procedure of the commission was a transgression of the statutory code imposed on that commission by the Securities Act.

On October 27, 1981, a company known as Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. issued a document which in technical securities terms is known as an issuer bid circular and in common, everyday terms as a prospectus, a special kind of prospectus. It was a prospectus by Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. notifying its own shareholders that it was prepared to bid in, to buy back from the shareholders shares of itself, the very same company that was making the offer. That circular had to comply with the provisions of the Securities Act and the circular which was issued contained these particular statements:

"Norcen has no present plans or proposals for material changes in its affairs, including no plans or proposals to liquidate, sell, lease or exchange all or substantially all of the assets of Norcen or to amalgamate Norcen with any other body corporate or to make any other major changes in the business corporate structure, management or personnel of Norcen."

It then contained this certificate: "The purchase of common shares of Norcen, in accordance with this purchase program and the contents of this notice of intention and its sending to shareholders, have been authorized by the board of Norcen. There are no material changes or plans for material changes in the affairs of Norcen which have not been generally disclosed."

The point at issue was whether or not there were material changes contemplated by Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. which should have been disclosed in that circular. In blunt terms, the question was whether or not the circular by reason of the failure to disclose was misleading and by reason of the failure to disclose there was therefore a misrepresentation. The statute under section 118, which is the enforcement provision of the Securities Act, has this to say:

"Every person or company who makes a statement in any issuer bid circular that, at the time and in the light of the circumstances under which it is made is a misrepresentation, is guilty of an offence." The punishments are, in the case of a company, a fine of not more than $25,000, and in the case of an individual, a fine of not more than $2,000 or imprisonment for a term of not more than one year, or both.

So there are significant penal consequences to being charged with having made that kind of an offence, and due process, if it was not guaranteed before the Charter of Rights, is certainly guaranteed now. It was therefore essential that if allegations were going to be made that Mr. Edward G. Battle, the president and chief executive officer of Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., who signed this issuer bid circular, or Mr. Conrad Black, who was chairman of that particular company, were to be charged with issuing a false circular, then it behooved the Ontario Securities Commission to look very carefully at the process by which they go about making that determination and to do it in accordance with the due process which this assembly established for the Ontario Securities Commission. That is what took place.

There was an investigation, but an informal investigation, not the kind of investigation which we had stated in the statute of this province should be carried out by the commission. What did they do in April 1982 in the midst of a raging battle with respect to control of Hanna Mining Co. in Cleveland? While it is interesting as to what went on and people enjoy reading about that kind of matter, it is not significant to the point before us.

It is sufficient to say that Hanna Mining Co., through its solicitors, Davies, Ward and Beck, made a complaint to the Ontario Securities Commission in April 1982 with respect to this very question of whether this particular circular issued by Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. to its own shareholders was or was not a solicitors, Davies, Ward and Beck, made a complaint to the Ontario Securities Commission in April 1982 with respect to this very question of whether this particular circular issued by Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. to its own shareholders was or was not a false or misleading document.

By direction of the commission that investigation was stayed for a period of time because of reasons which, again, are irrelevant but which are set out and can be read about in either the Financial Post or in the items which have been referred to as the fine articles in Maclean's magazine. All that information is available.

There was a preliminary report to the commission made by Mr. G. W. Curran and Michael J. Lang on September 1, 1982. Because they felt there were some serious questions that offences may have been committed, they proceeded to make a fuller and more complete investigation, but it was always an informal investigation. They were investigating charges against reputable and leading Canadian industrialists about offences they may have committed.

The commission had before it a preliminary report. That preliminary report indicated that, yes, the investigation should continue, and the commission allowed it to continue. That is where the commission made its mistake because at that point, or shortly thereafter or after a further direction to its investigating staff to come forward with a more definitive statement with respect to the investigation, there came a time when the commission was considering whether charges could be laid under the Securities Act or, indeed, whether any other offences were committed because it was their responsibility to that special commission, divorced from the administration of justice in this province, to deal with these matters in that way. But they failed.

The chairman at that time was Mr. Knowles. I carefully point out, as I said in my opening remarks, that I am not casting any aspersion on the integrity or honesty of any of the men then or now on the commission, but the error which was made, a fundamental error and a misconception by the commission if it directed its mind to it at all, was that it was looking into the question of whether Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. and certain of its officers, advisers and others had committed offences under the Securities Act or any other offences under the laws of Canada.

At some time, whether it was on September 1, 1982, when the preliminary report was made about the matter that there should be a further investigation, or whether it should have been after some further investigation, say, ending in October or November, the commission should have said, "Have we got a sworn statement before us on which we can act in accordance with section 11 of the act?"

If they could not get a sworn statement before them, they should have stopped investigating it and it should have been very clear to everybody that investigation had stopped. But at that point they were obligated, under any system of due process and in fairness to the people and the company which was being investigated, to have asked for and obtained that sworn statement.

Then they could have gone on in accordance with the way in which this Legislature had dictated they were to carry out that process, "Where upon a statement made under oath it appears probable to the commission"—it was their question to decide for themselves—"that any person or company has contravened any of the provisions of this act or the regulations, or committed an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada) in connection with a trade in securities, the commission may by order appoint" an investigator with full powers to make the investigation and report back.

It was only on the basis of that kind of a report and no other kind of a report that the commission had any jurisdiction from this assembly to decide whether or not the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations should be asked for the consent to prosecute under the provisions of section 118 of the Securities Act or whether or not the matter should be referred to the Attorney General.

Members will note, as I have said, if they came to that conclusion after that careful investigation in which they examined sworn evidence and all the reports of the investigator appointed pursuant to the statute, and if they decided, yes, there were probable grounds that offences had been committed under either the Securities Act or the Criminal Code, then the statute is mandatory: "The commission shall send a full and complete report of the investigation, including the report made to it, any transcript of evidence and any material in the possession of the commission related thereto, to the minister."

On the basis of that, if that was being handled, the minister was then charged with the responsibility of whether or not the process should be carried any further. That is due process. The minister then makes up his mind. If he is going to pursue the remedies to enforce the provisions of section 118, he must then, if he chooses, either give consent to the commission, if they have asked to proceed under section 118, or direct the commission if they have not asked him but his review of the report received from the commission is such that the charges be laid. A properly conducted investigation would deal with both aspects of the matter; that is, the questions under the Securities Act and whether or not there were offences under the Criminal Code.

That did not take place. There was a detailed report with no sworn evidence of any kind, but making serious recommendations to the commission with respect to its obligations. I recited the appropriate part of that commission report to the assembly a few days ago.

In the recommendation of the investigators who conducted this informal investigation—when they are talking about whether or not the men and companies should be charged under the Securities Act, the informal investigation—their report said that the commission seek the consent of the minister pursuant to section 119 of the act to lay charges under section 118 of the act for 26 counts, eight against Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., nine against Conrad M. Black and nine against Edward G. Battle.

That report is dated March 24, 1983. It is limited to section 118 and was supported by this particularly forthright statement which I quoted to the assembly a few days ago. If I can find it again, it simply stated their views in very positive terms. This is the reason or the supporting statement of the investigators under this informal investigation:

"We are of the view that a strong case can and should be made in an appropriate forum that Norcen and certain of its individual officers broke the law by making false statements about and omitting to disclose an intention which constituted a material fact and decisions which constituted material changes within the meaning of the act."

What kind of due process is it where that kind of statement can be included in the report of an informal investigation by the Ontario Securities Commission that is going to deal with the question of whether or not a charge will be laid against a citizen under that act? What kind of process is that?

If one reads the comment of the minister in the last couple of days about this matter, he emphasizes it is an administrative act. One can go and ask any justice of the peace or any lawyer who knows anything about the processes of the law as to whether or not the question of whether a charge should or should not be laid against a citizen in this province is an administrative act. It is a quasi-judicial act, if it is not a judicial act. Because of the maladministration—and again, I emphasize without any fault—of that commission, we have this unfortunate circumstance of immense confusion about what has taken place.

This memorandum of March 24, the result of this investigation—which is very thorough, very complete within the limitations in which it was conducted, bearing in mind that it was informal—contains that kind of a recommendation on matters and charges on which the statute of limitations is going to run out at midnight April 12.

I am told that because the commission had three hearings to consider this report, one at the request of the Attorney General, and because they sat all day and all evening I am supposed to pat them on the back. I am not here to pat them on the back. Had they decided properly to have had a formal investigation then they would have deserved to have been patted on the back and told, "Yes, that is the way you were supposed to do it."

They came to a conclusion not to proceed any further. Do members realize that they could not have proceeded in any event? There was absolutely no way, after they had given consideration to the informal report of the investigators, that they could have now initiated the formal investigation under section 11, because the meetings all took place during the early part of April and the last meeting, of course, took place on the very day on which it would have expired.

I would say very clearly that even if the minister had consented on the basis of that informal investigation the matter could have been thrown out on the whole question of due process, because we in this assembly had said that if an investigation comes to the point where there is reason to believe as a result of that investigation there is some consideration of charges that should be laid, then the matter has to go the formal route and no other route.

I happen to feel very strongly about the due process of this matter, because ever since I have become involved in trying to follow it through I have been concerned about the commission and the way it has handled these matters.

That leads me to my last comment on this particular matter, and that is the question of the conflict of interest of Mr. Peter Dey. I am not saying whether Mr. Dey was or was not biased or could have had a conflict of interest or not. This is not the point and it never was.

The Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations cannot take refuge in the point that Mr. Dey was making some decision of an administrative matter when he was deciding whether a charge would or would not be laid against a citizen. That is not an administrative matter, that is a judicial matter in which he participated and the rules are very clear.

I will simply interpolate what I believe to be the test. The test, as far as I know, is whether or not the person making the decision—and Mr. Dey was one of a number of people—should participate in making a decision on whether or not charges should be laid.

"Does a reasonably well informed person have a reasonable apprehension that there may well be a biased appraisal and judgement of the issues to be determined?"

"The test of probability or reasoned suspicion of bias, unintended though the bias may be, is grounded in the concern that there be no lack of public confidence in the impartiality of adjudicative agencies. Emphasis is added to this concern in this case by the fact that the board is to have regard for the public interest."

One could read very clearly commission into that decision. That is the decision in a well known case, undoubtedly well known to everybody concerned. Mr. Dey was a partner in the law firm which was handling the securities matters related to Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. until the end of 1982. He took over as chairman of the commission from Mr. Knowles, I believe on January 4, 1983.

He was a partner in a law firm which was involved in the very matters which were before that commission. It is no satisfaction to a reasonably well informed person to say that he did not act on that particular file. It is of no satisfaction to me, as I believe a reasonably informed person, to believe that person should be asking whether or not he has a conflict of interest. If he had disqualified himself that would not have cured the fundamental error of the processes of the commission, but it would have maintained the integrity which the public expects from a chairperson of a commission of that importance.

I understand he asked his fellow commissioners whether they thought he would have a conflict and they assured him: "Oh no, you would not have a conflict. We have confidence in you." He apparently asked for an opinion. The very fact he had to ask supports the position which I think any reasonable member of the public would take that he should not have sat on the case in the first place.

I want simply to conclude. I took this occasion because this is a matter which cannot await these interjections by the Attorney General and the interjections by the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations when they have a fundamental misunderstanding of the operations of that commission. The sooner they get with it and the sooner they understand it, the better.

The statute of limitations has run on section 118. The fundamental question has not been answered. The Attorney General is precluded from laying charges under section 118 of the Ontario Securities Act, whether he likes to admit it or not. The fact of the matter is there is an ongoing police investigation, which is another story and can be dealt with at the time that police investigation is concluded.

When we in this assembly establish a commission and provide very specific methods to protect by way of due process the character and reputation of persons who may have allegations against them, that charges may be laid under the Securities Act or, if it had been done properly, under the Criminal Code, they are entitled to the full panoply of the provisions of section 11 of the act and they are entitled to have the investigation conducted in accordance with those provisions that we have established. The failure by the commission to do so and its decision to substitute for it some informal investigation with respect to whether or not a citizen will or will not be charged is a matter that is of major and utmost concern.

It is with some diffidence that I always raise these kinds of questions in the assembly, because unfortunately the Securities Act is a relatively specialized area which is of interest to members of the public who are investors. But the integrity of the marketplace and the protection of persons who may be involved in those marketplaces have led to a special code being established.

The code is good. It is an excellent code. If it were adhered to by the commission that is appointed to carry it out we would not be in the mess we are in on the question of Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. and the question of who should or should not be charged.

I hope at some point the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations will take the trouble to read what I have said, to study the statute and to realize how improper the actions of the commission were in the way in which it dealt with the reputations of very important, leading Canadian industrialists. I make no judgement on any of those matters but I do say to the assembly that if we establish due process that commission must adhere to the due process that we establish.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the points raised by the first two speakers. Both asked me to make some critique of the federal budget. I will be pleased to do so.

To begin with, the thrust of the federal budget was a pleasant change of direction, in my opinion, from the one of 1981. It emphasized to a large degree assistance for the sector that I believe is capable of increasing the number of jobs in the country, the private sector.

It did not undo some of the actions in the 1981 budget felt to be punitive, such as the first-year 50 per cent capital cost allowance. However, to be fair, it includes a number of measures that should stimulate investment in equity and investment by equity holders or companies in new plant. Obviously, improvements in productivity and improvements in liquidity are essential if Canadian companies are to survive.

In the last year or two, particularly 1982, the folly of the attitudes of the 1960s and 1970s in corporate financing were particularly visible in Canada since, compared to American companies, we were heavily debt laden relative to equity. So we saw companies like Dome in very grave trouble when the cost of that debt increased dramatically.

Mr. Kerrio: Hydro.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Hydro has a very good debt-to-equity ratio. But let me carry on. Therefore, the emphasis on the indexed securities investment plan, the investor package that protects from inflation equity investments made after the budget date, should be welcomed.

The capital works are harder to assess. The Minister of Finance tends to talk in multi-year numbers. That is a new technique. I understand the usefulness of it, because $5 billion sounds like a lot more than $1.2 billion. I believe though that while budgets should be able to give us some impression of future fiscal years they really only deal with one in a specific way. It particularly intrigued me when I saw tax changes that will occur in the next fiscal year included in this budget.

Mr. T. P. Reid: You raised personal income tax in Ontario in that manner.

Hon. F. S. Miller: No, I did that in my fiscal year. Those changes took place in my fiscal year. The calendar year was different, but the fiscal year was in that time frame. Please check that.

Mr. T. P. Reid: You announced a year in advance.

Hon. F. S. Miller: No, I did not. It became effective January 1 of the fiscal year during which my budget was announced.

The reason I could sort out in my mind, as a drafter of budgets, for announcing a future year's tax changes was not really to say they would occur on the dates mentioned, but I believe to give a slightly better picture to the cash requirements shown down the road, to indicate a change in attitude towards deficits. I hope this is a fact. I hope the federal government is going to start reducing its deficit, because $31 billion of $89 billion is being borrowed.

Opposition members quite properly come after me day after day about the size of my predicted deficit. Mine was $2.2 billion on $22 billion. I think one has to look at the difference between those two.

Mr. T. P. Reid: It is going to be a little higher than that.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Sure it is, but I point out that a year ago Mr. MacEachen predicted a $7-billion cash requirement for a year that ended up having a $23-billion or $24-billion cash requirement, over three times his original estimate. Mine is up between 10 and 15 per cent. His was up 300 per cent.

Other measures in the budget I believe worthy of support are the registered home ownership plan measures that allow people to top up the $10,000 towards the purchase of a home and/or take money out this year for furnishings and appliances for an existing home without losing their rights to the RHOSP. I believe several provinces had suggested this move. We support it. We believe it will help basically Canadian industries' sales just as much as a sales tax holiday would have helped. It gives people an immediate tax incentive to make a decision.

The Canada-Ontario employment development program, or the new employment expansion and development program as it is called at the federal level, was extended by about $180 million. In the last couple of months my concerns about the COED program being structured too tightly have diminished a bit.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mine have not.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Just a second, I said a bit. I am going to qualify that very quickly. My concerns still deal with the public service aspects of COED and NEED, in that we cannot take tenders, we have problems with union agreements and we have a number of difficulties in getting people back to work as the programs are structured. Yesterday we saw a city having to turn down a program because it would have involved hiring nonunionized people when unionized people were involved or had a right to certain priorities.

I would argue that the part that has surprised the federal government, and was only there because of Ontario's request, was the small business part. As the last two or three months have gone by, the small business sector has suddenly realized, almost all around the province, that money is available that can help it put on needed additions, usually on a 50-50 basis or something close to it. It doubles the total impact of government dollars, quadruples the federal share, since we match it in most cases; and, most important, puts in place an asset some businessman believes will make a profit. Not only are jobs created but an asset is improved.

I have to speak on behalf of the tourist industry; I am sure the member for Rainy River (Mr. T. P. Reid) would too. This has been an important opportunity for the tourist industry and many others, but particularly the tourist industry, to winterize, to renovate, to expand, to add a couple of units, whatever. Those are in our long-term as well as our immediate economic interest.

The biggest single problem then remains, in my opinion, the deficit. The tax changes incorporated in the budget did cost Ontario about $82 million in lost revenue in this fiscal year, so we will have that immediate loss of revenue because we either are going to be paralleling or are affected by some of the changes, or traditionally we do. I of course have to make those decisions, but traditionally Ontario has tried for simplicity to parallel federal corporate income tax moves.

I was asked to estimate the number of billions of dollars that would be spent between now and June 30. Five billion dollars would probably be low. I would be inclined to think it is closer to $7 billion or $8 billion, since the cash flow in the first quarter of the fiscal year generally is at one of its heavier points. That is one of the reasons I borrowed some money in the marketplace the other day.

The Management Board orders mentioned by the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Foulds) are something I am not able to answer. I simply cannot. The Chairman of Management Board (Mr. McCague) would be the appropriate person to answer that, and I am afraid the members opposite will have to get an answer from him.

The honourable member was saying, though, that he really did not see anything different between the Ontario government and the federal government with respect to fiscal management. I, of course, would argue that the fundamental difference in the two governments has been fiscal responsibility over the years. Why, for example, is the total funded debt of the province of Ontario in this year about 12 months' revenue whereas in Mr. Frost's day it was 22 months' revenue and—who was the last Liberal Premier? Mr. Nixon?—in Mr. Nixon's day it was about 43 or 44 months' revenue?

Mr. T. P. Reid: You are excluding Ontario Hydro.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Ontario Hydro has an 80 per cent debt-to-equity ratio. It has maintained a ratio of something on that order. It tends to put part of each year's profits into new construction and to borrow the balance. That is not unlike many other corporations that are expanding.

Mr. T. P. Reid: But that is not part of your equation.

Hon. F. S. Miller: No it is not, because it stands on its own. It earns its own money to pay its own bonds.

Mr. Speaker, I would gladly have gone on a bit, but at this point I would ask that my motion be passed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, obviously we do not have time to proceed with the other remaining motion on the order paper today, so we will leave it for another occasion.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Monday, April 25, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTRY

SALE OF SCIENCE CIRCUS

Hon. Mr. McCaffrey: Mr. Speaker, earlier today I attended a ceremony in the Premier's office that I would like to recount to members of the House because it concerns one of the major themes outlined in the speech from the throne, namely "to promote and encourage the development of internationally competitive industries."

These words underline this government's renewed commitment to double Ontario's exports over the next few years, especially the export of manufactured goods and, most especially, products of Ontario's high-technology industries. The Ontario government is determined that Ontario's industries can, should and will compete in the toughest marketplace of all, the world outside our borders.

Thus I am pleased to announce that the Ontario Science Centre, a crown agency of my ministry, has just signed a $700,000 contract for the sale of a science circus to Japan. This marks the first time that such an important element of Ontario technology and craftsmanship has been sold abroad.

The science circus is a highly sophisticated yet portable exhibition that will tour the cities and towns of Japan. It will supplement a similar circus also to be developed by the science centre that will in the near future tour other countries in the Far East under the auspices of this government.

The sale of the science circus is important to Ontario for a number of other reasons, not the least of which is that it alone will represent nearly half of one per cent of Canada's manufactured exports to Japan. As members know, Canada's exports with Japan have been primarily raw materials, which are then manufactured in Japan and sold back to Canada, so I know that all members will share my pleasure that an agency of the Ontario government, one devoted to science and culture, should be at the forefront of such a crucial and long overdue initiative in Canadian trade.

Another benefit of the sale of the science circus to one of the world's most advanced technological countries is that it will save and create jobs in our province. The science circus will be built entirely in Ontario by Ontario craftsmen, designers and manufacturers using Canadian-made materials and resources.

The idea of a science circus was first developed by the Ontario Science Centre in 1973. It was refined over the past decade when it toured hundreds of cities and towns across our province, the country and internationally. In 1981, the circus visited the Science Museum in London, England. It also visited Birmingham and Montreal, drawing crowds in excess of 10,000 people per day.

With this experience and with requests coming in from around the world either to take the circus on tour or consult in the building of indigenous science centres modelled on our own, the Ontario Science Centre has once again confirmed its international leadership both in communications technology and in the highly complex field of participatory exhibit design. That latter phrase means the hands-on type of exhibits the Ontario Science Centre is famous for.

But why is this sale, under $1 million after all, so important?

For one, I am confident it will lead to other sales in other countries. Thus it will provide hands-on learning experience in science to children and adults around the world. In developing countries especially, it will make science and technology accessible to nontechnical people.

It will also generate considerable goodwill for our province and Canada and focus attention on our high technology components and consumer products.

What is more, by tying science to trade, the science circus will help focus attention on Ontario trade activities in foreign countries and by tying science to tourism it will encourage visitors from abroad to discover Ontario. After all, the Ontario Science Centre is already one of our province's most important tourist exhibits.

That mandate was reiterated in the speech from the throne and I know members will look forward to similar statements from my colleagues in the next few weeks concerning other new initiatives taken by this government to play a leading role in the province's economic recovery.

ORAL QUESTIONS

CLOSURE OF CONSOLIDATED-BATHURST PLANT

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, before I start, I think the word should go out that it is most disrespectful of this corporal's guard of ministers not to be at the Canadian Club listening to the new vision from Brampton. I think you should make note of that and pass on to the Premier (Mr. Davis), Mr. Speaker, that they are not there.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps you could spread the word.

Mr. Peterson: I was just trying to be helpful to you, sir.

I have a question for the Minister of Labour with respect to the immediate closing, I understand tomorrow, of the Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging plant in Hamilton. The minister has been involved in these negotiations and he is, no doubt, aware there is the threat of an immediate termination of some 140 jobs in addition to the 80 or so who have already been laid off.

I am sure the minister is also aware there have been some discussions and some initiatives put forward by the employees as to a potential employee takeover-buy-out of that plant. Could the minister bring this House up to date as to the state of those negotiations and what is happening there?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am hesitant to say that particular problem has had any higher priority than any other plant closure, but it seems to have had, at least from a time-consumption point of view. We have had meetings with union representatives and company representatives, and telephone conversations with local, regional and municipal politicians and staff persons in an attempt to try to find a resolution to this.

I must admit I am disappointed with the company's attitude. To date, we have made some requests of the company which I think were reasonable. In fairness to them, they have given consideration to them but for various reasons they have thus far seen fit to disregard such requests as a meeting convened by myself with management and union officials to try to reach agreement on some of the outstanding points.

We are still hopeful we can convince the company it should at least keep the plant open for another month to give the economic council in Hamilton, the unions and the other officials involved, an opportunity to reach some sort of satisfactory alternative arrangement.

2:10 p.m.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, there are certainly press indications that the federal government may be willing to participate in assisting the employees in a buy-out of those facilities. Certainly that is a preliminary indication.

Is the minister prepared, on behalf of his government, to offer the same kind of assistance in this matter to try to keep the plant open and, in the short-term, to continue those discussions with help from both the federal and provincial governments so that, hopefully, we can keep that plant in operation?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any commitment by the federal government to provide financial assistance. I can advise the honourable Leader of the Opposition that there is a meeting that started at 1:30 p.m., and it is going on right now, between officials of my ministry and officials from the Ministry of Industry and Trade.

I certainly cannot stand in my place today and indicate that money would be available. I can certainly indicate that every possible support and consideration would be given to this very serious problem, just as it is to every plant closure that comes upon the scene these days.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the minister is aware that, in a telegram to the union, Consolidated-Bathurst has flatly refused to discuss selling the plant to the workers, even though they are prepared to put forward an offer.

Is the minister also aware that the regional council in the community, some of his Tory friends, the mayor and regional chairman, Anne Jones, feel that the company's actions are contemptible? Given this kind of a position, is the minister ready to guarantee that the machinery will not be moved out of that plant at least until such time as the employees have an opportunity to put a presentation before the company in Montreal? Will he put whatever pressure he can on them through the federal and provincial governments?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the telegram. In fact, I have a copy of the telegram, and I talked with the company official who wrote the telegram before it was written and after it was written. I have expressed my concern and disappointment. I have tried to persuade them to act otherwise.

I do not know what my Tory friends have to do with this particular circumstance because I do not approach the problems brought to me on the basis of them having come to me from a Tory, a Liberal or a member of the New Democratic Party. In fact, the honourable member knows full well that the first meeting we had was set up by himself upon a request to me.

It is true that I have been in touch on several occasions with the regional chairperson, and with the mayor. In fact, I was in touch as late as this morning with the regional chairperson. Yes, certainly, I will do everything that I can do within my power to persuade the company to give some time so the possibility of a buy-out, a purchase or a co-operative arrangement can be made involving the union officials and the union persons.

I repeat what I said to the Leader of the Opposition just a moment ago. A meeting is going on at this time between my officials and the Ministry of Industry and Trade. I am to be briefed on the outcome of that meeting just as soon as I return from question period this afternoon.

Ms. Copp: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Minister of Labour not only gets a briefing on what happens at that meeting but also provides some leadership to make sure that if government funding is necessary it can also be added to the pot to help the employees in the buy-out.

Since only two months before the closing was announced Consolidated-Bathurst signed a three-year agreement with the employees' union, has the minister investigated the possibility that the company bargained in bad faith, and/or possibly wrongfully dismissed the employees?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the union is considering the laying of charges against the company for bargaining in bad faith. If it does so that would be heard, of course, by the Ontario Labour Relations Board. Therefore, I would not want to make any further comment at this particular time.

APPOINTMENT OF POLICE CHIEF

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Solicitor General with respect to the mess that developed with the police commission in London, Ontario.

The minister will no doubt be aware that one of the police commission members, one of his appointees, chose to have secret meetings with respect to the choosing of a new chief, and he will also be aware that the mayor has refused to sit on the police commission. As a result, there is no progress whatsoever towards the choosing of a new chief and the previous chief has already left office.

May I ask the Solicitor General what he is doing from his good offices to resolve this very embarrassing situation?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, unlike the Leader of the Opposition, we do from time to time work on these matters and do not call press conferences; we reply through different means. I have been working on the matter; I have been discussing the matter with the Ontario Police Commission. The chairman of the Ontario Police Commission will be attending in London tomorrow.

On the matter of the mayor of the city of London deciding he was not going to sit on the commission, I find that most regrettable in that he does have a statutory duty as the mayor of the municipality to sit and carry out his duties under the law as a statutory person on the local police commission. The other two members are willing to serve.

The fact that somebody might have—and I say might have—used, somewhat in hindsight, some bad judgement or an unwise procedure to have consulted with different potential candidates for the chief's position, I do not find that, as some have been saying, in the nature of something that requires a public inquiry to sort out the problem.

I do not describe it as a mess; I just describe it as somebody who might not have, in hindsight, had those discussions with potential applicants for the job. But I do not find it such as to require a public inquiry or even to call for the person's resignation.

Mr. Peterson: It appears there is an impasse. It is not being helped by the minister's colleague, the minister of industry and tourism, the member for London South (Mr. Walker), who is now going around saying those nine people inside the force who applied for the job now apparently have withdrawn their applications because of the embarrassment they have been put through—at least three of them have been put through—by this one commissioner who decided to interview candidates on his own. The whole thing, as the minister will know, is at this point at an impasse and nothing is happening, which is affecting very seriously, from the report that I get, the morale of the London police force.

Since the minister has dismissed the possibility of having an inquiry of any type, what is he going to do to solve that problem now, so it does not further deteriorate over the next few months until the lapse of the appointment of this one offending commissioner?

Would the minister not agree that he has a responsibility in that regard and would it not be constructive on his part to ask the offending commissioner to do what he previously said he would do, i.e. resign, so that we can bring back the appearance of fairness and equity in this process of choosing a new chief in London? Surely that is not beyond the Solicitor General's power and is not unreasonable in the circumstances.

Hon. G. W. Taylor: I presume the Leader of the Opposition was referring to the Minister of Industry and Trade and not industry and tourism. I suppose he is about as up to date on this matter as he is on that one.

However, I will bring him up to date. The chairman of the police commission is attending tomorrow to discuss the matter with the—

Interjections.

Hon. G. W. Taylor: I find it very exhilarating that when one corrects the opposition it is not permissible, but when they are at pains to correct us, it is quite permissible. However, I will continue on in my brief conversation here.

The chairman of the Ontario Police Commission is going down to London tomorrow to discuss the matter with them. I find that a very reasonable solution to the problem, and do not, as has been requested by some people in the area, feel a royal commission or inquiry would be the only way to solve this problem. That would far out-distance this problem; it is certainly not that difficult a problem to solve. I would suggest that if the mayor, those aspirants for the job and the police commissioners were to get on with the job and complete the interviewing of individuals, the new chief would be chosen and the problem resolved.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, what exactly is the chairman of the Ontario Police Commission going to discuss with the chairman of the London Police Commission at the meeting tomorrow?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I would suspect, as has been suggested, that the chairman will discuss with them, as I have concluded that the problem is not all that large and that he will suggest to them that they continue and complete the process of choosing the new chief of police.

It is not a major difficulty that has arisen here, and I certainly would not ask for the resignation of the commissioner. Certainly the situation is not one where I would instruct or give information to my cabinet colleagues that they request a resignation of the present police commissioner.

Mr. Peterson: What is happening is that the offending commissioner is getting passive if not active support from both this minister and the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker), and I thank him for helping me with that matter.

But does this not speak to the broader issue as well, the whole matter of who can sit on a police commission, the majority being elected hands or appointed hands? Does it not speak to the entire matter of choosing a police chief and of conflicts of interest of potential police commissioners? The minister is aware that the offending police commissioner already has a conflict of interest in that one of his relatives is a member of the police force.

Does the minister not feel it is important, given this problem, now to review the entire matter and come forward to this Legislature with new rules with respect to this entire matter?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: As the Leader of the Opposition is aware, the Police Act, which that portion of the situation comes under, is presently under review, and there will undoubtedly be some increase in the number of members on the commission but no change in their majority or in how they will be appointed.

CANADA PACKERS LAYOFFS

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour about the Canada Packers layoffs. How does the minister feel about the very basic sense among a great many workers at Canada Packers that it was statements made by many people, such as the member for High Park-Swansea (Mr. Shymko), particularly during the announcement of the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development program, about the potential for closing the stockyards that contributed to the uncertainty with respect to the investment decisions of Canada Packers?

How does the minister respond to charges about the government's failure to act on the report of Mr. Kelly, published in the summer of 1982, calling on the government to take steps right away and saying: "We believe it is important that the Ontario government act on these recommendations immediately. The uncertainty about the future of the stockyards is delaying several companies in the meat packing complex from going ahead with their plans to upgrade their facilities"?

How does the minister respond to the charges that it is this kind of delay over the past two or three years that has directly contributed to the decision of Canada Packers to terminate their operation next to the stockyards and to leave 950 workers out in the cold?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, since that announcement was made I have been more concerned with the plight and the future of the 950 workers from Canada Packers and the possible spinoff effects on other workers at the stockyards than I have been with the rhetoric that has gone on over the past couple of years as to the future of the stockyards. I really believe that the leader of the third party should have directed this question to someone other than the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Rae: I thought he was responsible for plant closures, and that is exactly what we have seen.

Does the minister agree with the statement of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture and Food that this closure was "inevitable and an essential rationalization. Frankly, it has come four or five years too late"?

As the minister responsible for protecting the workers of this province does the Minister of Labour agree with that kind of statement coming from the Deputy Minister of Agriculture and Food?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned with the rationalization given for every plant closure. It seems to me that up until a few months ago most of the plant closures we had to deal with came about through bankruptcies or receiverships.

Mr. Mackenzie: Not so.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Hear me out, please. I said up until a few months ago. I was going on to say that in the last number of months I have been disturbed by the number of closures that have been brought about by rationalization. That is the problem we are trying to attack at this time.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the food processing business is a very important part of Ontario industry and a very great source of employment in the province, which obviously the Minister of Labour would be concerned about, can the minister indicate to us how the obvious differences between the member for High Park-Swansea wanting to get the stockyards out of that particular area, and the attitudes and expressions of the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Timbrell) saying it is quite fine to leave it there, are going to be reconciled on the basis of the entire processing industry in that area trying to make some decision as to where it is going to go and the employment opportunities?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, rightly or wrongly, I really have not concerned myself as to the comments of the member for High Park-Swansea or the Minister of Agriculture and Food in respect to the stockyards. I have been more concerned about the jobs that are affected there. In that regard, I strongly believe it was the intervention of my ministry and myself personally in getting Canada Packers to agree to first refusal in their other operations for employees who are affected by this particular closure.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, the minister's surprise at the process of rationalization would be quaint were its effect not so devastating on the workers, because the rationalization that is taking place in many industries in this province is the human face of recovery which the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) has been talking about over the last few days.

Instead of going on his hands and knees to companies asking them to delay things or change their minds, does the minister not think it is time we had legislation in this province requiring companies to justify plant closures so the government would be able to protect workers instead of simply letting them go to the wall every time a company decides it wants to make some more money?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I do not believe I used the term "surprised" about rationalization. I believe I used the words "concerned and worried" about rationalization.

Let me answer the honourable member's question with a question. What is his answer? Does he believe that public takeover is the answer to the problem?

Interjections.

PROTECTION OF WORKERS

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Labour. The minister is well aware that to the Consolidated-Bathurst plant we were discussing just a few moments ago it is a question of rationalization. That rationalization assists the company, but 141 skilled workers with better than 20 years' seniority are out on the street. The same is the case with Flavorite Poultry, PPG Industries, H and R. Johnson and a number of plants in Hamilton—all rationalization.

Why will the minister not take a look now—quickly, before it is too late for some of these workers—at legislation? Public justification, the community adjustment fund and the longer notice period are all suggestions made by this party and rejected by the other parties in this House. Why will he not now move in those areas to protect workers in Ontario? It is obvious we have a problem with rationalization of production.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, this province does not have to apologize to anyone for its severance arrangements, notices and so on. We are the only province in the country that has such legislation. There is only one jurisdiction in the United States and that is Maine and it comes nowhere close to what we have. As far as extensions or refinements of the present legislation are concerned, we are constantly looking at that.

Mr. Mackenzie: The minister would not establish a commission of inquiry in this case. Why is it so easy to pass legislation to protect the depositors of Crown Trust but we cannot seem to get through legislation when it is urgently needed, such as in the case of Consolidated-Bathurst and the other plants? When will he bring in legislation that is going to give them some protection?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I cannot give any commitment to the honourable member at this time that legislation will be introduced in the near term.

2:30 p.m.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, in his first answer, the minister referred to the severance pay legislation that he claims his government is so proud of. Does he not think after almost two years of work with the severance pay legislation that the time has come to re-examine it? Does he not think the time has come to reduce the minimum number of employees involved and the minimum period of work involved from five years to one year? Further, does he not think it is time to look at redefining what, for example, a permanent discontinuance is? Does he not think it is time to bring in some amendments to that severance pay legislation?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I believe that is the same question the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie) asked in different phraseology. It is time—I agree with the honourable member—it certainly is time to re-examine the legislation. That is what is going on within our ministry right now.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, how does the minister expect that kind of statement to have very much credibility with us when it was contained in the speech from the throne in 1982 and nothing was done, and when it was not even mentioned in the speech from the throne in 1983? How does he expect his statements with respect to severance pay to have any weight, at all in this Legislature when the government has dropped that specific commitment it made and did not keep in 1982?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, we have not dropped any commitments that were made in the throne speech in 1982.

ONTARIO HOME RENEWAL PROGRAM FUNDS

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing regarding OHRP, otherwise known as the Ontario home renewal program. Would the minister explain why $10.5 million of 1981-82 funds that had been committed to the Ontario home renewal program were quietly reallocated last October? Since the minister never bothered to inform us of this removal of the funds from that program, this reordering of the priorities, would he now indicate the specific program or programs to which the funds were reallocated?

Despite the minister's weak murmurings about his supposed generosity in allowing municipalities to recycle their reserve funds, the number of grants that can be offered through this process is pathetically small. How can the minister, who boasts that Ontario residents enjoy the highest-quality housing in the world, possibly justify strangling a program that is so desperately needed in the difficult economic times we are facing?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that this program has been under way for some period of time in the province. Indeed, it has been one of the programs that the government of Ontario alone has funded, no one else. There has been no participation by either municipal or federal governments. It has been going on for a period of about seven years. We have a total of something close to $140 million that we have given out that has been administered by the local municipalities and allocated to the various needy people in their communities.

I said to the communities, "Yes, in the current budget year we are looking very seriously at the elimination of that program." That does not mean to say that some reconsideration or other thoughts about renovation and rehabilitation programs will not come about over the next period of time. I did say very clearly to the municipalities that the way the program was originally established afforded them the opportunity to allocate the money and to write off certain portions of it, but also to collect back the loans from the individuals. We believe after seven years there is developing a fairly interesting amount in a rollover account for most municipalities. That is one of the reasons we have ceased the program.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, the minister will recall back in March I wrote him expressing my dismay about the fact that 300 applications in my community alone are awaiting OHRP funding. In his response, he said Windsor now receives $10,000 to $12,000 a month in OHRP repayments, which he just referred to. If he is suggesting that can keep OHRP going, that must be some kind of cruel joke. Two million dollars of OHRP money is needed to get the housing up to standard.

According to the 1981 census data, almost 170,000 dwellings in Ontario are in need of major repair. I would remind him, in spite of cancellation of this program, his government managed to find $23.2 million last year for advertising in the mass media alone. That was $4.6 million over 1981-82.

Will the minister now simply admit that the suffocation of OHRP has added to the deterioration of housing in this province, and will he make a commitment to those home owners, and the people who could return to the dignity of employment by repairing these homes, that he will recommend the reintroduction of OHRP in the provincial budget next month?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, I think I have already said very clearly that one can always have the opportunity to review the programs, and indeed we are doing exactly that. It was not meant as a cruel joke, the rollover funding, but it is there for the municipalities to make available to those who apply for it. I think it would be wrong for this House to believe that because we have withdrawn from the program, at least at this time, the federal government has had its residential rehabilitation assistance program in place and has supplemented it in the last while.

Mr. Cooke: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there are 750,000 people unemployed in this province and that renovation creates about twice as many jobs per dollar invested as does brand new housing construction, why did the government decide to cancel this very successful program with unemployment running at 12 per cent and 13 per cent across this province?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, in relationship to the program and its cancellation, indeed I think I have already answered that in the original part of my answer to the original question. There are rollover funds. I have not excluded the opportunity of still having some other programs in place.

RE-EMPLOYMENT OF FORMER SKF EMPLOYEES

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. The minister will recall that although he said it has only been a few months, it was two and a half years ago that plant rationalization took place around SKF in my riding. It was not a new phenomenon. It has been 17 months since that plant has closed. Is the minister aware that 60 per cent of those workers are still unemployed at this time? What is he doing to make sure those people get employment? What has he done?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I was aware of a large percentage; I was not aware of the 60 per cent figure and I am not disputing the accuracy of that number. My ministry, through the plant closure and employment adjustment committee, has worked with the employees to try to provide counselling services and retraining programs. I really did feel it was more successful than the numbers that have been quoted today by the honourable member.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I am quoting from statistics from a study by Paul Grayson on the SKF matter. Is the minister then not aware that of the men who are without work, 73 per cent put the blame on the management of the economy and 62 per cent put the blame on the fact that they are older workers for the situation in which they are not able to get work? Most of them, as the minister knows, are the average age of 51 now. What plan is the minister urging the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) to adopt in his new budget to make sure older workers like these are not thrown on the scrap heap but are put back into useful work for the remaining 10 to 15 years of their normal working lives?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I am confident the Treasurer of this province will have a very exciting and stimulating budget that will address the problems of unemployment and job creation in this province.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, SKF is one of the classic examples of probably having closed the wrong plant. That was something that was discovered afterwards. This minister is responsible for that whole area of plant closures and the regulations and the policies that develop about it. Had they been in place at that time, this number of people would not now be out of work. What is he doing at the present time to prevent a recurrence of that and a recurrence of this kind of layoff?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, we cannot do anything retroactively on SKF and the member understands that, but what we have done, and I realize this is going to seem to be very minimal in the light of the seriousness of the problems, is to commission a study on SKF, as the member is aware, as to the impact on all of the workers. We are funding part of that study and we are hoping to be able to benefit from the information that will be provided to us.

EXTENDED CARE BED PROGRAM

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs concerning his much-heralded extended care bed program in northern Ontario, the program that was supposed to be announced around Christmas as to which communities would be receiving the beds and when.

2:40 p.m.

When is the minister going to make the announcement of the communities that have been chosen? When can I inform the good people of Atikokan that, because of their hard work and their raising of the money for their portion, they will be able to go ahead with this program?

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased the honourable member has asked me this question because it gives me the opportunity to expound at great length about what a great program this is.

It was announced in the throne speech, but I would point out we made no commitment that we would notify the communities by last December. We said an application process would be devised, which has been done. That has gone out to the communities and the interest is absolutely unreal. Right now it is before the review committees of both the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Northern Affairs, and Management Board of Cabinet. I am hoping to make an announcement in the near future.

Mr. T. P. Reid: The minister is aware he and his officials have said "Christmas," "after Christmas," "February" and "early March." Can he be more definitive as to when this announcement will be made? Can he give us an indication of the ranking of who will be able to go ahead, because Atikokan in particular has pushed this program for many years and has had the money for some time? It is quite anxious to be able to have something in the ground this year, not next year.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: I am very much aware of the community's interest. I want to congratulate all the communities that have raised their one-sixth portion of the capital cost, but it is difficult for me to give the member a definitive answer. I suggest if he follow me around northern Ontario, he will hear the announcement for himself in the near future.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, given that the minister announced this even before it was contained in the throne speech over a year ago, and given that he has had some excellent presentations, particularly the one from the town of Geraldton, why is it taking so long? Three or four months ago he told me it had been reviewed by his ministry and was now in the hands of the Ministry of Health. Why is it taking the Ministry of Health so long to reach a decision on the excellent programs that have been hanging fire for well over 13 months?

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Mr. Speaker, there is more to this program than just a building per se. It has to tie in to the hospital itself. The electrical system has to be expanded and the heating system has to be expanded in many cases. The kitchen staff has to be broadened. All those administrative items have to be considered in the planning process. That is part of the planning process that is going on now.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour and it has a real employment dimension to it too. It pertains to the application of the Home Owners with Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation groups in Simcoe county, Hamilton, Guelph, Kitchener, Windsor and Ottawa, and others, for assistance under the Canada-Ontario employment development program for removal of foam insulation from their homes.

Recognizing the labour intensive nature of the work and the tremendous need for corrective measures in the urea formaldehyde foam insulation homes, why has the government been instrumental in refusing approval of these applications under COED?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the province has refused. It is my understanding it is the federal government that has refused. The member should bear in mind the COED program is a co-operative program between the federal and the provincial governments. There has to be approval from both sides before a project goes forward.

Mr. Swart: Can the minister not recognize the scepticism of UFFI groups, myself and many others that he has not turned it down? Although Hamilton applied last December, it has not even been approved in principle. The secretariat has not even had any negotiations with them. Mr. Michel Simard, who is the assistant to Mr. Ouellet, says, "We have indications from the Ontario government they will not participate, even though we are encouraging it and would fully participate ourselves."

If the minister has not refused, will he now give a commitment to this House and to the UFFI home owners that the province considers HUFFI groups to be eligible for the COED program and will work for approval of those requests in the joint secretariat?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I would appreciate it very much if the member would send across to me a copy of the letter he has from Mr. Ouellet. Certainly I will be happy to look at the matter again.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is taking a look at this, perhaps he could raise with his provincial cabinet colleagues and with his federal colleagues the fact of the danger of continued use of UFFI in homes in the province. For example, there was a home in my riding that recently burned to the ground, and 10 firefighters suffered nausea and a number of other real problems while trying to fight the fire. Would the minister take to his cabinet colleagues the word that it is very important that we move immediately to remove UFFI from these homes?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, it sounds like a reasonable request and I am prepared to respond to it, but I would question the fact that the injuries to the firefighters were caused by the existence of that substance. That is not my understanding at all.

ONTARIO STOCK YARDS

Mr. Shymko: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture and Food in the light of the questions raised by the member for York South (Mr. Rae) and the member for Kitchener-Wilmot (Mr. Sweeney), who to some degree misled us in his own comment that the member for High Park-Swansea wanted the relocation of the stockyards.

Mr. Speaker: The question, please.

Mr. Shymko: The question is, in the light of the decision by Canada Packers to relocate its plants, in the light of the Keljair report on the basis of which the ministry decided the present location of the stockyards will remain, and in the light of the fact that the argument given by Canada Packers that the location of the stockyards has absolutely nothing to do with the feasibility of its operation of the present site, is the ministry prepared, first, to join the municipal task force that is apparently being established to study the entire area in a full-scale inquiry into the location of the stockyards and the industry operating in line with that location?

Second, does the ministry intend to make an internal study that would look at the entire location of the stockyards, which apparently has nothing to do with the operation of the meat-packing industry?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Food will please answer one.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, the member will know I met with his worship the mayor and the two local aldermen several weeks ago following the announcement by Canada Packers, at which time I revealed to them that the ministry had been working on an in-depth analysis of the red meat industry for over a year. I released that analysis this morning and it is now on its way to members of the assembly.

Mr. Bradley: About time.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: About time? Well, they have been there a year.

I also indicated that in my view and in the view of the ministry, the decision by Canada Packers to move its slaughter operations to Burlington and to Kitchener does not in and of itself mean the stockyards should or would close. I point out that the company has been buying most of its hogs from the yards and anticipates continuing to buy most of its cattle at the yards, even when the slaughter operations have been moved to Burlington. The company it bought out in Burlington has been buying most of its cattle from the Ontario Stock Yards on Keele Street as well.

When I revealed this to the mayor and to the local aldermen, they were pleased to know the ministry was well on top of the situation, as it is in most things. I assured them I would be more than happy to have officials of my ministry assist the task force.

I can certainly understand their concern about maintaining a viable industry in the west end of the city. Mr. Speaker, you will know, since you represent a large number of cattlemen who ship to the Toronto yards, that there is a much bigger industry out there than just that one CP slaughterhouse.

Of course we will work with them. I urged them, in fact, to create the task force to respond to this report, to look at the future of the meat industry and everything related to it—the food industry in the west end of Toronto—in the light of the very interesting results of this report.

2:50 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Just before you put your supplementary, it has been brought to my attention that you may have inadvertently used some unparliamentary language, and if you did, I would ask you to withdraw it, please.

Mr. Bradley: The word was misled.

Mr. Shymko: I withdraw, if I did.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Shymko: In the light of the fundamental argument in the Keljair report that the location of the stockyards is fundamental to the operation of an expansion of Canada Packers, since that fundamental argument has been pulled out from under the feet of that report in the decision of the ministry, is there an intention on the part of the ministry once again to review the location of the stockyards and to look at the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development program, which said that there should be a full-scale study and inquiry involving the union, local taxpayers, local industry and the municipality, so that in the future this red herring pulled by Canada Packers will not be used again and we are not going to be surprised with decisions?

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Sic Duncan Allan on him.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: You know whereof you speak.

I would not want to leave the impression that the ministry is considering moving the stockyards. At this time, given the decision by Canada Packers, given that they will likely continue to buy most of their cattle requirements at the Toronto stockyards, and given that they, in fact, last year handled close to 40 per cent of all the cattle sold in the province, I can see no reason at this time to contemplate a review of the location of the stockyards.

VISITOR

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in your gallery today is Lorne Maeck, the former Minister of Revenue and former member for Parry Sound.

Mr. Speaker: It is always nice to see a former Minister of Revenue.

Mr. Bradley: The former minister will want to know that the program of grants to seniors has not advanced considerably in terms of its administration since he left, but that is not my question.

NIAGARA RIVER WATER QUALITY

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment, who is apparently unscarred from his trip to Niagara District Secondary School this morning. The question is related to the drinking water available to municipalities in the Niagara region.

The minister has had under consideration for some time—and many of us at the local level have advocated this measure—a proposal to implement in the Niagara Falls plant the activated carbon filtration system as a pilot project or, as an alternative, another method which has been discussed with officials of his ministry which may be less expensive and as effective as the activated carbon filtration system. Is the minister prepared at this time, after evaluating those two systems, to make a statement as to whether he is prepared to fund a pilot project in Niagara Falls?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, as I think the honourable member is aware, I have on numerous occasions discussed the viability of an the rights of francophones in this province in a constitutional way? Given the fact the Premier has alluded to the rights of anglophones in Quebec and wants some reciprocity in that respect, does that mean he is prepared to look afresh at that particular option which he has?

Hon. Mr. Wells: My perception in reading this, although I did not hear the speech today, would be that at this point we are talking about something rather different. We are talking about those things Quebec has said are not in the Constitution which prevents it from accepting it in the way the rest of us hope it would.

As to the idea of discussing full fiscal compensation, the Prime Minister of Canada has suggested perhaps we should talk about a veto. I think we realize it is a little late to go back and talk about vetoes in the Constitution. That, of course, was the constitutional position the government of Canada first put forward, which this province and New Brunswick supported. It was rejected by the other provinces and changed when the constitutional accord came about.

I think in this context the Premier is talking about things such as fiscal compensation and those other things which would make the Constitution of Canada acceptable to, or accepted by the government of Quebec. It should also be underlined that the Constitution of Canada does apply and the people of Quebec enjoy all the privileges and responsibilities that go with the new Constitution.

ANNUAL REPORTS

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: I draw your attention to standing order 33(a) which requires that, "ministers shall present all reports required by statute within six months of the close of the reporting period unless reasons for delay are given to the House."

The annual report of the registrar of loan and trust corporations for the year 1979 was tabled nine months late on April 21, 1981, and we have not as yet received or had tabled in the House the annual reports of the registrar for the years 1980 and 1981.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the minister responsible will take action as requested.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

EMPLOYMENT STANDARDS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Wrye moved, seconded by Mr. Ruston, first reading of Bill 19, An Act to amend the Employment Standards Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, this bill would amend the group termination scheme of the act to provide the severance pay as due when the employment of 15 rather than 50 employees is terminated during a six-month period. It is payable to employees with one year's rather than five years' seniority and is not subject to a maximum, rather than being limited to the equivalent of 26 weeks' wages.

YONGE-ROSEDALE CHARITABLE FOUNDATION ACT

Mrs. Scrivener moved, seconded by Mr. J. A. Taylor, first reading of Bill Pr14, An Act respecting the Yonge-Rosedale Charitable Foundation.

Motion agreed to.

CITY OF TORONTO ACT

Ms. Fish moved, seconded by Mr. Robinson, first reading of Bill Pr3, An Act respecting the City of Toronto.

Motion agreed to.

THOMAS-HAMILTON-WEBBER LTD. ACT

Mr. Van Horne moved, seconded by Mr. Sweeney, first reading of Bill Pr11, An Act to revive Thomas-Hamilton-Webber Ltd.

Motion agreed to.

LEMON-AID ACT

Mr. Philip moved, seconded by Mr. Swart, first reading of Bill 20, An Act to protect the Purchasers of New Motor Vehicles.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, this bill, which will come to be known as the Lemon-Aid Act, 1983, will entitle the consumer who owns a defective new motor vehicle to obtain either an equivalent vehicle in replacement or a full refund of the purchase price.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to be able to reply to the speech from the throne. Last year I did not have a seat in this Legislature and so was not able to respond in the House.

Interjections.

Mr. Rae: You had your chance and you blew it.

I very much appreciate this opportunity. I notice the Premier (Mr. Davis) is here and I appreciate his being here. I just want to tell him I am going to be talking exclusively about provincial issues, so if he decides to leave early and loses interest in what I am saying I will understand.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I just sent you a note saying I was leaving, but not because of that.

Mr. Rae: I intend to speak this afternoon principally on three issues that I believe are of deep and profound concern to the people of this province. I intend to speak this afternoon about jobs, about the lack of them in this province, and about the human impact on our people that this extended joblessness has had and is having and will continue to have unless we give recovery the human face it deserves.

I also intend to speak about housing, because I believe where there is a population having increasing difficulties making ends meet, one which is more poorly housed this year than it was five years ago in terms of cost, availability and access, this is an issue that will not go away and no amount of rhetoric in the speech from the throne will make it go away.

Finally, I intend to speak principally this afternoon about our health care system and particularly about what has happened to the nursing home industry in this province and on the fate of a great many senior citizens whom I believe deserve better from the government than they have been receiving and who certainly deserve better when it comes to institutional care.

This is not an issue that simply affects senior citizens. It is an issue that affects each and every one of us, because old age is not a disease, it is a condition of life itself. It is also an unquestionable fact, and I say this to the Premier in all sincerity, that there is now a conflict going on in Ontario between those of us who believe in a universal medicare program, those of us who believe that medicare is designed to provide care for people regardless of means from birth until death, and the world of private profit, the world of private enrichment, the world of cutbacks and of profiteering that has no place whatsoever in a health care system worthy of the name.

When I say I am focusing on the nursing home industry, I am focusing on what is happening to a great many people who are in nursing homes today. The issue is far broader than simply that. The issue is whether we are going to have a public medicare system worthy of the name, or whether we are going to allow those profits of private enterprise and private enrichment to encroach and entrench their position in the health care system to a point where it becomes unrecognizable as a universally accessible system.

An article came across my desk the other day from the Canadian Medical Association Journal. Under the heading of Economics, it is called "The Ontario Hospital Experiment: American Managers March In." It is by a regular contributor to the CMA Journal named Milan Korcok, who appropriately lives in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. Mr. Korcok describes the decision by the Ministry of Health to allow a company called AMI, an American private hospital management company, to take over the management of the Hawkesbury and District General Hospital.

This might seem to be a very minor matter were it not for the fact that I believe it represents a fundamental change. Indeed, the CMA agrees with the fact that it represents a fundamental change.

I quote from the final page of Mr. Korcok's article, where he says, "The willingness of the Ontario government to bless the Hawkesbury contract surely looks like a green light for the re-entry of a private sector that has been effectively locked out of health care insurance."

It goes on to quote Mr. Reid, the gentleman in the Ministry of Health who is responsible for the business-oriented new development program, as saying this about the contract between the hospital in Hawkesbury and AMI: "We don't impose these contracts. (But) if a hospital came to me tomorrow and suggested they would like to go the Hawkesbury route, then we would investigate it and, quite frankly, I would be supportive of it. Right now, what we are looking for is another (hospital) volunteer."

They then go on to quote the gentleman who used to be an employee of the Ministry of Health. If I may say so, this is a pattern we can see repeated throughout what is now unfortunately called the health care industry. A former employee of the Ministry of Health says they are looking for expansion and they are delighted with the challenge.

Another official of AMI, Mr. Silvin, says Ontario is the new target area for AMI. "We are focusing on Ontario for our achievement list. We would love to take on a teaching hospital that's our goal."

I think we can see what has happened in Hawkesbury is simply the thin edge of the wedge.

Nowhere is the conflict between the demands for public health, the right of people to a decent living environment regardless of their economic circumstances, the conflict between that sense and that vision and the very different reality more clear than in the tragic situation facing so many senior citizens, particularly those who are unable to speak or care for themselves in many instances. They find themselves with very few choices in life.

When we consider what happens to many seniors we realize that as a society we are getting older and a great many seniors are faced with not wanting to leave their homes even though the government does not provide them with adequate home care services. They suddenly become very ill. When faced with a very sudden illness, they and their families have to make some very difficult choices. I want to suggest that the choices they are presented with in our society are totally unsatisfactory. A great many people face tremendous hardship because of the choices that are imposed on them.

There are at the moment 340 nursing homes in Ontario, virtually all of them organized on a private profit basis. Some of them are run on a multinational basis as part of multinational chains. They have 28,686 beds. They are run on a private profit basis. They are inspected by an inspection staff from the Ministry of Health which consists of three fire inspectors for 340 nursing homes in Ontario, three environmental health inspectors for 340 nursing homes, 14 nursing inspectors for 340 nursing homes, and three regional supervisors for a grand total of 24.

On April 11, 1983, Mr. Paul Gould, who has just recently been named the manager of nursing home services in the Ministry of Health, gave a public presentation to the Concerned Friends of Ontario Citizens in Care Facilities group, which I will be returning to in a moment. Mr. Gould had these comments to make, among others. I am quoting from what he said. Like the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) we too take notes at some of these meetings.

He said: "With 340 homes it is not an easy or quick end product we are trying to achieve. The solutions are not as easy as they appear to be." He then went on to say: "Our staff are being run off their feet. A lot of pressure is on. We would like to see the best quality care on a restricted budget, given the restraint program the government is on." In a sense that sets the stage for what I am about to describe.

As leader of our party and as someone who has, because of personal circumstances, taken an interest in the nursing home industry and in the choices facing seniors, like many others I have received many letters. I would like to read letters I have received from three very different people about very different circumstances.

I believe these letters, together with the rest of the evidence which I want to introduce this afternoon, indicate there is something very gravely and seriously wrong with the way in which our nursing home industry is run, organized and managed. Perhaps even more fundamental than that, there is something very wrong in the government's attitude to senior citizens and to the role and place of private enterprise in the health care field.

The first letter I would like to read comes to me from a Mrs. Gwenyth Grube. George Grube, who died last year, was one of the founders of our party and a candidate for us in many elections. For many years he was president of the Ontario Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. He was a professor of classics at Trinity College of the University of Toronto and a jewel of an individual.

He was a friend to me in his later years. I am fortunate and indeed proud to have his personal copy of the book Social Planning for Canada which he was involved in writing and which, as members know, was one of the principal critiques of the Canadian economy produced in the 1930s.

One can imagine how upsetting it was for me to receive last year this letter from Mrs. Grube with respect to care her husband was receiving at a nursing home in this province.

I intend to name these nursing homes, because I do not think we can go on any longer pretending that everything is okay in these industries. I do not think we can go along any longer saying that all is well and that anything is served by not naming names, giving examples and being very specific. I would not pull my punches in this respect any more than we should with respect to a hospital, and it is important for us to remember that.

This is a copy of a letter that Mrs. Grube wrote to the Ministry of Health nursing home division:

"Dear Sir or Madam:

"I am writing to complain of conditions at Barton Place Nursing Home, 914 Bathurst Street. My husband, George Grube, was moved there on January 13, 1982, from Central Hospital where he had received very satisfactory care. He was a bed and wheelchair patient and after a fall was put into loose restraint. He did not grumble about this or even mention it to me on my daily visits.

"At Barton Place, although he was clearly very weak, he was not given a restraint but a small movable table was put in front of him. He could push it away with one hand. He fell on Saturday, February 6, and was taken to Toronto Western Hospital to have a head cut stitched up. On February 9 he fell again, broke his hip and sustained other head injuries. He is 82.

"Knowing how professionals hate advice from nonprofessionals I unfortunately postponed suggesting a restraint until it was too late. Several friends who visited my husband, one with nursing experience, say they too were anxious on his behalf but like me hesitated to interfere. My daughter from New York went to collect his clothes from Barton Place and to find out how the accident happened. She was foiled in her attempt.

"A great deal of pain and suffering has ensued and perhaps worse is to come. Even from a tax point of view, hospital care is, of course, very much more expensive than nursing home care. I could say a lot more about conditions at Barton Place, but for the moment will confine myself to the insecurity of patients."

She sent me a copy of that letter. We wrote back and forth and she wrote me finally on May 15, 1982, to say:

"Many thanks for your letter. I have received three letters from Mr. Klammer." Mr. Klammer was at that time the chief of the nursing home inspection service.

"February 26; acknowledged my letter and promised investigation. March 10; a disingenuous befuddlement in much the same words as the repeat on May 10. (We have got under their skin.) I can't tell whether Mr. Klammer is stupid or just hopes that we are."

3:30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Grube is a lady, you will know, who speaks her mind in no uncertain terms.

A few points: "They learned nothing and did nothing after George's fall on February 6 to avoid a repeat on February 9. The doctor evidently was not consulted, nor was I. When endeavouring to get a refund on the money that I had prepaid, I was told George's doctor was away for two weeks and no other doctor could sign a cheque for me. I finally got the refund by frequent phoning.

"Shouldn't we insist on higher standards, then?" she goes on to say. "A comfortable lounge on each floor, for instance. On George's floor a sunroom not big enough for all the patients, served also as dining room and TV room. Many patients had to sit in their wheelchairs in the corridor staring at the opposite wall. Regarding taking the matter further, as you suggest, only will-power is keeping George alive. He is very ill. Perhaps we should wait a while?"

As I said, Mr. Speaker, George Grube has since passed away.

I think it was receiving this letter, as I did very soon after I became leader of our party and very soon after some personal experiences that caused me as a son and grandson to look into the question of nursing homes, that caused me to ask some questions about what was going on. We made some inquiries and had some discussions with a number of groups, including the Concerned Friends group.

Before I get to some of the things we have discovered in the last number of months, I want to quote a couple more letters because I think it is important that we get the evidence into the record as to what average, ordinary people are experiencing—not people who have any kind of axe to grind, not people who are trying to make a political point, but people who are simply sending letters, frequently just sending copies to us so we will be aware of what their concerns are.

I have another letter here from an individual who has asked to remain anonymous but who is a constituent of mine. She again sent me a copy of a letter she wrote to the Minister of Health. This letter is dated November 3, 1982, and in it she describes two experiences she has had with respect to two nursing homes for her mother.

It may take a little time, but I think it is important that these letters get into the record and that we see what is going on in incident after incident so that no one can get up and say, "You are just talking about a number of isolated incidents." There is a pattern here, and it is a pattern that has to be dealt with, that has to be remedied. The pattern, I believe, speaks to the way in which health care is treated by this government and to the way in which this government has allowed the forces of private profit to have a virtual monopoly in the care for senior citizens in nursing homes.

"On the morning of October 14, 1982," my constituent writes, "my father and my sister admitted my mother into a nursing home in Toronto." I have since ascertained from this constituent that she is speaking of the Lincoln Place Nursing Home in Toronto.

"My sister talked with the administrator at length about pills mother was to take, a total of four a day. The following is a report of what took place in the next five days.

"Wednesday, October 15, my brother visited her at lunch time, and she seemed a little confused but settled. She was, however, not wearing her own clothes.

"Thursday, October 16, no one visited.

"Friday, October 17, my husband and I visited, and we couldn't believe how she looked. She was to have had her hair washed and set by the hairdresser. It had been washed but obviously not set. She was wearing someone else's dress that was too big, and she had no bra on. I asked her if she was taking all her pills, and she replied, 'I haven't had any pills yet.' She had two bruises on her arm.

"I spoke to the woman at the front station about the bruises and the pills. She looked through mother's records, etc., and said there was no record of any medication given, even though all this had been discussed on the day she was admitted. She was to have been given one high-blood-pressure pill and three a day of another drug prescribed by her doctor in treatment of possible Alzheimer's disease.

"Saturday, October 18, my father and my sister visited, and again she did not have her own clothes on. Not only that, they had not even unpacked her suitcase. My father and sister were very upset at how she looked, and my father wanted to take her home that very day. My sister phoned me from the nursing home, and we decided to leave her there one more night and discuss it further with the family.

"Sunday, October 19, my father's decision was to get her out of that place because she was not being looked after properly. My sister called down to say we'd be picking her up after supper. When we got there about 6:30 p.m., she had no undergarments on, she was wearing an old pair of slacks that were too big and a brown sweater coat (also not her own) with one button done up. Her hair had not even been combed. What a sad, heartbreaking sight to see your mother like that. We dressed her and took her home. My father is 82 years old and my mother is 72."

"This is the second experience with nursing homes. In July she was admitted to one." Again, I have ascertained that this is the Town and Country Nursing Homes in Thornhill. "The administrator there told us not to visit her for seven to 10 days so she could get used to being there. My brother visited after five days and did not like what he saw. We visited after a week and she looked terrible. They kept them drugged. She did not even have her teeth in. Can you imagine anyone not noticing she did not have her teeth and trying to eat her supper? I demanded that they find her teeth immediately, because we had taken her a couple of home-made cookies. They found the teeth and were trying to shove them in her mouth until I noticed that they were not even her own teeth. The woman that shared the bedroom had her teeth in her mouth. It was revolting, to say the least.

"I told my dad this and the next day we went to pick her up and dad did not even recognize her. He walked right by her to the desk. In this place they kept them in a type of high chair for hours on end and they could not get out. My mother is living at home again now and my father is doing his best to look after her. Doesn't anyone care what happens in nursing homes? Most of these nursing homes are government subsidized. Do the people who run these nursing homes really care about their patients? Are there any answers?"

I have been in touch on many occasions with the lady who wrote this letter and now can confirm that this lady's mother did go home, that she subsequently broke her hip while at home on March 11, and that she is now in the Etobicoke General Hospital.

A third letter I have is from an individual living in Orillia. Again, he has asked to remain anonymous, and I will be saying a word about why people want their names to be kept anonymous. That, in itself, is an indication of what is wrong with the nursing home industry in this province. He again has copies of letters he sent to the Minister of Health and the replies the minister has sent to him.

I simply want to indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, what his concerns are and give you a sense of the difficulties facing a great many families and the difficulties facing a great many people who I think deserve better in their old age than they are receiving from this government, and certainly better than they are receiving from some of the people in the industry.

This letter is dated January 2, 1983.

"Dear Sir:

"I was in Blenheim, Ontario, between Christmas and New Year's to visit my father who is in the Canadianna nursing home in Chatham, Ontario.

"It was very upsetting to notice that 90 per cent of the residents on his floor were mentally retarded. There is no one who has more feeling for them than myself, but I do feel they should be by themselves.

"Is this how the government of the day is able to close many of the mental hospitals in Ontario, at the expense of senior citizens? The staff at the nursing home were fine, but the atmosphere was not conducive to improving the health of those who were in there with physical problems only. The weeping, wailing and staring eyes were getting to me the few hours I was there. It is not very nice when you still have your mental faculties to spend your last days in this type of environment."

He goes on to talk about the cost and how expensive it was, and then he says: "Since the Canadianna nursing home still did not have a semi-private or ward room available, the family made the decision to move him to Guilds Nursing Home, which is three miles southeast of Blenheim. This is costing $15 a day but no extended health care. The doctor was not too happy about the move but this is all my parents can afford. However, my father is much happier in Guilds and gets tender loving care from all the staff which will probably do more for his condition than anything. Speaking to my mother by phone today my father is resting better now and able to go by wheelchair to the dining area for his meals."

In the further correspondence that takes place it turns out this gentleman's father is not, in fact, in a nursing home at all. He is now in a rest home. I think it is worth reading a letter this gentleman got from the minister, dated March 22:

"Further to my letter, my staff have looked into the concerns you raised regarding the nursing home in Chatham. Nursing homes in Ontario are available to all the residents of this province who are in need of nursing care as determined by their attending physicians and according to the criteria established under the extended health care program. In a home the size of Canadianna, there will inevitably be residents who have many different disabilities which may be of physical or mental origin. Nevertheless, they all require those nursing services which are provided in the nursing home.

"The facility in Guilds where your father is now a resident is not a licensed nursing home, but a rest home." In other words, it is an entirely unlicensed private operation. "This is the reason there are no extended health care benefits."

3:40 p.m.

Those three letters, plus of course the evidence which my colleague the member for Bellwoods (Mr. McClellan) introduced before the standing committee on social development, which was considering the estimates of the Ministry of Health, the documentation which he so graphically and movingly gave with respect to the circumstances of the Ark Eden home, indicated to me very clearly that there was something profoundly wrong and more work needed to be done. We needed to know more. We needed to find out exactly how this kind of situation could have developed in Ontario.

I might add, when one gets a very positive letter from the minister, or a letter from Mr. Klamer or somebody in the ministry staff, it is perhaps worth remembering. It is perhaps worth my quoting once again the letter that Mr. Klamer wrote on August 11, 1981, with respect to the Ark Eden Nursing Home. I think it is important to put on the record exactly what this government was doing when it was faced with the tragic situation at that home, which has now been admitted to by the Minister of Health.

"The nurse inspector has completed her investigation into your concerns identified in your memo dated July 27, 1981. The nurse inspector interviewed staff members and perused the staff time schedule which the payroll was taken from. It is reflected that adequate staff has been provided to ensure that no nursing unit is left unattended. The staff assured the inspector there was at least one person in the nursing unit at all times.

"The nurse inspector did an inspection of the personal care programs and outcomes and concluded that the essential components in care fundamentals of the nursing program are intact, well established and maintained."

It goes on to give the same kind of whitewash to the situation at the Ark Eden home, a whitewash which flies in the face of the fact that at the very time this gentleman was writing this particular letter, the nursing home in question was in violation of several items in the regulations in the Nursing Homes Act.

We then have the brief of the Concerned Friends of Ontario Citizens in Care Facilities, the relatives of people in institutions in this province. This is an organization which has done a tremendous amount to get this issue into the open and to give courage and confidence to residents and to friends and relatives of residents who are caught in this labyrinth of secrecy, this labyrinth of free enterprise, and in decisions taken which prevent them from being able to provide adequate care for their families.

They say, for example: "Within the membership of this organization we have now documented situations involving neglect through confidential feedback from relatives who visit homes frequently."

The same concerns surface again and again: Poor nutrition; lack of cleanliness; poorly trained staff; staff unwilling to relate to residents or relatives; people left sitting on bedpans for long periods; over-medication of residents; mysterious injuries, unexplained bruises; injuries left untreated; bedsores. There is the lack of any kind of stimulation, which in turn leads to more institutionalized behaviour; no resident or relative input whatsoever in the development of care plans, medical treatment and/or assessments without consent; misuse of form 1 as a means of moving residents into psychiatric facilities; inappropriate moves and transfers to other facilities without consent; total loss of privacy and dignity; inadequate personal care and hygiene. And it goes on and on.

In addition, we have another body of evidence which has never really been drawn on and never really seen the light of day. That is the evidence which has come forward from a number of employees' organizations in making their arbitration submissions.

One of the great themes that can be seen to be running through the concerns that are expressed by friends and relatives, and by parents and the concerns that are expressed by staff, is the inadequacy of staff, the fact there is not enough staff to do the job that needs to be done.

When one hears this from relatives, it frequently comes out as a complaint about the staff, because what they are saying is there is not enough being done. "They had to go up to another floor" or whatever; or, "They were very short, they did not have time to talk to my mother," or father or brother or sister. But if one asks the staff these questions, they will say: "Of course that is a problem. It is a problem because there is simply not enough time in the day to do the kind of job that needs to be done."

Again, there are very graphic statements that are made by individuals in these institutions who are working hard in a very difficult job. I would like to read a description written by members of a Canadian Union of Public Employees' local in reply to an arbitration grievance with respect to an arbitration at the River Glen Haven Nursing Home:

"As we indicated earlier, this home has 90 residents of whom approximately 35 per cent have psychiatric problems. Another 15 per cent are alcoholics and suffer from alcoholic-related diseases and must be kept on controlled drugs. A good number suffer varying degrees of senility, have physical problems related to strokes, multiple sclerosis, etc., while others have behavioural problems. Some display violent behaviour. The majority are classified as heavy-care patients, those who require a lot of assistance, such as lifting in and out of bed, assistance with toileting, bathing, washing, etc.

"With few exceptions, the vast majority of patients need total nursing care, have little or no control of their body functions, need assistance with their food and all need supervision."

That is the point that has to be made again and again. The picture that many try to portray of a nursing home is increasingly out of the reality of what a nursing home does. It is not a kind of rest home where people are gladly walking around with an endless amount to do, endless activities going on. That is not the reality. In many instances, particularly on some floors of nursing homes, the reality is they have become chronic care hospitals.

The whole division which has been made by the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Community and Social Services between those who have extended-care needs and those who do not have extended-care needs, and those who should be in a hospital—the whole division between rest homes and homes for the aged and nursing homes and chronic care hospitals bears no relationship to the reality of what is really going on in these places.

I would like to describe what this union has to say about some of the practices that have taken place in this particular place. "The following is a partial list of complaints brought to the union's attention by various employees of the home that indicate the degree of difficulty encountered in attempting to properly carry out their duties and responsibilities.

"1. The thermostats have been preset and locked in the patients' dining room. Temperatures have been recorded as low as 52 degrees at breakfast time and 63 degrees at lunch time in the winter months.

"2. Numerous shifts have started without sufficient linen supplies. Employees resort to using one end of the towel for washing and the other end for drying patients. On occasion employees have had to use rags. Because of the shortage, some patients were not given their baths or showers. Often there was not sufficient bed linen.

"3. Sterile gloves and gowns for handling patients with open sores, shingles, etc., are often not available.

"4. The supply of sterile dressings often runs out so that staff is forced to use incontinent pads.

"5. Employees complain that hot water tanks are set too low with the result patients often have to be bathed in cold water. Laundry staff complains that water is not hot enough to properly clean bed clothes.

"6. Laundry staff no longer supplied with bleach or fabric softener resulting in stained and dirty looking sheets and linens and the clothes are full of static.

"7. Kitchen staff reported that employers changed meat companies and meat is now of very poor quality. Grocery company has been changed also and now they get rusted cans and cans with dents in them. The kitchen is still short of pots and pans. Some pans have holes in them. There are no SOS pads, etc. There are just enough bowls for each patient's use." This sounds like something out of Charles Dickens. "If any bowls are broken, some patients will not get cereal or soup. The employer will not purchase any more bowls or cups. Cups are also in short supply.

"Kitchen staff also reports that the stove in the kitchen does not work properly. One oven has a broken door which is always open an inch or so. As a result the broiler is always coming on. All food put in this oven burns. The second oven does not heat up properly and it takes nearly five hours to cook a meatloaf. The employer refuses to repair or replace these stoves.

"8. The cleaning staff has been told they will not receive any more disinfectant or brushes to scrub the toilets. They have to use warm water and dish soap and their bare hands to clean the toilets. Many cleaning materials such as Saniflush, toilet bowl brushes, rubber gloves are not being supplied.

"9. The alarm buzzer for the main entrance is often turned off and the patients often leave the building unnoticed. Patients have been found outside of the building. This especially happens when the home is operating short-staffed. Patients have often been found wandering outside in the snow without warm clothing and wearing only slippers on their feet.

3:50 p.m.

"We have pointed out only some of the more serious problems, as many, many more have been reported. The most frequent problem brought to our attention is the number of times the home has operated short-staffed because the employer fails to replace staff who are ill, on vacation, on leave of absence, etc.

"In one four-month period, between February and May of this year, 81 different shifts operated without a full complement of staff." That is 81 shifts without a full complement of staff. "This results in the patients not receiving the proper care they need and deserve, and employees being overworked." The union goes on to say, "It is our opinion that these conditions exist in order that the employer can maximize his profits."

Similarly, I would like to quote from a brief that was made with respect to the Tender Loving Care Nursing Home and give the House a sense of what it means to work in these places, and the kind of work that is involved.

"Patients are bathed (often several times a day as many have no control of their bodily functions), given mouth care, foot care, nail care and other personal attention and treatment. Aides are responsible for keeping the patients' rooms tidy by cleaning the closets, dressers, drawers, chairs, wheelchairs, etc. When a patient dies, the nurse's aide is responsible for preparing the body for the coroner, which could involve washing the patient, combing and dressing the body. There is no morgue at this home so bodies are left in their rooms until the coroner arrives. It is not unusual that this takes a day or more.

"This is just a brief outline of some of the general duties involved in patient care. We outline them here, not only for the board's information, but also to explain some of the difficulties that employees have expressed that they encounter in the carrying out of their duties."

In other words, the frustration that is felt is a frustration that is felt by the employees themselves, just as much as it is felt by many of the parents and relatives of some residents.

"We have been told by employees that the shampoo supplied to them is so thin it won't make suds when they attempt to wash the patients' hair. The mouth wash has been diluted, and they are not allowed to use the hair conditioner.

"We have been told that the linen is so disgraceful they would not let a dog lie in it, face cloths are so thin aides get excrement over themselves when they wash patients who have soiled themselves. Towels are so worn and thin that pieces stick to patients' bodies when they are being dried. There is always a shortage of linen and employees resort to hiding it so they will have enough for their particular patients' needs."

They then go on to describe several problems they experience with patient violence. That is particularly true in those nursing homes which are caring for people who are either ex-psychiatric patients or who suffer from severe problems of mental retardation who are now being cared for in nursing homes in Ontario.

I quoted from the letter from the gentleman from Chatham, and I think it is important we make this point. We are not denying the minister's statement that a nursing home has an obligation to care for people whatever the reason for their being there, but we want to ask members of the government to consider what the impact would be on them personally if they were, in a sense, in a situation where they were spending their days, entirely rational, on a ward where the majority of people were suffering from severe emotional or retardational problems.

This is a quote from a book by Clifford Bennett called Nursing Home Life: What It Is and What It Could Be. Mr. Bennett himself has been a resident for some time in a nursing home.

He said: "While a patient, I was very conscious of the plight of the rational patients. They were a lost group, obviously living in an environment which was unsuited to their needs. Many were in wheelchairs, some used walking aids, others had severely crippling disabilities, but they were mentally alert and it did not seem right that they should have to spend most of their time among those who had mental afflictions and were illogical and disturbing. Some were even assigned to rooms where confused and disoriented patients also lived. It made no difference whether they were in their rooms, in the corridor or seated in the lounge, there was no escape from the abnormal and depressing behaviour of the irrational patients.

"The current effort on the part of mental institutions," Mr. Bennett goes on to write, "to place many mentally disturbed patients in nursing homes is having a very depressing effect on alert residents. Their living conditions are being adversely affected, and their anxieties are increasing. This is happening even though many of the nursing home staff members are not trained to cope with patients who have serious mental illnesses."

It was as a result of our pulling together this evidence and of the concerns that were expressed to us by many individuals that we decided in our caucus last term, as it were, that we would do some work of our own and try and discover on a firsthand, first-sight basis what is really going on.

I want to make it very clear that I am not suggesting for a moment that every nursing home in this province is some kind of hell hole. I have visited a great many myself and I have seen very good ones and very bad ones.

It is extremely important that we put this matter in perspective and have a sense that it is a question of a pattern being repeated over and over again, a pattern that cannot simply be said to be a series of unfortunate mistakes, a pattern that cannot simply be responded to by the minister saying, as he does—and he is a great hustler, this minister; he is Johnny on the spot or Larry on the spot; he is always there with a ready answer and he is always ready to say: "Do not worry. We closed down that home yesterday; that is not a problem any more." "Do not worry. We are on top of that situation; we have been in there." And, "Do not worry, it is happening here, there and everywhere else."

That is not the point. The point is that there is a pattern taking place here, a pattern that is endemic, a pattern that has to be changed fundamentally. The only way it can be changed, in my opinion—I reiterate this point because it has to be made again—is if we stop giving private enterprise a monopoly in the nursing home industry in Ontario.

It is absolutely monstrous that in 1983 we should be giving senior citizens and their families and retarded people and their families and young people hit by strokes such an appalling set of choices with respect to institutional care. It is a disgrace that in 1983 we should have to bring up these kinds of situations time and time and time again and simply have the minister or others respond by saying, "Oh well, we believe in a mixed health care system and we believe that private enterprise has a role to play."

That kind of apology will not wash any more. It is not going to work any more because we have the goods now, and the minister cannot simply come in here and say, "We are on top of it," because they are not on top of it.

What is wrong is the way in which the industry is organized. What is wrong is the attitude, the policy and the positions that have been taken by the Tory government in Ontario. What is wrong is that the Tory government has decided that it wants private enterprise to have its place in the sun when it comes to health care.

We know precisely what that means, and the evidence that is growing in the nursing home industry can be applied to each and every hospital where private enterprise gets its tentacles back in again. You will have the same problems of inadequate staff; you will have the same problems of cutting back; you will have the same problems of people watering down the shampoo, diluting the mouthwash and attempting to get around because they hear a day before that the inspectors are coming in. It will be that same kind of private enterprise philosophy and that mania for private enrichment, which has absolutely no place in the health care system in Ontario.

But the industry cannot be blamed for seeking to make a profit. That is what they are there for; that is what they are all about. The guilty parties are across the floor, because they are the people who have let this situation grow untended. They are the people who have three fire inspectors and 14 nursing inspectors for 340 homes. They are the people who expect us to take that seriously as a policy.

They have a policy under the Nursing Homes Act which requires a minimum of one and a half hours of nursing and personal care each day for extended care residents.

Mr. Speaker, you and I both know perfectly well that what happens in a situation like that is that one and a half hours does not become the minimum; one and a half hours becomes the maximum. That ratio is the ratio which determines how many staff you hire. That number of hours and that way of looking at it, that way of looking at the problem, is what is partially responsible for the ridiculous situation with respect to inadequate staffing.

We accepted invitations to a number of nursing homes across the province. We accepted invitations at the request of parents; at the request of children; at the request, in some instances, of residents themselves. We did so, wanting to give as fair a sense of what is going on as we possibly could, and wanting, at the same time, to bring the light of day into these institutions.

One of the problems with institutional care, in general, is that institutions are a way of blocking people out; they are a way of segregating people. That is why we have been so supportive of the principle, and have argued for it throughout this entire decade, that wherever possible we should be caring for people in the community, and that as a general rule people, regardless of their background, regardless of their abilities or disabilities, regardless of whatever problems they may have, have the right to be cared for and live in the community as much as possible.

We have not moved away from that principle, even in those situations where neighbourhoods can be critical of the possibility of a group home. We have resisted the call of those who would say—as I know some members of the Liberal Party have said—that when people are resisting group homes, one has to give in to that pressure and leave people in the institutions; that it is better to give in to that pressure and leave everybody in an institution. We have resisted that trend which the Liberal Party has spoken to, and we are continuing our basic call and our basic feeling that people have to be cared for in the community as much as possible.

But as long as we have institutions, it is important that they be open to the public; that they be open to the light of day, to the fresh air of publicity, to the fresh air of people coming in and out, to the fresh air of doctors being able to come in—the doctors of one's choice being able to come in—to the fresh air of families being able at all times to come in and visit; and if I may say so, that they be open to the fresh air of being able to raise one's voice in complaint and not have to be worried that as a result of that complaint there would be reprisals taken, or steps taken, or threats made, or services cut off, or a change in attitude on the part of those who were administering the care.

There are a great many stories I know that I am going to have to tell the minister in a letter, which will have to be marked "confidential," because I cannot make them public, not because I do not think they should be made public, but for the simple reason that in making them public, I know perfectly well the possible risks—the ridiculous, absurd risks in 1983—that someone who makes those kinds of complaints might experience.

But we did find a pattern of inadequate staffing, persistent problems of fire hazards, problems with the enforcement of existing standards, and a basic problem: the lack of activity or a lack of stimulation of the residents. I want to go through each of these problems and give members—as much as I can, given the requirements of confidentiality and given the fact that I do not want to identify some of the people who have complained—a sense of what is being experienced.

Regarding Lincoln Place Nursing Home, the one I mentioned earlier, about which a constituent of mine wrote to me: Complaints by residents of incomplete showers; poor scalp care; confirmed by staff member that there is insufficient time to bathe residents properly; sixth floor—heavy care—staff rushing patients to chew, in some cases feeding residents far too quickly.

Several residents complained about having to wear a helmet to the washroom in case they fell because there was insufficient staff to take them as often as needed. This is very reminiscent of the attitude to workers in many plants. Instead of dealing with the problem, instead of providing for the appropriate level of care for those people, they make them wear helmets and then when they fall down they will not bash their heads. Thereby they think that somehow they have solved a great social problem.

There is a case of an individual calling for a nurse for 45 minutes in order to assist this individual to lie down, since that individual had had an operation recently. The observer we had in the home says, "The friend I was with went and brought the nurse back from the fourth floor." Calling for 45 minutes!

The White Eagle Nursing Home: Evidence is that some residents stay wet, if incontinent, if no family is there to help change them. This is all based on onsite eye-to-eye observation—and ear-to-ear in terms of listening—spending on an average two or three, sometimes four hours in a home to get a sense of what is going on, talking not only to the patients but to the staff as well and getting as much of a sense of what is actually happening as possible.

There are complaints of falls occurring and staff having to go to another floor to get assistance to pick up the residents. Again, there is the problem of inadequate staffing. "The staff are very rushed. I thought they did not have very much time to be gentle with patients." That is an account given by one of our staff who was in there. "There is inadequate staff to bathe incontinent residents thoroughly. In one case, I spoke to a woman," as our staff member says, "who must come in and bathe her mother once a week with a staff person or it will not be done." Once a week, or it will not be done!

Tyndall Nursing Home in Toronto: The staff rushed to get each job done; little attention was able to be paid to the residents. Friends or family often have to clean up the excrement themselves. One resident complained, and her family member as well, that a half bath using only a face cloth is given once a week. She needs more frequent bathing, but there is no staff time. She is not incontinent, but requires wheelchair assistance to the washroom and the staff often do not come in time. The Concerned Friends have complained about this case to the ministry but there has been no resolution yet.

The Heritage Nursing Home: Very few staff is visible on the second floor. For example, there was no staff person to turn on the TV in the lounge, yet a sign prohibited residents from doing so. "After I watched a room full of residents wait for 20 minutes for a staff person to turn on the television, I turned it on."

Call buzzers rang constantly for long periods of time before they were able to be answered. The afternoon shift is so short-staffed that the residents are all brought downstairs at 4:15 p.m. and must sit for an hour while the staff helps prepare food in the kitchen. This was confirmed by the staff. There are few staff, therefore they start putting residents to bed at 6 p.m. in order to get it all done. That is also confirmed by the staff.

Can members imagine how any of us would feel if we were in an institutional setting where they said, "I am sorry, it is not convenient, you have to go to bed at six o'clock, because that is the only time we have got staff available in order to put you into bed."

Barton Place again, the institution mentioned by Mrs. Grube and I know mentioned on the CITY-TV program as well: Inadequate staff to accomplish all the assigned tasks.

On the seventh floor there are 34 heavy care patients, three aides and one registered nurse. On the sixth floor there are 44 heavy care patients, four aides and one RN. On the third floor there are 44 patients, some ambulatory, one and a half aides, one registered nursing assistant, no RN. These workers must get patients up, feed them—in many cases needing a great deal of assistance—wash and dress them, help them with hygiene needs, do minor cleaning and change incontinent residents, etc.

Both staff and patients complained to me that the staff are rushed. They often have to clean patients improperly or shove food in their mouths. They have no time to visit. On the seventh floor several residents were sitting wet in urine puddles, there was no staff available to change them. That is something which was seen by a member of my staff.

On the sixth floor a woman unravelled a dressing and began to scratch off the scabs from a very infected area on the leg and there was no staff person available to notice it or to rebandage it. "I went to the front desk of the floor to tell someone and there was no one there."

Middlesex Terrace, just outside London: Short-staffed; complaints were backed by both staff and residents. When I walked into the home an alarm sounded. We could find no one on the first floor to shut off the alarm, no staff or administrator, and the alarm rang for at least half an hour. There were 12 residents on this floor standing in the hall or sitting and there were no staff. The staff were all in the basement helping to feed residents. There were no extras to watch those finished or not eating on other floors.

The evidence is overwhelming. It is overwhelming that there is a significant staff problem in these nursing homes, from the statements that have been made by many residents, many people who care for residents, by the staff itself, and from what has been seen, if I may say so, on a firsthand basis in a number of nursing homes that have been visited by my staff in the last five weeks.

Why is there inadequate staffing? There is inadequate staffing because these operations are run on a cost-cutting basis. There is inadequate staffing because the way in which these homes make a profit, the only way a home can make a profit—this may sound remarkably simple, and it is remarkably simple—is if they are able to take in more than they spend. So there is a given incentive in the system. The incentive is right there for a philosophy of cutback, of watering down things wherever it is possible. That is where the operator, that is where the owner, that is where the industry makes its profit.

It makes its profit by not having enough staff. It makes its profit by short-staffing on certain shifts. It makes its profit by deciding that it will, as a matter of policy, feed people when it is convenient to it. The evidence of the Ark Eden home was exactly that. There were people being awakened very early in the morning. There were people being forced to eat very quickly, many of them suffering from physical disabilities which made that very difficult.

That is not a happenstance problem; that is a problem which is endemic to the way in which this industry is organized. All I can say is God help the hospitals in Ontario if the Tory government has its way and runs every single hospital on exactly the same basis. God help us all, because the kind of inadequate care that we see in the nursing home industry is just the thin edge of the wedge. It is the beginning of the trend which the Tories would like to see imposed on the entire province and on the entire health care system.

The second problem is fire hazards. In most cases these regulations were being met. However, the more important issue is the regulations which are not in place.

For example, residents in beds and wheelchairs still have ground floor access either from being placed on the ground floor or ramp access. It appears that residents lining the hallways are now considered to be in violation of the regulations. However, there is a problem of enforcement, and in a couple of moments we will see the examples that are there.

Leisure World is one example—I love the names of these places. On the second floor of Leisure World there are crowds of people in wheelchairs near the nursing station and the elevators. In case of fire, there is no room to move quickly. About St. Raphael's Nursing Home on McNicoll, that is the one that is still open, there are complaints by residents and families that there has never been a fire drill as required in regulations and there are people lining the hallways on each floor.

Central Park Lodge: The halls are also packed with people. Barton Place: Many residents lining the hallways on the sixth floor; several food and cleaning carts also impeding access. Apparently the inspector had cited residents in the halls on the third floor as a fire hazard. The home had done nothing to rectify the complaint until CITY-TV shot film of the residents lining the third floor. So what did it do? It moved them up to the seventh floor and lined them up there.

There are heavy care patients on the sixth and seventh floors, 78 residents in total, no easy access out in a fire. One elevator out of two always functioning improperly; that was confirmed by the staff.

Oakridge Villa: Third floor heavy care; no ramp access to ground, two elevators go very slow. Chateau Garden in Kirkland Lake apparently has no guidelines for safe exit from the building. There were complaints that when the alarm went off there was complete chaos. The residents in the wheelchairs said they would have no way of leaving the building.

Lincoln Place: Heavy care patients on the fourth, fifth and sixth floors lining the hallways; two very slow elevators. It would be impossible to evacuate during a fire.

Heritage Nursing Home: Heavy care on the fourth floor; same problems of access and slow elevators.

Any staff I spoke to suggested the heavy care patients were always put high up in the building because they are less visible to visitors—the healthier, higher-functioning residents are then on display—and to cut down on elevator time to carry ambulatory residents to and from the dining room, etc.

Should cosmetic appearances somehow take priority over human safety? Should we somehow be prevented from seeing the things that can happen to any of us and all of us, either in old age or in sickness?

Surely the principle should be that care for the person, regardless of how they look, how old they may be or how sick they may be, is more important than the cosmetics of wanting people only to see the bright side of what nursing home care in this province is all about.

The enforcement of existing standards—and it is important to distinguish between these where enforcement is inadequate and those deficiencies in the system due to failure to set actual standards. We could only monitor those standards visible to the eye; we could not go into the kitchen, for example. Again, this is on the basis of what was seen by my staff. I am just putting it into the record because people should know about these things.

Middlesex Terrace: Paint and plaster peeling off the walls in the bedroom on the first floor; smell of urine in several parts of the home; terrible smell throughout the home like rotten eggs—staff member understands that is a sulphur problem which the home has been slow to correct—beds not placed far enough from walls, windows and drafts as required; the beds were also in extremely poor condition; linen clean but smells of the rotten eggs from the sulphur in the laundry water; the residents also drink this water.

Tyndall Nursing Home: Towels and face cloths not always available; there is no soap in the bathroom; incomplete baths—regulations call for a complete bath once per week for ambulatory residents and daily or more frequent baths for incontinent residents or those confined to bed; for example, wheelchair-confined resident was given a half-bath once per week—again, once a week for a bath; complaints that blankets are not always available.

Central Park Lodge: Inadequate ventilation; strong odours on some floors and elevators; beds placed too close to walls; some rooms and washrooms did not have towels and face cloths; the string removed from a call station on a resident's bed.

Castlevue: Inadequate ventilation; odours on every floor; no curtains or tracks on ceilings for curtains; cold water for bathing residents; snacks with high caloric value and low nutrient value.

Leisure World: Beds not placed adequately apart; odours very strong on the second floor.

St. Raphael's: Odours exceptionally bad; Concerned Friends have complained about this to the ministry; inadequate clean linen—inadequate clean linen in 1983, in a place that is caring for senior citizens in this province; inadequate face cloths, towels; bed-confined residents and incontinent residents not given a daily bath; residents appeared very dirty, especially unclean hair.

White Eagle: No daily baths for incontinent, bedridden residents; beds not adequately spaced; complaints about nutrition; complaints about salty food given to a resident on a salt-free diet; foods not blended for a resident who could not chew; nursing home will not provide the diapers and families have to purchase them; no menus posted and complaints that they never are; no liquids left out for residents even after families specifically requested; lack of privacy—a nurse stripped down a resident in front of four other people and did not close the door; draft due to open windows to cut down on odours.

Chateau Nursing Home, Kirkland Lake: Improper time to feed MR kids; food shovelled in faster than possible to eat; improper positioning of residents; guidelines for each patient ignored—we know what happened to the triministry guidelines in the case of the poor Soumelidis child—guidelines for each patient ignored; the administrator would not allow the guidelines to be posted on the bed for easy access; administrator reluctant to buy plastic nipples for children without the sucking reflex so the staff took up a collection among themselves and bought the supply—do a whip-round in order to buy people some plastic nipples; no menus posted; rubber foot rests removed from wheelchairs to prevent marking of walls—the result is that limbs hang. This seems to be extremely dangerous for the circulation and the health of the residents.

It goes on and on; Barton Place, the Heritage Nursing Home again, problems at Lincoln Place, problems with linen. Just to give another example: Lincoln Place—"Urine uncleared under residents' chairs on the sixth floor; portable urinals were filthy. I looked at several, apparently only cleaned quickly with a brush; linens had same heavy smells as the air; bed-confined residents not turned every two hours." That was again confirmed by the staff. "Bathing not as frequent or as thorough as required." Again, that was confirmed by the staff.

Finally, we come to the problem which is perhaps most fundamental to what happens to our senior citizens and the fate of people who enter nursing homes and who, by and large, do not leave them. That is the lack of activity or stimulation of residents.

In this instance, I think it is harder to go through on a case-by-case basis because it is subjective, but perhaps I can give members the sense I have. I have been to a number of nursing homes. I enjoy visiting nursing homes and talking to senior citizens. I enjoy playing the piano with them, chatting with them and getting them to chat about themselves. We all know how lonely many seniors are and how difficult their lives are because they are often not visited enough by friends and family. It leaves a tremendous obligation on the institutions in this province to provide a stimulating environment.

The other day I was in a nursing home in Windsor. I was going to play the piano for the residents downstairs. There were a number of them there and there was a fellow in the corner. A great many of the seniors were lined up and many of them were very reluctant to establish eye contact. Because so many of them have never had anybody actually talk to them, they are really bowled over when someone carries on a whole conversation with them. There was one fellow there I went over and talked to. I asked how he was doing and he did not answer. I went right up to him and spoke very loudly in his ear. He responded that he was fine. He was 83 years old, he was feeling fine, he was very alert and the only problem was he was deaf and blind. Mentally he was completely alert.

I do not think it is just a question of what governments do; it is a question of what society does or what we all do as individuals. As people get older and suffer from increasing physical disabilities, there is always an assumption that mental slowness is there as well. There is an assumption that because people are not talking an awful lot—and sometimes there may even be a physical disability such as a stroke that will impair speech—mental alertness, mental ability, mental agility and mental interest are gone as well.

The problem here is not any individual home; it is the institutional model. In a sense it is the private enterprise model, because that model is designed to have as few staff as possible. We have instances, for example, where there are very large homes and very few people able to provide any kind of recreational assistance.

How many homes have we all been in where the main recreational activity is television? That is all there is; that is it; there is nothing else. For hours on end, the people sit around watching TV. I do not happen to believe they are there entirely as a matter of choice. We all know television has become the world's greatest babysitter for many young people. I suggest that for many people in our institutions—and in many people's private homes, but this is another problem—television has also become the alternative to stimulation, the alternative to care and the alternative to intervention.

Why has that situation been allowed to develop? I suggest it is partly because of the completely inadequate way we have of assessing people and the complete lack of synchronization between institutions and the people who happen to be in them. It is fair to say there are a great many people in nursing homes who are very sick. They are in nursing homes and not in chronic care hospitals because there are not a hell of a lot of beds in chronic care hospitals right now, because there are certainly no chronic care beds in acute care hospitals right now, and because many nursing homes—and I salute them for it—have taken the decision that they would rather care for somebody who has been there for a long time than move him or her inappropriately to another place.

What this really means is that there is now a very wide range of people who are in these institutions, and completely inadequate programs are designed to provide the kind of activity, stimulation and participation that all of us would basically like to have as we get older.

I will just give members again some eyewitness accounts.

Oakridge Villa: Visited one resident, a stroke victim. Paralysis in both legs and one arm but very alert mind. She is placed on a floor with the very senile and emotionally disturbed. There is no intellectual stimulation, and the recreational programs scheduled, although better for most, are not appropriate for her. Again, they are not designed for, are not tailored to this person's needs and concerns. The same floor has excessive noise from residents screaming and yelling, making it stressful for those who are more alert. Many residents complained about a problem of theft.

Tyndall Nursing Home: Again, many people slumped over in their chairs, possible signs of overmedication, a problem I am going to come to in a moment.

Heritage Nursing Home: All those I spoke to, about 15 residents, were desperate for simple conversation. Which one of us cannot say that we have been in exactly the same situation, where people are just desperate for company, desperate for that amount of stimulation, desperate for that conversation?

I do not think loneliness is a part of the human condition; I think loneliness is something that we as a society do to people. I do not think the people in nursing homes are lonely because they want to be lonely, and I think there is something we can do about it and have to do about it.

How many times does one go into homes and see people, many of them, lining the hallways, some with many indications of overmedication? I am going to come back to that problem in a moment.

Central Park Lodge: The staff ratio for recreation is one to 100. One hundred people with totally different needs, with a complete variety of needs and concerns and interests, and you have got one person. You simply cannot rely entirely on volunteers to do it, though I know there are many people who do act as volunteers, and again we salute them; many of us have done it as well. But you just cannot rely on them.

I said I would mention the problem of medication, and I do want to say something about it. I know people are going to say: "This is a medical decision that is taken. These are medical prescriptions that are signed by doctors, and there are no grounds for concern. If you have a concern about an individual case, take it to the College of Physicians and Surgeons," and so on. A lot of good that is going to do us. We know how well that procedure works out.

I do want to suggest that there is a very real problem with the overuse of drugs in our society in general, but there is also a very real problem with respect to the overuse of drugs in nursing homes and in our institutions of all kinds. I dearly wish the minister would wake up to this question, because in part it is not simply a one-on-one, individual medical decision: it is a practice increasingly accepted by a great many people in the medical profession, and that practice is of concern to a great many others in the medical profession.

I know because they have talked and written to me about it: instances where people are simply being put on a program and a pattern of taking drugs for an extended period of time; a problem of overmedication that is causing people to lose the alertness, the sense of activity and the sense of interest and stimulation they had in a pattern of a passive life rather than an active life, a problem that is so much a part of being in an institution; and that has to be broken.

I have taken some time on this and I have gone through it as best I can. For the record I want to pay particular tribute to those members of my staff who took a great deal of time and interest in this project. I want to thank those individuals and residents, and I want to thank a great many administrators of nursing homes for being open to our concerns.

I want to reiterate what I said at the beginning of my remarks with respect to what is happening to the nursing home business and to senior citizens in this province.

4:30 p.m.

As I said earlier, I am not suggesting for a moment that every single nursing home in this province is some kind of hell hole. I am not suggesting there are not many nursing homes that provide good care. I believe very strongly that the staff and administration of a great many of the nursing homes in this province care very deeply about the work they do.

I am suggesting that the private profit model, the private profit method of delivery of care, the private profit system is what is wrong, and no amount of fiddling around on the edges or fiddling around with the regulations is going to affect that particular problem and that particular issue. We have a system in this province that gives each and every nursing home operator a stake in providing less service than should be provided.

Some provide a good service. Some are not interested in making a whole lot of money. Many of them are voluntary organizations. Many of them are church nonprofit organizations. I think members will find that the pattern of care in many of those institutions is quite different from that which is to be found in those that are run on a private profit basis.

The member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick)

and I know very well some of the institutions in the east end that are run by the United Church or run by the Presbyterian Church. There are a number I visited in Toronto run by the Anglicans. I have been to some run by the Italian community and many run on a nonprofit basis by many communities. The issues there are slightly different and perhaps broader with respect to how we care for seniors and what we are doing for people as they get older in our society.

But I suggest that no amount of surface dancing by the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman), no amount of mere cleverness is going to get around this problem, which is that a big industry has grown up in this province that has a stake in providing private profit care, a big industry that has very close ties to the Tory party and indeed to the Ministry of Health in this province under a Tory administration, and that is a very unhealthy situation, to put it very mildly.

I want to put the minister on notice that the activities of this industry and the activities of this big business are going to come under a scrutiny in this province such as they have never had before, because we think it is fundamentally wrong, fundamentally inappropriate for us to be providing care for senior citizens on a private profit basis.

I said to you earlier, Mr. Speaker, that many nursing homes are in the business of providing chronic care. I want to suggest that what is really at stake here has been a fundamental change in the kind of care that is being provided and the sort of work that is being done.

Nursing homes are not hotels; nursing homes are not apartments. Nursing homes are, quite simply, places where care is being provided. Of course there is a residential component, but we are looking at a continuum of care in our society. I do not think that caring is something we can put a dollar figure on. I do not think we can say somehow that somebody is suddenly well and then somebody is suddenly sick, that they suddenly go from a state of wellness to a state of sickness and that the Ontario health insurance plan is prepared to cover the state of sickness but the OHIP system and the idea of universal medical insurance are inappropriate for when one is in a state of wellness.

What is at stake here is a pattern of care from the time one is born to the time one dies. The medicare system grew up in response to a very real concern in society about caring for illness. We in our party, and I am thinking particularly of people like Tommy Douglas, Woodrow Lloyd and those great pioneers of our party, fought, and who really fought hard, against the prophets of private enterprise and those who would simply make health care a commodity like any other.

They were talking about something that those who introduced medicare in Ontario, the Tory party, do not understand. They were talking about a model of care that goes from the time one is born to the time one dies. The family will provide one with care, and we should be doing a hell of a lot more to provide help and assistance for families who want to provide care for people—whether they are young or old or mentally retarded or whatever they may happen to be—an awful lot more than we are doing.

What has captured the Tory imagination, if I may use that term in its loosest sense, is the completely fatuous notion that we can somehow separate the notion of illness from the notion of wellness. They are prepared to accept that for a short, acute illness they will accept the principle that one should not have to pay thousands and thousands of dollars. One might have to pay hundreds of dollars; in fact, we have increasing evidence that people are paying hundreds, except that it is in terms of a catastrophic illness.

When I hear the Minister of Health say he now accepts the principles of some kind of medicare and he accepts accessibility and so on, I believe what he says in terms of an acute situation; that if one breaks a leg one should be able to go to the hospital and not be charged thousands and thousands of dollars. I accept it when he says that.

But the issue is so much broader than that, because what are we really talking about when we see someone go into a nursing home? Old age is not a sickness. Old age is something that happens to all of us; getting older is a fact of life. But the fact remains that one's ability to care for oneself can vary according to circumstances, in terms of longer-term disability, in terms of perhaps having had a stroke when one is very young or having had a very serious accident when one is very young, or simply in terms of what happens as a result of getting frailer and getting older.

I want to suggest to the House that it is beyond me how we can go on any longer with a pattern of delivery of care which accepts private profit and private enrichment as the model in our society when it comes to people who are in the nearly 30,000 beds that are currently occupied by a great many senior citizens and others in nursing homes in Ontario.

It does not make any sense to me why, for example, a nursing home can say to a resident, "You will be cared for by our doctor; you will not be cared for by your doctor." It does not make any sense to me that a nursing home can actually prevent a doctor from coming into the home. It does not make any sense to me that a nursing home can make all kinds of rules and regulations which have nothing to do with its public obligation. What makes the least sense of all to me is that we would have a Tory government in this province which would allow that kind of situation to carry on and pretend it is some kind of accident. It is not an accident; that is what the system is all about.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that if a patient had a complaint about the care that was being provided in a public hospital in this province I do not think there are very many of us who would fear a reprisal against the patient who made that complaint, because we have a public system in which publicity and the light of publicity and a sense of public accountability are there.

It is absolutely absurd that the care for 30,000 of our fellow citizens should be done on a basis of some kind of wall being put up, the light being shut out, inspectors being able to go in every once in a while, after people hear on the t.v. that the inspector is coming, with things then going back to a condition where they are not acceptable.

It is intolerable that we do not have laws in this province that provide for the light of day, that provide for residents' rights, that provide for full publicity, that provide for protection of people's privacy rights, that provide for their right to go to a doctor of their own choice, that provide for complete freedom of access by the family or any other person who is chosen by the resident to represent him or her. It is absolutely astonishing that we do not have that kind of system in this province.

It is appalling that we have regulations saying that in nursing homes that are providing chronic care and heavy care the basic standard of nursing care provided is going to be one and a half hours. It is absolutely appalling in this day and age that this would happen. Most of all, it is appalling that we would be giving our seniors so little choice.

I started my remarks by talking about what happens to families when they are suddenly faced with a situation where they realize they are no longer able to care for someone in their own home. First of all, in the majority of communities in this province that choice has to be made by them because the government of this province does not provide the kind of assistance that is necessary to people who want to care for their relatives at home.

This government had the gall to announce a program last year in which it was going to be extending home care services and it did nothing for a whole year. It then had the absolute gall to come out in the throne speech and say, "This continues to be an area of concern for our party." What absolute rubbish.

The emperor really has not a stitch on when it comes to home care services in this province. The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto can produce a report saying neighbourhood support services are in a state of underfunding and in a state of crisis in this province, and we have the Minister of Health repeating: "These programs are coming. They are coming. They are coming." It just will not do. Families should not be put in this position.

There are families—and again I want people to know and the minister to know we will be introducing these people to the minister and introducing examples to the minister—who are spending literally thousands and thousands of dollars a year on long-term care. This is happening in a province where the government says it believes in universal medical care.

It may do when it comes to something called acute sickness, when one breaks a leg or goes into the hospital. When it comes to the reality of people being neither in a state of real illness nor in a state of real wellness, long-term disabilities, the cost to those families is appalling and the assistance from this government is virtually nil.

The policy of this government, because of its failure to provide choices and because of its failure to provide home care, in fact relegates, forces families into the position of saying, "The only way we can get any money from this government is if we send dad or mom into an institution." It would be a hell of a lot cheaper to give families money to keep people at home. It would make a lot more sense.

If this government were really interested in providing health care and in providing care in a way that was human and was down to earth it would make a lot more sense for the government to say to families: "You have a doctor's certificate here saying this person is ill and needs help. Fine. Instead of sending him into an institution, we will pay you to provide the care."

There are a great many families that would say, "That is much better than sending him into an institution." In the current state of many of our institutions, I could hardly blame them.

It is a question of the government responding to the need for care. That is something this government is not prepared to do, because it sees the world in a profit-and-loss private enrichment perspective. There is a large industry in this province, 340 homes providing 30,000 beds, the vast majority of those private care. Extendicare has made enough money out of the nursing home business in this province and elsewhere to be able to buy a life insurance company. This is not a small battle we are taking on here.

Mr. McClellan: It wanted to buy Crown Trust.

Mr. Rae: It wanted to buy Crown Trust. Perhaps that would have been a good buy, I do not know.

The point is this: The links between this government and this party and that industry and the health care business—and it should never be a business, but there are those in that party who want it to be a business and who think it is a business—are close.

Earlier I quoted a former official of the Ministry of Health, a senior executive on the board of AMI. We know that a former official of the Ministry of Health is the president of Extendicare Ltd., health care division, and former executive directors of the Ontario Nursing Homes Association are now executives of the Diversicare Corp. There are ties and links and interlocking networks which perhaps explain why the policy is as absurd as it is.

In closing my remarks with respect to the challenge facing health care in this province, I want to suggest that there are frontiers of health.

My colleague the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel), our House leader, who has done such a remarkable job—and I want to pay him public tribute today for the work he has done on behalf of injured workers throughout this province and those people fighting the battle for decent conditions in their working environments—will be making his remarks in the next few days with respect to a report on occupational health and safety.

We will be focusing our efforts on the need for environmental health and environmental cleanup, but perhaps most fundamentally we will be focusing our efforts and attention on the need for us to look at the health care system as a caring system and not as a profit-making system. That is the direction and focus of our work.

The battle that was fought by our party in the 1940s and 1950s and the early 1960s to provide medical care for those suffering from acute illness was just the beginning. There are new frontiers of care which are currently occupied by the barons of financial power and those who would seek to make them a world for their own private enrichment. I want to put them on notice that the frontier is up for grabs because the New Democratic Party intends to fight for those people.

I said I wanted to say a few words about jobs and housing as well. I will not take quite as long as I have with respect to health care.

Mr. Laughren: Oh, come on.

Mr. Rae: I know that will come as a great disappointment to my colleague the member for Nickel Belt, who hangs on every word I say. Although he does not agree with every word I say, he does hang on it.

I do want to pay tribute to another one of my colleagues and also draw on his own experience and his remarkable ability to highlight and to bring out a human focus and a human touch to what has increasingly been seen as an impersonal, theoretical, statistical problem. Of course, I am speaking of the problem of joblessness, of unemployment and the tremendous challenge that faces our society in coming to grips with the full meaning of this issue.

The Liberal Party has now staked its claim to a budget which it is calling a recovery budget. I think the Liberal Party budget has nothing whatsoever to do with recovery and I think the questions we asked in the Legislature today and the answers we got from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay) show how little it has to do with recovery.

The Liberal Party budget was a business budget which was said to give help to what they call the private sector. I want to suggest that one cannot attach any single job, one particular opportunity for employment, to the thousands of dollars thrown at the private sector by the Liberal Party in its most recent budget. It is a void, vapid, incredibly right-wing document which simply throws money at big business and then says, "Go to it, boys, try to create some jobs or do whatever you want to do with what we are giving you."

I suggest the evidence is overwhelming in terms of the rationalization that we have seen in industry after industry in this province that there is no correlation whatsoever between the investment the private sector is making and the creation of jobs, no correlation at all.

When Canada Packers goes out and buys some new plant that is an investment, is that investment creating any new jobs? No, it is not, because there is no requirement attached to that investment that it be tied to the creation of work in our society. There is no requirement at all. Any assistance that is given to the private sector that is not directly tied to the creation of jobs and the creation of work is completely and totally irresponsible. It flies in the face of everything we know about the economy and what needs to be done to get people back to work.

If you want to get people back to work, Mr. Speaker, you simply have to offer them jobs and the opportunities for work. If the government thinks it is going to come trickling down from Canada Packers, Consolidated-Bathurst and the other corporations which rule over much of our economy in this province, it is going to wait for one hell of a long time, far longer than anyone in our party is prepared to wait.

Of course, that old hoary alliance between the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) and Mr. Lalonde has produced the Treasurer's response and the response of the Premier (Mr. Davis). I have always felt it would perhaps be more appropriate if the Premier ran for the leadership of the Liberal Party in Ottawa rather than the leadership of the Tory party in Ottawa.

Mr. Laughren: Not to mention Peterson.

Mr. Rae: Not to mention Peterson, that is right.

That response was that this was a step in the right direction and our Treasurer was intending to go in the same direction.

Mr. Kolyin: The member is floundering.

Mr. Rae: The member for Lakeshore has finally woken up. I appreciate his presence here this afternoon. I would simply like to read to him some of the letters which my colleague the member for Scarborough West (Mr. R. F. Johnston) received in response to his advertisement in many newspapers asking people to tell their story with respect to what was happening to them so that they would stop being a statistic.

There are countless letters. I have only a few of them here and there are many of them. I know some of them were sent over to the Treasurer. We then wrote back to the individuals and some of them wrote back to us. I hope very much that the Treasurer listens to the voice of these people, listens very carefully to what they are saying, because what they are saying is that they need work more than anything else.

They need work, not in six months or in 12 months; they do not need work to come from whatever corporate benefactor it is going to come from in five or six years' time. They need work today. They need work now. They need jobs now. They need work that is productive, work that is going to do something for them and something for the province. There is an overwhelming sense of frustration and anguish on the part of these people that their voice has not been listened to by governments, that they are simply a statistic and that they are treated by people as statistics. This is what is so sad in our society.

I would like to quote from a letter from a young woman. I do not want to read the whole letter because it is very long and she talks about a great many situations.

She is a graphic artist of some experience who has worked in many different places and has a number of degrees. She is a graduate of the Northern Alberta Institute of Technology in Edmonton and has attended high school in Ontario. She describes her frustration with a number of job applications that she has made, the responses she has been getting and the fact that she feels she is just wasting her time making so many applications and getting absolutely nowhere.

Just to quote part: "I applied for a waitress position"—this is a woman who has a lot of experience as a graphic artist—"and they asked me for my experience. I used to do this during high school and college but, unbelievably, they want people who have been doing this recently." So she did not get that job.

"I applied for a printing salesman position. I had not done this before, but as a graphic artist I know a lot about printing. While they did like my resumé, they told me they had had applications from salesmen who had been working in the printing business for 15 years. They told me they may have a part-time position coming up for a graphic artist and will call me if they need me. I hear that a lot. They like my resumé but they do not have work."

She goes on to describe many other similar circumstances. She says her rent is $315. She will not be able to find another place to live. She is going to have to sell her car. She says she is not placed in absolute destitution.

"I should tell you that my fiancé will support me in the event I am not able to support myself. He will not let me go to welfare. For this I am grateful but it does not sit well. In my entire life since I left home I have not depended on anyone. I used to make $18,000 a year. As time goes on, I find this difficult to believe, but as my copies of my tax returns show, things were really different a year ago. I actually owe $10 this year. I would like to know what the government has done for this $10 over and above the $4,500 I already gave it."

Then she says something which caught me, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it will have the same impact on you. "I used to feel uncomfortable about coming into their office"—she is talking about the unemployment insurance office—"and mingling with the shabbily dressed individuals examining the job board. Now I find I dress a lot like them. This leads me to wonder if our medical profession is going to discover a new neurosis, unemployment sickness, to take its place beside all the other new mental illnesses of the latter half of the 20th century.

"This sickness would be marked by the patients' steady degeneration of their self-esteem, lack of concern for their personal appearance, progressive withdrawal socially and eventually emotionally. At the onset of this illness, the patients would display anger towards everything in general but slowly regress into apathy. They would have no long-term goals, display a defeatist attitude. Some may tend towards alcohol dependence and complain more of stress-induced symptoms like ulcers, headaches and just general malaise.

"This all sounds dramatic, but I have seen all this in friends of mine and I am starting to see this in myself too. That's scary. I try to keep myself busy, though lack of money prevents me from doing a lot of things I used to do for enjoyment. At least I can thank you for this opportunity to put some of my feelings down on paper and thank you again for listening."

How we in our party would like to be able to do more than just listen. How we would like to be able to do something for the person who wrote that letter.

Another letter says: "Dear Mr. Johnston: I do not feel it would be of any help to me to go public and perhaps it may be a problem, so please do not use my name." This should hit home to the Premier. "I have arranged to go to Calgary to look for work, though I don't think there is any better chance there. I have also had some contact with an east coast company. I would really like to remain in Ontario, although it now seems impossible. If there are any make-work projects for engineers, I would love to hear about it."

What the hell has happened to this province so that now in 1983 we have young engineers writing in to us saying they have to go out west, although they do not think there will be any better chance there, or they may be going down east, and they would like to remain in Ontario, although it now seems impossible? What kind of a disgraceful situation is that for the government of Ontario to have allowed to happen in this province?

I will read a couple of other letters, because they do give a sense of what is going on out there. I am not suggesting any government can wave a wand and solve this entire problem, but I am suggesting the Tory government of Ontario has a moral obligation and a moral contract with the people of this province to provide as much work as possible through the public sector, if necessary, or the private sector.

Do it. Just do it. Do not wait for it to trickle down through the tax system. Do not wait for some manna from heaven or for Marc Lalonde because God knows that is not going to happen. Do not wait around for the Premier to make up his mind as to whether or not he is going to run or maybe run, because Lord only knows whether that is going to happen. Bring in a budget on May 10 which will provide jobs and hope for the kind of person who wrote this letter. Bring in a budget that will mean that this person will be allowed to stay in Ontario rather than have to leave the province where he was born, brought up and where he wants to stay.

That is the issue right here. The issue again is choice. The issue is opportunity. The fact is we have a government today which is not prepared to do the things that will create choices and opportunities for people when it comes to jobs.

I want to read just two other letters, because they are moving and because they do speak to what is happening in this province. One is from a gentleman who, again, has asked to remain nameless.

"Dear Sir:

"I would like to thank you for the letter dated April 8, 1983"—the letter is not written in perfect English, but I will read it as written because it seems to me to make much more sense that way—"and appreciated to hearing lots of taking responsibility for the public and interesting to establish happy family life.

"I heard good news today. I hope growth th notice that we in our party take this job very seriously, and we are going to continue to speak up on these issues of health, housing and jobs with all the strength, all the conviction and all the sincerity we can muster.

It has been a year since I became the leader of our party. I can say it has been a very eventful year. It has been a very educational year for me but, if I may say so, it has just been the first year and I am looking forward more than I can say to leading my good friends and colleagues, and to leading our party to victory in Ontario.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Thank you. At this time I would like to recognize the member for Prince Edward-Lennox.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going to start off by making some comments in regard to our economy and certain observations in matters economic—

Mr. Laughtren: Nursing homes too.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: But the member for Nickel Belt is right. He said nursing homes. I must say that I was impressed with the leader of the third party in regard to the sincerity that he expressed when he reviewed the plight of so many people in this province. I think it is a genuine concern, a real concern. I think it is a concern that affects the individual as a whole.

I recall not too long ago the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) addressing the concerns of the injured worker and the functioning of the Workers' Compensation Board, the need to look at the individual as a whole person. I was impressed at that time with the member's sensitivity in regard to his keen concern for the welfare of a fellow member of the human race, not just as a citizen of Ontario or Canada, but as a human being.

I, too, have visited a lot of nursing homes over the past dozen years and I have seen the introduction of our legislation and the regulations, the evolution of the nursing home as an institution. I have watched the institutionalization of health care, of services to people who at one time we as individuals used to look at as fellow human beings and do what we could to help.

Coming from a small community in northern Ontario and having left it, because they did not build universities in the bush in those days, for the big city of Toronto, I had a different outlook in terms of the makeup of the community. We had all kinds of people in our community of Timmins. That was the community where I was born and raised. We had people who were exceptionally bright and people who were exceptionally dull, people who were tall and people who were short, some people who had physical disabilities or mental disabilities, even people with red hair, and some without hair. Maybe that is why I spent some time thinking about this matter. It was a small community in those days. I suppose in the more difficult times, through the 1930s and 1940s, people had more of a concern for their fellow men. There was not the division on political grounds. It was a matter of addressing need where need existed.

I looked at that and the fact that one generation looked after another generation, and then we had the unravelling of a system into an institutionalized system where government seemed to take over many of the functions the family at one time played. I think of the changing times themselves, the changing economy, the changing work force, and I cannot fault children for not being able to look after ageing parents. There are situations where parents require 24-hour care. That is not possible in the home. We have medical science extending the life expectancy of people, and with that extension of our lifespan we have a threat to the dignity of the human being.

Where is the dignity of someone living in a nursing home under the conditions described by the member of the third party? There is no dignity in life under those conditions.

I suggest our nursing homes are becoming too large. I see this in the cities. This is why I am referring to this subject matter as well: In terms of what has happened on the world picture in our economy, the structural changes that have taken place, we see a shift away from mass production, from high volume, standardized production. That is now moving out to the Third World countries. I am going to address that matter more fully in a moment.

5:20 p.m.

Mr. Nixon: Just like Cherry Valley.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I see that standardized, volume production in our health care system, and I see it more as I come from the smaller areas: the Cherry Valleys—that is right—the Cherry Valleys, the Selbys, the Pictons and the Napanees. I see the change from smaller facilities, where people are treated as human beings, where their total body is treated as the subject matter for care and concern and where there is some milk of human kindness, where people matter. As those institutions get larger and larger, one sees that mass production has set in.

Mr. Stokes: Like the cheese business.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I know the member for Lake Nipigon likes cheese and I understand what has happened in the cheese factories, but it is not that situation at all. That economic evolution may be justified in the production of cheese and milk, but I do not think you can justify these human filing cabinets in the care of human beings.

At one time when one asked what was the viable size of a nursing home, the answer was about 40 beds. Then it became 60 beds. Recently I asked what size of nursing home you must have in order to have a viable economic operation so you could give people the kind of care they required and so the doors could remain open. The answer was 100. So we see an ever-escalating theory of greater volume and mass production in nursing home care.

Mr. Laughren: That is the profit motive.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: The profit motive? No, I do not think it is.

One point the leader of the New Democratic Party did not touch on that he might have—and I am sure he will as he pursues this matter further—is the value that nursing beds have taken on in the transfer of nursing homes. It seems to me somewhat obscene to attach an economic value to empty beds regardless of what physical structure or site there may be. I put that to the members, because surely there must be some reason for it. When that value attaches to the bed, I am sure it may reflect on the care that the residents in those homes receive.

I am not sure, but I think it is something that might be looked into and I think the size of institutions is something that might be looked into, because that is where you get the articles of clothing that the leader of the third party spoke about being lost and put on other people, the homogenization of the process, the standardization. There are no really special diets, in the strict sense of the word, for people who need special diets, because again it is mass production. The missing articles, the seeming theft that was referred to, these are all matters that are of some concern.

I do not think the answer is a complete deinstitutionalization. I think there will always be a need for institutions. We talk of our professional social workers, we speak glowingly of deinstitutionalization and the utilization of the generic services of the community, and we apply all the correct jargon, but sometimes we seem to forget the individuals themselves. The system often absorbs the energies and the moneys so that what the system is set up to serve really does not transpire as fully as it might.

I do not think nationalization of a system necessarily produces people who have a sincere and genuine concern for residents in nursing homes. When I see some of the staff in nursing homes, in my view they are heroes to be working in places like that and under conditions like that. People are quick to criticize, but in general terms I think they are doing a tremendous job which not many people would want to do. I certainly commend them for that.

Maybe it is a matter of mentality and spirit, but I think we have to take on more of a charitable sense about it. That is the human quality I have spoken of and the leader of the third party has referred to. We cannot turn charity into a crown corporation and make the good Samaritan a civil servant. I do not think it is the simplistic type of argument we can use.

Mr. Laughren: They might mug you in the corridors of power.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: If the member would like to decoy me into other avenues, I could quote from speeches I have made in the past and I would be delighted to do that some time, but I want to keep on track today if I may.

I could not fail to respond to the thrust and substance of the remarks of the member's leader when he was commenting on the present situation in regard to nursing homes. As he has said, we do have excellent nursing homes and they are run in an excellent fashion. I have found there is a great variety of nursing homes, not just in size because when one reaches a certain size there is a problem, but also in administration, the type of people who are running those homes and the staff they have. I think a person has a better chance in a smaller community.

However, I went into that because I had occasion not long ago to read an article in The Atlantic Monthly for March of this year called "The Next American Frontier." It was pointed out in that article that the recession we are experiencing, which began in 1981, will end eventually, but the underlying problems of the American economy will not come to an end with the next upturn in the business cycle unless American industry undertakes some basic changes in its organization of production.

There is a prediction that unemployment will remain high, that millions of jobs in the nation's basic industries will never return and the American standard of living will continue to decline.

I point that out because with the Canadian economy tied in with the American economy the way it is, this is very appropriate to the situation in this country. It goes on to point out: "Between 1920 and 1970, business, labour and government hewed to a set of organizing principles which were originally called "scientific management", in which tasks were simplified according to established rules and carefully monitored. These principles were put into effect by a new class of professional managers. High volume, scientifically managed industry producing standardized goods generated vast economies of scale and levels of wealth unparalleled in history."

I was thinking of that particular reference when I listened to the speech of the leader of the third party with regard to nursing homes.

5:30 p.m.

The article goes on to point out what happened in the United States in regard to manufacturing capacity employed in production, which had reached 86 per cent in 1965. Then there was the downward trend to 80 per cent in the 1970s. It fell to 70 per cent by 1982. Only 3.5 per cent of the labour force was jobless in 1969, but thereafter unemployment climbed. It reached almost 11 per cent last year. By the 1980s many basic industries were in trouble. These are the automobile industry, petrochemicals, textiles and so on. We had with that, I may say, a slowdown in productivity growth.

There was an interesting observation made that the roots of the problem are embedded very deeply in our business enterprises, in labour unions and government institutions. There are a lot of scapegoats used to rationalize the situation. Government regulation was one. Government was blamed, through regulation, as being the culprit. The imposition of environmental laws was another. Safety regulations was another, the safety and health of the worker in the work place.

When you looked at these expenditures for the United States, for example, the combined safety regulations and pollution control regulations never exceeded six per cent of industrial investment and can be blamed, at the most, for one tenth of the slowdown in productivity.

Government deficits were blamed as well. The inadequate capital formation was blamed. There were all kinds of reasons that were advanced for the downturn in the economy, including, of course, escalating energy prices, except that the oil shock affected all nations, including Germany and Japan, which were really more dependent on imported energy than was America. We could see what happened in terms of the American economic decline and the decline in the economies of a number of these other countries.

What is pointed out is that all these matters that were blamed really overlooked the worldwide reorganization of production and America's failure to adapt to it. This is very interesting, because really when we look historically at what has happened to our neighbour to the south, and of course to us, the changes have really taken place since the middle of the 1960s. Before the middle 1960s only a small proportion of North American goods was traded internationally. We did not have the world marketplace. That is critical, I think, to bear in mind.

In 1980, 19 per cent of the goods Americans made were exported, but more than 22 per cent of the goods that Americans used were imported. By 1980, more than 70 per cent of all the goods produced in the United States were actively competing with foreign-made goods. In other words, the United States and Canada really had become a part of a world market. It was not just a question of selling domestically and having very few exports and very few imports. The marketplace changed from a principally domestic market to a world market.

It is also interesting that by 1981 the United States was importing almost 26 per cent of its cars; 17 per cent of its steel; 60 per cent of its televisions, radios, tape recorders and phonographs; 43 per cent of its calculators; 27 per cent of its metal forming machine tools; 35 per cent of its textile machinery, and 53 per cent of its computerized machine tools. Twenty years before, imports had accounted for less than 10 per cent of the American market for each of these products.

The declining share of America in the world market has been really dramatic in regard to capital intensive, high volume industries. Since 1963, America's share of the world market has declined in a number of important areas: automobiles by almost one third; industrial machinery by 33 per cent; agricultural machinery by 40 per cent; telecommunications machinery by 50 per cent; metalworking machinery by 55 per cent.

So you can see the impact of a world marketplace, just a single, global marketplace. Very simply put, the goods are being made wherever they can be made the cheapest and it does not matter what the political boundaries are. I would like to point out that the most efficient places for mass production are now in the Third World countries.

Mr. Stokes: You do not categorize Japan as a Third World country?

Mr. J. A. Taylor: No, I do not. In response to the query from my friend the member for Nipigon—and again I do not want to get off the track—Japan is no longer a low salary, low-wage-earning country.

As a matter of fact, by the mid-1960s, Korea, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Brazil and Spain were specializing in simple products—clothing, footwear, toys and basic electronic assemblies—that required substantial amounts of unskilled labour but little capital investment or technology. Between 1970 and 1975, Korea's exports of textiles increased by 436 per cent, Taiwan's by 347 per cent and Hong Kong's by 191 per cent.

Again in response to my colleague from Nipigon, Japan's response was to shift out of the simple products into processing industries, such as steel and synthetic fibres, that required substantial amounts of capital investment and raw materials but used mostly unskilled and semi-skilled labour and incorporated relatively mature technologies that were not subject to major innovations.

Put very simply, what was happening was the very low wage countries were producing in a mass way products that did not require large capital investments. They were into toys and footwear, clothing, that type of thing. Then they went from that type of production into utilizing the costly capital-intensive machinery that really could pretty well run itself. It did not take a lot of skill to produce. As a matter of fact, a lot of automation was involved, and they are very low wage countries.

Again there was an evolution, a shift from the Taiwans and the Japans, the Hong Kongs, the Singapores, a shift of that type of production, that is, the basic labour-intensive, not capital-intensive, into other countries like Malaysia and Thailand, the Philippines, Sri Lanka and India, where the wages on the average were probably no more than $25 a month. A very interesting evolution or structural change is taking place, because here in North America, where we have the sophisticated technology and the capital-intensive, automated, mass-produced, standardized type of production we cannot compete with the other countries in a world marketplace.

The shift that was pointed out—

Mr. Stokes: Why not? This is where robotics all got started.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I would like to debate this on a one-to-one basis with the member for Lake Nipigon. I would be very happy to do that and to point out in a historical fashion all the components of this evolution in the change of our production, the shift, what has happened in the other countries, what countries like Japan are doing now and how we must change if we are going to compete.

For example, take Britain. Britain has consistently led the world in major technological breakthroughs. I will mention three: continuous steelcasting, monoclonal antibodies and the CAT scanner. But because British business lacked the organization and the workers lacked the skills necessary to incorporate these inventions into production processes quickly enough, the British have reaped no real competitive advantage from them. These inventions were commercialized in Japan and the United States.

The solution that has been advanced is that, in short, we have to get into more flexible systems of production. This does not mean that industrial countries must abandon their old industries such as steel, textiles and automobiles. Rather than abandoning these industries, countries are seeking to restructure them towards higher valued and technologically more sophisticated businesses, specialty steel, special chemicals, synthetic fibres and precision engineered automobiles and auto components.

I may again point out to my friend from Nipigon that of all industrialized countries, Japan has made the most rapid shift from standardized production to flexible systems production. I am not going to spend any more time in referring to that particular article because if the member would like to pick it up and read it, I think he will be suitably impressed with the structural change that has really transpired and the problems that we are going to face and are facing in this country in terms of our production.

Mr. Stokes: Did you wonder why there was only two per cent unemployment in Japan and they are concerned about it?

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I do not wish to debate on a one-on-one basis, although I will be glad to at any time in any forum with my friend from Nipigon.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Except this forum.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I do not think it is appropriate. If the member thinks it is, I will take him on collectively or singly, whatever he likes.

Mr. Nixon: Let's have a committee, Jim.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: That is not a bad idea. I think it would be appropriate to have a select committee to examine precisely what is going on, to separate rhetoric from fact and to get a sense of direction and a sense of proportion.

There are two major challenges facing the people of this province and this government. Our most immediate and pressing task is to respond to and to manage current positive economic trends in a constructive manner. First, we must ensure that the economic recovery takes hold and then transform that momentum into positive economic growth for our province.

Effecting this transformation from a recovery mode to a new pattern of sustained and positive growth is our second and perhaps most important challenge. To successfully meet this challenge we will have to help our industries and manufacturers adapt and adjust to the world-wide reorganization of production which has occurred over the past 20 years, most notably in the past decade.

Programs such as Canada-Ontario employment development are designed to achieve a limited but important goal of helping the unemployed through a very difficult economic period. They provide short-term relief but do not offer viable long-term solutions. For those solutions we must turn to policies which will support capital formation and help improve our productivity.

Only policies designed to achieve these goals can effectively reverse the deterioration of our competitive position which threatens the long-term employment prospects of our province. If these policies are to be effective, they must be designed from a global perspective and with the dynamics of a world market in mind. That worldwide reorganization of production which I alluded to earlier has been complemented by and to a degree has caused radical shifts in the patterns of world trade.

Increasing interdependence brings new problems and new opportunities, opens new markets but also exposes us to new competition. The day is long past when we in Ontario can safely ignore the newly industrialized or the less developed countries. In many instances these nations have become aggressive exporters and are taking an increasingly large share of developed markets.

It is no secret that Canada is a trading nation and Ontario is a trading province. Export sales in the future will be an important element in dynamic economic growth. However, Canada's share of world trade has been declining over the last 10 years. For Ontario the decline in share of world trade has been just as troubling, from four per cent in 1970 to 2.5 per cent in 1981.

Of greatest concern to me is the fact that this country's trade deficit in manufactured goods continues to expand. This is of particular significance for Ontario, which accounts for approximately 50 per cent of Canada's manufactured exports. As I recall, that 50 per cent at one time was about 70 per cent.

As all members are aware, manufacturing accounts for more value added growth and employment than any other sector of the economy. According to Ministry of Industry and Trade figures, world trade in manufactured goods is expected to increase by four per cent to 4.5 per cent annually during the period 1983 to 1987. If Ontario producers are to win a fair share of that increase they are going to have to compete for it. Only if they compete successfully can we expect to derive any economic benefit, including a growth in employment opportunities.

In fact, over the next four to five years our producers will find that they will have to compete vigorously to maintain their share of our domestic market. Canada already experiences a higher degree of import penetration than any other Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development country. Our domestic producers' exposure to foreign competition will increase over the next few years as tariff reductions negotiated at the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade come into effect.

The result of GATT and the Bretton Woods monetary system, has been the emergence of one worldwide market. The rules in this market are clear: To survive, you must compete; to compete, you must be productive; to be productive, you must adapt. Within this new environment the government can best help the unemployed and most effectively resolve the long-term problems of unemployment by helping industries adapt and compete.

The generation of new employment opportunities depends on capital formation and the level of productivity. These two factors largely determine how many jobs there can be, how secure they can be and how well-paid they can be. If we in this House are serious about creating greater employment opportunities for Ontarians, then we should concentrate on ways to encourage capital formation and improve productivity.

The throne speech explicitly states that this government is committed to developing internationally competitive world-class industries in Ontario. I suggest that this commitment is a real commitment to increase employment. In our last budget, for example, we suspended the corporate income tax on incorporated small businesses for a two-year period. This move returned more than $250 million to some 60,000 small firms in 1982-83. This provided the small business sector, which accounts for 40 per cent of all employment in the province, with a substantial investment pool.

This government will continue its efforts to stimulate business investment by imaginative policies that allow us to work effectively within the private sector, and members opposite will just have to wait and see how imaginative those policies are. Most important, this government has been able to sustain investor confidence in Ontario because of its record of sound, responsible management, and members cannot deny that.

Interjections.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: We have kept our deficit under control—and the member knows that—and have carefully regulated the size of the public sector—and the member knows that. As a result of our long-standing commitment to and practice of restraint we have been able to provide cost-effective, high-quality services to the people of this province—and the member knows that as well.

I am pleased to note that in the throne speech, Mr. Speaker—and I am glad you have observed this as well—the government undertakes to strengthen further the management of the province's affairs. That should receive applause from all members. I am also encouraged by the fact that in the speech from the throne the government declared its intention to address the problem of falling productivity.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Oh, come on.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: The member knows that as well.

I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that unless we quickly reverse the trend in declining productivity the problem will soon assume crisis proportions if it has not done so already. In Canada, declining productivity is a fairly universal problem but Ontario, as the manufacturing heartland, is particularly hard hit by the slump.

Some appreciation of the severity of the Canadian productivity problem can be had from the following figures. Between 1950 and 1981, manufacturing output per man-hour worked rose 194 per cent in Canada. By comparison, during the same period output increased 267 per cent in Sweden, 350 per cent in France, 414 per cent in West Germany and a phenomenal 1,334 per cent in Japan.

From 1960 to 1980, Canadian productivity grew at an average rate of 2.4 per cent per year compared to the average rate of 3.9 per cent of all OECD countries. By 1982, Canada had the worst productivity record of any western nation and our productivity has actually declined in three of the last four years. It is important for members to take note of the facts.

More alarming from the Canadian perspective is the fact our productivity performance is rapidly being overtaken by non-OECD producers. The newly industrialized countries and less developed countries are now using much the same type of equipment as we do and have the advantage of access to cheaper resources and cheaper labour, advantages which they will continue to enjoy for quite some time in the future.

The productivity problem is a complex one and solving it will require a concerted effort on the part of labour, management and government. An element of any solution will, however, be the adoption of more efficient production technology. The government's major contribution to this effort is being made by the technology research centres. It is hoped these centres will help the private sector make the transition to the technological society. However, I would caution against believing that high technology is the open sesame to our economic future.

Ultimately, the real solutions come down, as they always do, to people. High technology requires people who are trained and equipped to operate, maintain and apply it in an efficient manner. After all, the inefficient operation of efficient technologies is not progress. Therefore, to be competitive and productive, we require an appropriately educated and skilled labour pool. The speech from the throne suggests that this government will act to provide for such a labour force.

Mr. Philip: If you had taken a speed reading course you would have saved us all a lot of time.

The Deputy Speaker: That is out of order.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I think it is too, Mr. Speaker. I was proceeding rather quickly because I was hoping to finish my remarks by six o'clock. The subject matter with which I am dealing is very important and vital. The members of this Legislature should have some concept, some understanding of what is happening not only in the Ontario and Canadian economy but in the North American and world economy.

The members should have some understanding as to what is happening in the financial community and the banking world, the changes taking place there and how those changes will fundamentally affect every Canadian, every Ontarian, every individual. It is important in my estimation that the members of this Legislature take this matter seriously.

Mr. Philip: We are.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: No, the member is not, because he would rather engage in senseless repartee than involve himself in what I consider a very serious discussion.

On motion by Mr. J. A. Taylor, the debate was adjourned.

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Tuesday, April 26, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

MEMBERS' PRIVILEGES

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, my point of privilege pertains to the rights of all members of the Legislature to be able to meet with their constituents. I am speaking in this case particularly of those handicapped constituents in wheelchairs. I want to bring this matter to your attention, sir, and to the attention of the responsible ministers as a result of a visit to this building by a handicapped constituent of mine last week.

This individual, who came to the Legislature with a companion without a car and thus was not driven, pointed out there is no proper wheelchair access for a person who is not being driven to the front of the building. Those individuals, as in this case, who wish to avail themselves of the wide promenade sidewalk which runs from Queen's Park Crescent to the front of the building face two obstacles.

The first obstacle is to get on to the sidewalk from the street, because there is no ramp. The second is in getting from the sidewalk into the parking area and the assembly area directly in front of the building, because once again there is no ramp and on either side there are flower beds, so there is really no way a handicapped individual can get up from the sidewalk into that assembly area.

I would ask you, sir, and the responsible ministers to look into that problem and perhaps to put a ramp in at both ends of the promenade sidewalk so that all our constituents can use the main sidewalk when they come into the Legislature at the front entrance.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you. I am sure the appropriate minister will take note of that.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to—

Mr. Foulds: Are you or aren't you?

Mr. Kerrio: Who is going to be the first to know?

Hon. Mr. Davis: You.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Are you announcing the resignation of the front bench?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I notice that until you arrived there were not many over there.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I am just here to balance them.

Hon. Mr. Davis: And I am here, so what more could you ask?

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Ah yes, but it is always quality that is more important than quantity.

Mr. T. P. Reid: That is what we have been saying for years.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I know you have been saying that for years.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They are interrupting me, Mr. Speaker.

ONTARIO ARTS COUNCIL

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask members to join me in celebrating the 20th anniversary of one of Ontario's most innovative, successful and respected institutions, the Ontario Arts Council.

This is an organization whose reputation has spread internationally and whose methods are copied by other provinces and states far beyond our own borders. To have achieved all this in the short period of 20 years is further testament to the council, which was established in April 1963 when this Legislature unanimously passed Bill 162, giving it a unique mandate to serve a growing constituency.

I am sure every member of the House will join me in extending our congratulations to the council on its 20th anniversary and in thanking all those members of the council, numbering 42 over this period of time, who have contributed so significantly to the growth and current vigour of the arts in this province.

It is ironic and highly fortunate that the arts are one part of our society that do not measure their worth purely in economic terms. Yet the arts in Ontario can be extremely proud of their contribution not just to the quality of life of our people but to our standard of living as well.

Today cultural industries generate $3 billion in economic activity annually. They account for 50,000 man-years of employment and at least $2.5 billion in tourist revenues. In fact the Stratford Festival, to take but one example, is such a powerful magnet for tourism that it is one of North America's most popular theatres.

In access to the arts and opportunities to participate in them, Ontario is second to no other jurisdiction in the world. Today this city, Metropolitan Toronto, is a major world centre of the arts. Next to New York and London it is the largest producer of live theatre in the English-speaking world. It is the third largest music production centre in North America and, with the Festival of Festivals, hosts one of the most popular film festivals anywhere.

Today Ontario's cultural superstructure includes dozens of professional theatre and dance companies, 49 symphony orchestras, hundreds of museums and libraries, nearly 100 publishers of Canadian books and another 100 Ontario publishers of Canadian magazines.

Thus it is fitting, I think, that as we pause to reflect on the accomplishments of the past 20 years we also speculate on what the next 20 years will hold for the arts and the people of this province.

In 1973 the government passed guidelines for cultural policy development that outlined the relationship it thought should exist between government and the arts. Those guidelines have served us well through the last decade of tremendous growth, and while recent years have not been easy ones for many in this province, including those involved in the arts, we are fortunate indeed that both the quality and the quantity of our artistic endeavours remain very high.

Now, on the 20th anniversary of one of the primary catalysts of the arts, it is a pleasure to reaffirm my government's commitment to continue support for the council and to say we will work to ensure the council's mandate is most effectively executed.

If the years 1983 to 2003 are as creative, healthy and successful as the past 20 years, I am confident that a good deal of the credit will go to the Ontario Arts Council.

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to welcome many members of the council who are seated in your gallery and to thank them publicly for their efforts for these past many years.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all members join in welcoming the members of the Ontario Arts Council. I can only make one observation, and that is that it is a much more subdued appearance than I had expected.

FOREST MANAGEMENT AGREEMENTS

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, today I would like to bring the House up to date on my ministry's progress in forest management agreements.

I know that honourable members recognize the economic significance of forestry to our province. Forest management agreements, or FMAs, are a major factor in achieving Ontario's long-range objective of ensuring regeneration to guarantee that this contribution to our provincial economy continues.

2:10 p.m.

Under these FMAs, which replace existing timber licences, forestry companies agree to accept the responsibility for all forest management practices, including harvesting, regeneration, tending and road construction. My ministry, with assistance from the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development, provides subsidies for forest access roads and funding for silvicultural work.

The companies also carefully consider the interests of other forest users, working with my ministry to set aside areas that cannot be cut, areas important for activities such as hunting, fishing, canoeing, camping and wildlife habitat. They also protect these values through controlled cutting techniques.

In the last two months, I have signed five new FMAs with four companies. I signed an agreement with Ontario Paper Company Ltd. for the Nagagami Forest near Hearst and another with E. B. Eddy Forest Products Ltd. for the Pineland Forest near Timmins. I signed two agreements with Boise Cascade Canada Ltd. for the Seine River Forest near Atikokan and the Manitou Forest near Fort Frances.

The agreement I signed with Waferboard Corporation Ltd. for the Romeo Malette Forest in Timmins has particular significance because it is the first agreement made with a company not involved in pulp and paper production. As such, it shows my ministry, and the Ontario government, is sincerely interested in involving as much of the forestry industry as possible in the management of our forests. It is just one way we are acknowledging the industry's expertise in forest management.

Our agreement with Waferboard also shows that forest management agreements are not exclusively for larger corporations. This is just the beginning of our efforts to involve smaller but just as important operators in the FMA process.

I am sure the honourable members know that small independent operators hold licences in many areas of our province, licences that are not large enough to ensure a supply of timber on a sustained yield basis. We are proposing that these independents consider establishing a forest co-operative to manage the forest in their areas.

This would allow them to enter into their own FMA so they can manage the forest in all its aspects, from harvesting the timber and directing it to a mill that needs it, to reforestation. Should these efforts prove successful, and I am confident they will, I would look upon them as another breakthrough in the management of our province's forest resources.

Since 1979 we have signed 13 FMAs covering an area of more than 64,000 square kilometres. My ministry, with the help of BILD, will spend some $35 million this year alone on the agreements.

FMAs have a valuable side effect. They protect forestry jobs of the future and they directly create jobs. In addition, FMAs are creating a demand for planting stock that we have not experienced before. We have enlisted the help of private industry to keep up with this demand for seedlings caused by new FMAs.

By 1985, we hope to have 30 FMAs in place, covering more than 70 per cent of the forestry operations on currently licensed crown land in Ontario. My ministry's involvement by that time will be well in excess of $100 million annually. This represents 60 per cent of the total cost of the FMAs; the rest comes from industry.

Last year, FMA holders regenerated more than 11,000 hectares of forest land at a cost of $4.2 million. The holders carried out further silvicultural activities on another 29,000 hectares and constructed more than 600 kilometres of forest access roads. These roads, which cost $11.3 million, are also used by the public generally and provide access to areas for harvesting overmature forests, regeneration and silvicultural work.

These FMAs and those yet to be signed map our transition from the harvesting of a natural forest to intensive management of the forest to produce crops on a sustained yield basis. They ensure that our forests will maintain the current forest industry base and also provide, over the longer term, for growth and development of our forest-based communities.

As the honourable members can see, the private sector and my ministry are doing much to ensure that Ontario's forest industry remains strong and prosperous well into the future.

ORAL QUESTIONS

BUY CANADIAN PROGRAM

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. It is my understanding the Ontario Manpower Commission recently purchased a computer from an American manufacturer, Altos Computer Systems of San Jose, California. Even though the purchase price was less than $100,000—in the minister's terms that amount is probably not significant—there seems to be an important principle involved in that case, particularly while the minister's colleagues are promoting the shop Canadian program wherever they can. I understand even the Premier (Mr. Davis) believes in it.

Why was this machine purchased in the United States? Were tenders let for this contract in Canada? Were Canadian companies given the opportunity of bidding on this contract?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that question under advisement. I will report back to the House on Thursday of this week.

Mr. Peterson: When the minister is reporting back to this House, would he table the specifications, the bids received and the analyses of those bids made by his ministry before the purchase of that particular equipment, which has had some technical problems and has not been performing? Would he table all the specifications, the bids and all the relevant documentation so we can assure those Canadian manufacturers who maintain, to us at least, that they could have done it better for 25 per cent cheaper, that they were not shortchanged in the selection of that machinery?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I am confident I can provide all the information the honourable member is requesting.

OHIP PREMIUMS

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller), I have a question for the Premier.

[Interruption]

Mr. Peterson: There is a delegate up there for him. Does the Premier want to go up and shake hands?

Hon. Mr. Davis: He or she will be a voter.

Mr. Peterson: She is in pink. She looks a little too smart for him to me, to be perfectly honest.

I am sure the Premier is aware of a great number of things, obviously, but he is aware that the Treasurer has been conducting some prebudget meetings with a variety of groups across this province.

He may or may not be aware that the Ontario School Trustees' Council bulletin, which I understand came out today, made the following report of that meeting with the Treasurer. I am only quoting excerpts. It said: "OHIP premiums may be increased by as much as 15 to 20 per cent. The province is considering extending the current Inflation Restraint Act beyond the current nine and five, two-year period."

Could the Premier kindly inform this House if the Treasurer is contemplating those options? Is the government going to proceed with those options, particularly in view of the fact that the option with respect to Ontario health insurance plan premiums is clearly against the law and its own act as it is currently written?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I will not get into a debate with the Leader of the Opposition as to whether or not it is contrary to the law; that is a subject for another occasion.

I have not been present with any of the groups at the Treasurer's prebudget meetings. I can only assume the discussion is fairly wide ranging. No commitments are given to any group the Treasurer meets with, obviously, because he has not made any determinations.

While today is April 26, I think I can tell the honourable member that probably on a number of issues the Treasurer is still reaching a final conclusion. I cannot help him beyond that except to assure him, as I would on any occasion, that the Treasurer's budget, when it is presented, will be logical, intelligent, sensitive and in keeping with the economic conditions of this province and our financial obligations, as has been the case in every budget that I have been witness to.

Mr. Peterson: I want to refer the Premier to the legal opinion tabled in this House by the Treasurer and Minister of Economics with respect to the legality of the last OHIP premium increase. This is under the minister's signature. He said:

"The opinion of the legal staff of my ministry is that future increases in OHIP premiums are subject to part III, i.e. administered prices of the bill"—so they are an administered price—"if they take place within the period mentioned in part III, that is, in most cases between September 21, 1982, and January 1, 1984."

That being said, it is the ministry's opinion that the OHIP premiums are an administered price and that any attempt to increase those in the operative period would be in contravention of the act, unless, of course, the minister goes to cabinet to get special dispensation to increase those prices.

Can we have the Premier's categorical assurance as the first minister that he will not run around the act, that he will not go and seek an OHIP premium increase in excess of five per cent, and that when thousands of people in this province are restraining themselves, the government will restrain itself?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would venture to offer a point of view to the Leader of the Opposition that he might exercise a certain measure of moderation and restraint himself in some of his observations; but that would be asking a great deal, and I would never presume to give that advice.

If the Leader of the Opposition understands the statutes, as his researchers have prepared his material for him and he understands very clearly what the process is, this government is not intending to get around the legislation.

But it is also important to point out without any reference specifically to OHIP that the legislation was specifically drafted so that with respect to some administered prices, if in fact the actual cost—or the pass-through, whatever term you may wish to use—is in excess of the five per cent, that principle has been established in the statute.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, I really do not understand why the leader of the Liberal Party wants another $32 increase in the family rate, which is already the highest in Canada. If the Premier does not understand it, there is already a mountain of evidence indicating that our premiums are so high in Ontario that there are tens of thousands of citizens who cannot afford and do not have coverage.

Instead of a five per cent increase, as the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting, or a 15 per cent increase, which the Treasurer is brooding about, would the Premier not agree that it would be much wiser to replace the premium assistance program entirely with a tax credit and, second, begin to shift the burden of paying for health care from the regressive premiums to progressive income and corporation taxes?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think it is perhaps proper to engage members of the House in this discussion at the time of the budget. We have debated on a number of occasions whether there are in fact better alternatives. The member opposite has a philosophical point of view that the government has not accepted. I think his party has explored the payroll tax as an alternative, if memory serves me correctly, and there are—

Mr. McClellan: It was your idea.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Listen, I am just saying that the member's party has also explored it, and there are some negatives with respect to that, as I understand it.

I also really wish the honourable member understood that when it comes to the payment of premiums, the premiums do take into account the capacity of some sectors of our society to pay. With respect, I wish he would document those thousands of people who cannot afford to pay a premium.

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, since the Premier will not give the people of Ontario his categorical assurance that OHIP premiums will not rise on the order of 15 to 20 per cent, as predicted in the document read by the Leader of the Opposition, does the Premier, as the architect of this restraint program, not feel it to be hypocritical in the extreme to ask people by the tens of thousands to restrain their wage demands to the five per cent limit, while at the same dishing up for the second year running a double-digit premium increase of the kind mentioned in the document referred to by the Leader of the Opposition?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member for Renfrew North should not get carried away and excited. It has been my experience before budgets that figures are mentioned and so on. I cannot give a guarantee as to what the budget is going to contain. Some members opposite would then accuse me of leaking some of the information. I can only assure the honourable member that the Treasurer of this province—

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, the members of the Liberal Party know all about leaks of that nature.

Why not be patient and wait until the Treasurer's budget is presented? The member is aware of the sensitivity, the concern and the problems imposed by the economic conditions and also by the restraint program. But if he goes back to many of the things his leader said when he was the financial critic for his party, the number of occasions he berated the Treasurer because his incomes did not come close to matching the revenues and said we should balance the books, not have any deficits, if he would look at some of that material, he might then remind his leader of some of the things he said before his reincarnation.

LEAD ASSESSMENTS AT WILCO-CANADA

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my question is of the Minister of Labour. It concerns an issue that has been being raised in this House since April 1982, and that is the question of lead poisoning of many workers at Wilco-Canada Inc. in London.

I would like to ask the minister how he explains the appropriateness of six charges being laid against workers in that plant for "not using respirator equipment provided by the employer on November 23, 24 or 29," when at precisely the same time the government was laying charges against two supervisors, as well as against the company, for failing to give workers appropriate respiratory equipment for the type and concentration of airborne lead.

How does he explain the fairness of punishing workers for failing to wear equipment, when at the very same time ministry inspectors are clearly saying to the company that the equipment they are giving to these workers is completely inadequate? Is he blaming workers for taking the same steps as his inspectors have taken?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the honourable leader of the third party is talking out of both sides of his mouth at the same time.

I have been criticized in this Legislature by members of the third party for not acting in respect to the Wilco situation. When they said they were well aware of the fact we had closed that plant down on one occasion to get it to comply with the regulations and to put in the correct control procedures. They continually recommended to me that I go further than that, or what they considered to be further than that—I thought closure was the ultimate position to reach—nevertheless, to prosecute the company and all those involved in the improper compliance with the regulations.

Our inspectors went in there and did a thorough job. Our legal branch agonized over all the information that had been received for some time. There was considerable consultation by all our senior officials to make sure we were on solid ground in every respect. The end result has been the charges that have been laid. Those charges are laid, and I think it would be inappropriate for me to comment any further now than that they are before the courts.

Mr. Rae: Not one of the charges relates to the company's failure to clean up its act and to provide decent ventilation and to get lead right out of the environment at Wilco. Not a single one of those charges relates to that problem.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister about a particular individual whose name is Larry Grafstein who worked at Wilco for 12 weeks only between June and September 1982. If the minister's department has been on top of this issue for so long, how can he explain the fact that, after working at this plant for only 12 weeks, Mr. Grafstein in 1982 was monitored as having lead levels well over 1.00 milligrams per litre?

He was subsequently put on workers' compensation benefits, and as recently as February 1983 his blood levels shot up to 1.90 milligrams per litre. He spent three weeks in hospital. He almost died. Because the blood was having difficulty passing the lead, they had to switch the drugs they were using on him. Since then he has spent the majority of time in hospital for chelating treatments. It takes about five days in hospital for him to recover from the weekly four-hour treatments.

I would like to ask the minister, if the ministry has been on top of this issue, as he is so proud in saying, how can he explain the fact that this worker is suffering from lead poisoning to the extent that he practically died and has spent the last three weeks in hospital? How does the minister explain the condition of this worker if his ministry has been on top of this situation?

2:30 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I am aware of the particular case history that the member is reading out in the Legislature today. I do not want to minimize it in any way, shape or form, because it is a very serious matter, but the information I have had certainly does not indicate the same gravity of a problem. I will be happy to follow it up and look into it again, but my information certainly has not coincided with the information the member has brought forward.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, on February 9 I asked the minister the whether he was aware of the following facts.

Mr. Mohsir Najjar, a five-year worker in the shipping department at Wilco, was told in January that he would have to do his own job plus drive a forklift. When Mohsir offered medical evidence that his respiratory problems precluded his being exposed to lead he was laid off.

In the case of Brad Tunks, a young tube mill assistant, he was literally poisoned from exposure to lead at Wilco and suffered nerve damage.

In the case of Dan Wood, who had his blood lead level checked in September 1982, Wilco management would not provide him with the blood lead level tests. However, he was removed from the tube mill and later laid off.

I also asked whether the minister was aware that four workers who were on compensation were laid off immediately on being told they could resume work.

Finally, I asked if he was aware that Wilco still had not implemented the ventilation program that was laid down.

In a subsequent letter, the minister refused to answer those questions and he has not answered them yet. When is he going to lay charges on the real gut issue, the failure to clean the place up?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I did respond to the letter the honourable member raised in the House. Mind you, I did not give him the information he requested, simply because charges have been laid and the case is now before the courts.

NURSING HOME CARE

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman), I would like to address a question to the Provincial Secretary for Social Development. It has to do with the government's intentions with respect to nursing homes.

Is the minister satisfied that the one and a half hours per day of nursing care provided for in the regulations for extended care residents in Ontario's nursing homes is an adequate standard of care in Ontario? If she is, how can she explain the kinds of problems and complaints and concerns that I raised yesterday?

I know the minister was here for much of the speech yesterday with respect to several nursing homes, including the River Glen Haven Nursing Home, the Tender Loving Care Nursing Home, the Lincoln Place Nursing Home and several other nursing homes. How can she explain the inadequacy of staffing and the staffing problems that have been revealed time and time again?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member will know the Minister of Health has already indicated that he has several concerns within the nursing home area and that he is addressing those concerns. He is improving the inspection. He is certainly communicating to the nursing homes that we will not tolerate care that is not at the level we expect nursing homes to provide to those who require their services.

I know that even with the best of programs and the best of intentions there are still occasions when circumstances develop that we certainly do not approve of, but the minister has indicated he will not tolerate anyone in any nursing home within this province not receiving adequate care.

As to the one and a half hours' nursing care, that is a policy we are addressing at the moment.

Mr. Rae: I ask the minister again, if she is so satisfied with the inspection process and with its adequacy, can she explain how it is possible that Mr. Gould, who is the current manager of nursing home services, was quoted as saying at a meeting on April 11, 1983: "Our staff are being run off their feet. A lot of pressure is on"? Does she think it is appropriate to have staff being run off their feet and to have a mere 14 inspectors with respect to nursing care for 340 nursing homes in Ontario? Is she satisfied that the inspection staff is there to do the job that needs to be done?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: I do not think I indicated I was satisfied at all. I said the minister was aware and concerned about inspection of nursing homes where there have been complaints. It is an issue he is addressing. I at no time indicated I was completely satisfied with the inspection that was taking place.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, has the provincial secretary, in her role as superminister, been involved with the Minister of Health in discussions that will lead up to the tabling of legislation which he has already promised for this session?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, through you to the member, yes.

Mr. Rae: In conclusion, can the minister explain to us how it is possible that in the last very few years complaint after complaint has been registered with respect to individual nursing homes with respect to the problem of staffing, with respect to the problem of enforcement of existing standards, with respect to the problem of fire hazards and with respect to the problem of adequate programs for residents of these nursing homes, that time and time again the government has been made aware of these problems and to date absolutely nothing has been done in terms of changes in the act or changes in the regulations or changes in basic procedures being followed by the inspection service?

Can she explain why it has taken all this time, coroner's verdict after coroner's verdict, complaint after complaint, and to date absolutely nothing has been done?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: I take exception to the member's comments when he suggests nothing has been done. A great deal has been done and I am still not satisfied that enough is being done. Those questions are all being addressed by the Minister of Health.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding, may I ask the co-operation of all members in limiting their private conversations please.

EMPLOYMENT OF HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour dealing with the problems of the handicapped community in finding any employment. I know it is a subject which the minister is deeply concerned about, because just last week he attended a conference in his home riding regarding the employment of handicapped persons.

I would like to remind the minister that in January 1982 the Ontario Manpower Commission released a report which disclosed the rate of unemployment among the employably handicapped was just under 30 per cent. According to the handicapped employment program in his own ministry, the true figures are more than double that rate.

In Sault Ste. Marie, as the minister knows, and in my own community of Windsor, it is estimated that 80 per cent of the employable handicapped are without work. Here in Toronto the estimated figure is 75 per cent and the list goes on and on throughout the province.

The Pigott task force completed its work and submitted its report to the minister about a month ago. Will he tell us today when we can expect from the government a comprehensive strategy on employment initiatives for the handicapped? Will he tell us why there was no mention of this subject in the speech from the throne?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted the member has brought up the conference that was held in Sault Ste. Marie because I was told by my officials that it was by far the largest conference held anywhere in the province, with over 200 participants. It was also the best conference ever held in the province. I had the opportunity to tell them I was not surprised at all because that sort of circumstance happens all the time in Sault Ste. Marie, regardless of what the issue may be.

In fact, with the greatest respect to those who reside in Toronto, I was told by my officials that they could never hope to attract as many as 200 people to a conference on the handicapped here in Toronto. It was reassuring to have such a good turnout in Sault Ste. Marie.

To answer my friend opposite, as far as the Pigott task force report is concerned, I have not yet received a copy of that report. I am anticipating it shortly. I am looking forward to receiving it because I know Mrs. Pigott has done just a gruelling and complete exhaustive study of the whole matter. She was totally dedicated to the task she had and very enthusiastic about it.

I would also like to report to the member that the affirmative action programs that have been introduced by my ministry are starting to pay dividends, even despite the recessionary times.

We now have some case histories for some major companies that have made great strides forward. I would be delighted to share those with the honourable member or with anyone else. There are companies in this province that have hired the handicapped and they have done studies of the work of the handicapped. They have found that their work habits, in just about every category one could pick, when compared with a person who is not disabled, usually come out on top.

In other words, the old myth that hiring the handicapped is hiring problems has been completely dispelled. The handicapped are demonstrating and proving that they can do a job and do it better in most instances than a person who is not handicapped.

Mr. Wrye: To go back again to that huge number who do not have a job and the lack of initiative from the ministry in rectifying that problem, during the estimates last January the minister stated, "There is no hesitation at all on my part as far as the priority of the handicapped employment program is concerned."

If there is such a priority, the handicapped employment program is not even an official program; it is a developmental initiative constantly under review without the status and protection of an independent ministerial program. This program has a staff of seven workers and one secretary. The entire budget of this so-called program is $600,000 and that budget for 1983-84 has been cut 13 per cent from last year.

How can the minister pretend that this kind of staff and funding represents any serious commitment to rectify the disgraceful state of affairs where four out of every five employable handicapped people in his community, in mine and in so many others across this province cannot get a job?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: There is no doubt about the priority but there is doubt about the funding. I am not alone in that respect. Every minister here has had to tune in with the times and tighten our belts as far as our operations are concerned.

I would like to have additional people in my women's bureau. I would like to have additional employment standards officers. I would like to have additional people in various areas, but we have to realize that the resources are just not there and try to do the very best we can with the resources we have.

I maintain we have done that and we have shown improvement over the years in handicapped employment and we will continue to do so. We have some extremely dedicated and competent people. All seven that the member mentioned fit into that category, entirely dedicated. I repeat myself in saying that despite the recessionary times, with the co-operation of industry, we have been making strides.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could file with the House information as to the numbers of unemployed handicapped. Is it as high as 75 and 80 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I will not say that I will be happy to do that, because when we look at the figures in that perspective they are not good. The point I was making was that progress is being made and there is improvement, but we are starting from a pretty disastrous figure. The figure of 75 per cent mentioned is probably closer to 80, and that is a totally unacceptable figure, I fully agree.

LUMBER MILL AT ALBAN

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Natural Resources regarding Martin Lumber.

Last fall the minister said his government took the position of processing resources at source. Since the federal government has indicated its willingness to put industry and labour adjustment program funds into a new mill in Alban to provide jobs for the over 100 workers who are currently unemployed, can the minister indicate to the House what action he intends to take to ensure that the funds which are available for only one year from the federal government will be made available so that the mill will be constructed this year?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, I presumed the member for Sudbury East would rise in his place to congratulate this government on the announcement of the allocation of surplus wood north of his community, his great riding, for the purposes of the construction of a new waferboard plant that will create in excess of 400 jobs for the Sudbury community; all of which would process wood at source, would it not?

Mr. Speaker: Now to the question please.

Hon. Mr. Pope: That is precisely the point of the announcement that was made last Friday. I have indicated to the member previously, in writing and also verbally, that when we were looking at the Rogerson's limits and what should be done with them and the Alban mill, we allocated the transfer of the licences and we allocated the wood on certain conditions that were expressly stated in the transfer documents. I think the member is aware of them. They were that by May 1 of this year Mr. Martin was to indicate to us in writing whether he was going to refurbish the existing mill.

The member is aware of the problems or purported problems of that existing mill with respect to the environmental problems associated with the waste. He is aware of the problems or purported problems with respect to electrical supply, and the problems of efficiency of operation of the mill and the cost of operation.

If Mr. Martin were to give us an indication in writing by May 1 of this year of either the construction of a new mill in the Alban area or of the refurbishing or reconstruction of the existing mill, we are awaiting that advice in writing. He is aware that before he processes that wood in anything other than the Alban mill he must obtain the written consent of me, as Minister of Natural Resources. No such consent has been asked for and no such consent has been given.

Mr. Martel: I know all that, except I also know that Mr. Martin can come back to the minister again in September and ask for a further extension. We will have the process of logs leaving the Sudbury area, going down the Mattawa to be processed while 100 workers are out of work in the Alban area. That is the only employer. The minister will recall the throne speech last week said the government was going to look after one-industry towns.

Let me ask the minister what action he intends to take to ensure that mill is constructed, and is there a possibility of using the existing mill until plans are completed for a new mill, which would then see employment take place in yet another one-industry town in the north?

Hon. Mr. Pope: For one thing, I believe the honourable member is well aware that for any operation in that mill we would not get permission to turn on the hydroelectric power. The member is aware why that is. We would not get permission from the Ministry of the Environment for the disposal of waste in that particular site. Alternative sites would have to be found, and the member is aware why.

All I can say is I am as anxious as he is to have a new or refurbished mill located in the Alban area using that licence and the allocated timber within those licences. The member has a choice. We want a new, modern, efficient and competitive mill in that area which will give long-term job security. We are willing to give Mr. Martin a little bit of time to get his studies done, to get his applications and approvals through the federal government in order, and to give us an indication whether he is going to spend his money on refurbishing that mill to make it more competitive and more efficient or whether he is going to build a new mill.

The only alternative is to close it. If that is the alternative the member wants for the people of Alban, I am not prepared to accept it. The member cannot tell us we have had no concern about one-industry towns when we have had waferboard plants in the member's own riding, when we have had a waferboard plant in Englehart, and when we have had private nursery operations in many small communities throughout the north as a result of this government's policy on forest management.

DEATH OF JOSEPH MUGLIA

Mr. Kennedy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Attorney General with respect to the murder of Joseph Muglia in Mississauga last June, where there was a conviction for manslaughter and the sentence was only 21 months. Is the Attorney General's office reviewing this case and will there be an appeal of that sentence?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter that was of some concern to us and an appeal as to the sentence has been launched in that case. The sentence that was handed down by the trial judge, in our respectful view, is simply inappropriate.

2:50 p.m.

Mr. Kennedy: On the same incident, there were two other arrests made and one news article as of two or three weeks ago said there had not yet been a date set for trial of the other two persons accused in this incident. Could the Attorney General comment on that, please?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: No, I am sorry; I do not know anything about the trial dates for the other accused, but I will obtain that information and advise the member accordingly.

HOSPITAL BEDS

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Health is absent I will ask a question of the Minister of Health's boss, the Provincial Secretary for Social Development. She is obviously aware—if she is not, she just has to lean over and talk to the member for Ottawa South (Mr. Bennett)—that unfortunately Ottawa and Carleton have had a long history of shortage of active care beds.

I am sure she is aware that recently a 54-year-old Ottawa lady died while waiting to be admitted to the cardiac unit of the Ottawa Civic Hospital. I quote from Dr. Keon, who is one of the top heart specialists in the country. He said very simply: "But in this case, there is just no excuse. She waited seven days and if we had got her a few days before, even four or five hours before, she probably would be alive today."

In another situation in which a lady from Vanier died last October, a coroner's jury just last Friday recommended that "the Ottawa and district health council and all area hospitals review the serious shortage of available beds."

Given this very unfortunate evidence, how long will it be before the government proceeds to give sufficient funds to Ottawa-Carleton so they can have the normal provincial ratio of active care beds like every other area of the province and prevent such unfortunate situations as I have mentioned here?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the cardiac beds are being supplied some time this fall. Of course those are very unfortunate circumstances, and one hopes that we will not be faced with those kinds of situations in the future. As I understand it, there are beds to be open in September that would address those particular issues.

Mr. Roy: The member for Ottawa South, who suggested the answer to the minister, is quite right. There will be the opening of 30 active care beds for the cardiac unit in September—

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Additional.

Mr. Roy: Additional, yes, but does the minister realize that for Ottawa-Carleton there is currently a shortage of 175 active care beds? The provincial ratio is something like 3.5 per 1,000, whereas in Ottawa-Carleton it is something like 3.2 per 1,000. Given this situation, when can we expect that the government will move to give adequate funding so that we can have the provincial average and thereby prevent situations such as these?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: I can only say to the honourable member that the Minister of Health is moving as quickly as possible to make sure that all areas of the province are adequately served.

EQUAL PAY

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. He seems very popular these days. I know the minister is aware of the Beverley Billing case, where a woman employee of an optical lab was denied a claim for the same pay as a male employee who was doing similar work on the ground that the male employee had additional but unused qualifications. This decision was the result of judicial review of a referee's decision and leave to appeal the court decision has been denied.

Since the minister has expressed his disappointment with the court's decision in a letter to my colleague the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie) will he make a commitment to amend subsection 33(1)(d) of the Employment Standards Act to declare that consideration of unused qualifications is not an acceptable reason for a differential in pay between men and women doing substantially the same work?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, we have looked into that matter. It is correct that the member for Hamilton East wrote to me on April 18 and I responded to him. Following our investigations, we do not feel that an amendment to the act is required. We felt this was a particular instance and that the section of the act would appropriately cover other circumstances of a similar nature.

Ms. Bryden: Is the minister aware that Beverley Billing was led to lay her complaint after seeing the government's equal pay ads, which appeared on buses and television just before the 1981 election and which claimed that the present equal pay legislation guaranteed women equal pay for, and I quote, "doing substantially the same work as a man," as long as the skill, effort, responsibility and working conditions required are similar?

Beverley Billing has found, by bitter experience, that the ministry's ads were misleading and that we do not have equal value legislation in effect in Ontario. Will the minister concede that Beverley Billing would probably not have been denied the same pay as her male co-worker, who was doing substantially the same work, if the principle of equal pay for work of equal value was embodied in the Ontario law, as has been done at the federal level and in Quebec and as was embodied in a bill that my former colleague Mr. Bounsall introduced in 1979 and which passed second reading in this House?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I believe my ministry acted very responsibly in this matter. We were disappointed with the decision of the Divisional Court and accordingly we instructed our counsel to seek leave of the Court of Appeal to appeal the judgement of the Divisional Court. The Court of Appeal did not find cause to do so. While we did not agree with the decision, nevertheless we have to abide by that decision.

I am repeating myself, but I really do not feel that the legislation, as it stands, requires amendment. I feel we certainly do have strong legislation and that has been proven in many instances. This is one case that went the other way, but we can provide information to the members about other decisions that have been reached that have had far-reaching implications, not necessarily just in single applications but in multiple applications. A couple of very recent ones represented a substantial amount of money. There has been a lot of money awarded on equal pay decisions over the past two years.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, is the minister saying we are going to get no amendments to the act and there is going to be no new legislation in this area at all? I know in estimates he rejected equal pay for work of equal value. He indicated, however, that he was going to bring in legislation adopting the composite approach. Is that now out the window as well, or are we going to see some amendments one of these days?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mackenzie: He is saying there is no justice for Beverley Billing.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Oh, that is ridiculous.

Mr. Mackenzie: That is exactly what you are saying.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: As far as the member referring to the composite test is concerned, we have every intention of bringing that forward. We have not changed our position on that at all.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST METROPOLITAN TORONTO POLICE

Mr. Shymko: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Solicitor General. I would like to ask if—

Mr. McClellan: Red herrings.

Mr. Shymko: That seems to be the fate the member gets caught with very often.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please.

Mr. Shymko: I would like to ask the Solicitor General whether he is aware of the allegations that were officially submitted to the mayor of the city of Toronto that seven demonstrators who took part in the demonstration on Saturday afternoon, April 23, in front of Queen's Park were severely and brutally beaten by members of the Metropolitan Toronto Police 52 division.

There were three testimonies of choking, kicking, using of a metal pipe—three of them fainted—punching and some beatings extending from five to 10 minutes. These allegations are apparently very serious. Could he provide some advice as to what recourse these people have for a full inquiry into the actions of the Metropolitan Toronto Police?

3 p.m.

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I thank the honourable member for the question, and I must confess to him that I have no knowledge of those allegations as so made. If those allegations have been made and somebody wants them to be investigated, there has been set up in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, where the demonstrations took place—and I assume the allegations are being made against members of the Metropolitan Toronto Police—a complaints commissioner, who hears those complaints and can have a hearing into the matter.

I must add that this legislation is provided for and is under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry), and the member may want to ask him further questions on the matter. Thus, if he wants to have it redirected, he might have it redirected to the Attorney General, who would answer more fully. But I think the available jurisdiction and benefit to those people who are making allegations happens to be there in legislation under the complaints commissioner.

Mr. Shymko: Since these details will be provided to the Solicitor General, I would like to know whether the Solicitor General would be prepared to provide details to this House, since tomorrow is the anniversary of the Vietnamese boat people and the seven individuals involved were boat people refugees. The concern they have is one of shock as to the treatment they have received from the Metropolitan Toronto Police.

Would the minister be prepared, if they do provide him this information—I believe it is on its way to him—to give some of these details to this House?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: As I have mentioned, the legislation is not under my jurisdiction; but if I receive such content I will refer it to the complaints commissioner, as would be the normal practice under the legislation.

FISHING POLICY

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Natural Resources in regard to fishing policy, or the lack thereof, in Ontario. Can the minister tell the House when he is going to make a policy statement on fishing in Ontario, specifically in regard to the most sought-after game fish in the province, walleye, or yellow pickerel? In particular, what is he going to be do about the declining stocks in all the lakes in Ontario, from Lake Nipissing to Rainy Lake and all over?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the honourable member that in some specific locations in Ontario the walleye, or pickerel, population is under some stress and that in the past there has been some habitat deterioration for a number of reasons. But using section 38 and using some of the other existing programs of the Ministry of Natural Resources, in the past year quite a considerable sum of money and effort has been expended both to improve the habitat and to remove some of the sources of stress.

The member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) laughs at that, but about 1,200 laid-off workers in Ontario have been employed directly under section 38 in fish habitat rehabilitation work in different parts of the province doing very important work, and they have added well in excess of $4 million as the value of work done to rehabilitate the pickerel fishery. Furthermore, we have undertaken in existing ministry programs an additional $1 million worth of work in habitat rehabilitation.

The effects of this are not going to be immediate. There is going to be some period of time in some specific lakes where there are going to be some signs of deterioration, but in the long term that is the only successful way in which we are to restore the pickerel fishery in Ontario. We are committed to it and we are working hard at it as a ministry.

We are also looking at a couple of pilot projects with respect to pickerel in Ontario that involve some potential hatchery projects. We are looking at it in conjunction with the Northern Ontario Tourist Outfitters Association and the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters. We intend to continue to work with them, looking at what is being done with pilot projects in other jurisdictions, and we hope, therefore, to make some progress.

Mr. Martel: Where have you been for 40 years?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Where have I been for 40 years?

Mr. Speaker: That was a very complete answer. Never mind the interjection.

Mr. T. P. Reid: The minister mentioned the possibility of a pickerel hatchery, which hardly any biologists in his ministry have recommended. The minister has indicated that he might put one in Lake Nipissing and perhaps somewhere in Rainy Lake or Lake of the Woods. Could he indicate whether he is talking about actual hatcheries or pond rearing for walleyes? When can we expect some kind of definitive statement on walleye fishing in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Pope: I think there has been quite a debate in the fish biologists' community in this country and in North America about the value of pickerel rearing ponds and pickerel hatcheries, and whether the survival rate in their natural habitat once they are stocked is adequate to warrant the expenditure. It is a very controversial issue. There are other strongly held points of view on the other side of the issue.

I indicated I would make my officials available, my biologists available and the Ministry of Natural Resources available to go into the midwestern states with the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters and NOTOA representatives to look at some of the projects that are going on there now on an experimental basis and see whether we can adapt some of those to the Ontario situation. I am willing to have an open mind on the issue and to work with the groups who want to get involved.

I have to say that under our community fisheries involvement program we have opened the way for fishing clubs and other interested and concerned groups in Ontario to initiate some of these projects for themselves. We are willing to work with them. The only conditions we put on is that there has to be some biological control to prevent the spread of disease and that once the fish hit the water they are a public resource to be available to all under our regular allocation systems.

We are willing to work with any group in Ontario which wants to expand on these activities, including those in the pickerel field, to make sure this happens. We are willing to commit our resources to some additional pickerel habitat rehabilitation programs and stocking programs in the near future.

One last point: I extend my apologies to the member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the strategic planning for Ontario fisheries program has been floating around in the ministry for several years now, and given the fact that the pickerel fishery specifically is so important to the tourist industry right across Ontario, how much in actual funding is the minister prepared to make from his own resources, and through the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development, to make it the kind of potential that it could be, not only to the tourist industry but also to sports fishermen right across the province?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, I think I should say very clearly that we believe natural reproduction and maintenance of the natural habitat is the only important way in the long term to ensure the continuation of a strong pickerel resource in Ontario. We are not prepared to stand by and see the degradation of the habitat. We are not prepared to stand by and see uncontrolled exploitation of the resource and think that the only solution is to build hatcheries and keep on pouring fish into it.

That is why in the past year, under the BILD commitments of this government and under our accelerated capital program, we have increased our expenditures on the fishery resource of this province from $24 million to $36 million. That is why at present we have in place capital expenditures that will increase our stocking capacities in this province by 50 per cent.

We have indicated that the existence of pickerel hatcheries as the answer is controversial. We are trying to work out a mutual solution with other interest groups. When that solution is agreed upon we will put the same kind of financial commitment into that very important fishery in the province.

AMBASSADOR BUILDING MAINTENANCE LTD.

Mr. Cooke: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Labour. It concerns a company in the city of Windsor called Ambassador Building Maintenance Ltd., about which I think he has had some correspondence from my office.

Has the minister had a chance to review the situation? Does he think it is proper for a company to hire employees, making it a condition of employment that they must move into the buildings of which the company is the landlord, and then to deduct the rent from their paycheques? In many cases it has resulted in individuals getting zero paycheques because the rent is deducted from their paycheques.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member has brought that problem to my attention through correspondence. It is being fully investigated at present. I hope to be able to respond to his letter by the end of this week.

3:10 p.m.

Mr. Cooke: First, I would like to point out to the Minister of Labour that the local employment standards office of his ministry indicated to me over the phone that there is nothing in the Employment Standards Act to prohibit this practice from continuing.

I would like to ask the minister whether he will also consult with the Minister of Colleges and Universities (Miss Stephenson), because her ministry is in charge of St. Clair College, and St. Clair College uses Ambassador Building Maintenance, which contracts out its janitorial work. It pays employees $3.50 an hour and uses these kinds of employment practices. Does he not believe the government should not be participating with an employer such as this in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I believe it would be appropriate for me to hear the results of our investigation before I make off-the-cuff comments about a circumstance.

FLOOD PLAIN MAPPING

Mr. Ruston: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Natural Resources. Is the minister aware that his ministry's guidelines as to flood plain mapping, administered by the conservation authorities, are causing extreme hardship on land owners in areas so designated?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, if the member for Essex North is asking me whether I am aware that from time to time some problems may arise with the application of provincial flood plain policies, the answer is yes. My own riding of Timmins was the site of the 1960 Mattagami River flood, or the Timmins flood, which is the standard for a good part of the province; that clearly indicated to this government back then the need to have a flood plain policy to prevent loss of life, loss of property and substantial damage. Based on that and on the Hurricane Hazel incident, as well as a number of other incidents, this government in the 1960s adopted a flood plain policy and started looking at areas that were susceptible to flooding.

I recall that we did flood plain mapping in the honourable member's area. It was very controversial when it was introduced. Everyone said that it was completely unrealistic and that the floods would never happen. Lo and behold, when the Essex flood came it was within half an inch of the predicted flood guideline.

I am aware that individual problems can be created for people. We tried to address that last year when cabinet adopted a refinement to the two-fringe concept to allow for construction in some of the areas less susceptible to flooding. We have tried to have special policy areas to moderate the impact of the flood plain guidelines. We have gone out time and again to discuss these policies with the people who are affected. We are trying to do our best to be flexible in the application, through both the conservation authorities and the government, but we are committed as a government to having in place some flood damage reduction program.

We do not want to see the situation now seen in the Mississippi River system where they paved over so much of the system, where they failed to allocate flood plains for the protection of people, and they get $20 million in damage every year in Louisiana state alone.

Mr. Ruston: The minister and I do not disagree to a point when one has flooding. But when the government designates areas that have never been flooded in 100 years, houses with basements are sitting there side by side and have never been flooded in 55 years, and when they cannot build on them but it is not even in the registry office, so the property is not even in zoning, that is ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. Pope: The member probably said the same thing about the Essex-Windsor region in 1978, and it was proved correct then—

Mr. Ruston: You don't know what you are talking about.

Hon. Mr. Pope: I do not know what I am talking about? I have done a specific study of the Windsor flood, and the member opposite does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, surely the minister knows that the procedures under the present act are arbitrary. There is no notice of appeal to the individual when these flood lines are placed on his property. There is no way he can appeal and there is no arbitration from that decision.

Does the minister not agree with the Deputy Premier (Mr. Welch), who indicated when this question was raised last Friday that he felt it would probably be appropriate to change this whole system so it was brought under the Planning Act and there would be those rights of notification and appeal? Does the minister agree with him and will he promote that kind of a change?

Hon. Mr. Pope: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member knows the flood plain policy is one of the policies that will be applied under the Planning Act. He has been aware of that for a considerable period of time. Therefore, he is aware that as a provincial policy that will take effect under the Planning Act, there is some right of consultation.

He is also fully aware of exactly what happened in Timmins. That city adopted, in its official plan and zoning bylaw, hazard land designation that affected 250 homes. It was brought before the Ontario Municipal Board. Every single property owner attended and each had his say. They had questions on the provincial policy and its application on a local basis. The member knows full well that right is available. As soon as the local municipality makes that designation under the official plan, they can have a complete, formal hearing. We have already had an informal hearing for them.

The member knows full well all the consultation on this issue that has gone on since 1977 between the Niagara Peninsula Conservation Authority and all the municipalities in his area.

Mr. Speaker: The time for oral questions has expired.

USE OF TIME IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bradley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: I think it is interesting to note that today, since you have adopted your new policy, by my calculation there were six questions asked by this party, five questions asked by the New Democratic Party and two questions asked by the Conservative Party, for a total of 13 questions. So it is obvious your new restraint policy in the House is working.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you very much. Obviously it cannot work without the co-operation of all members, and I wish to thank everybody.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I possibly should—

Mr. Stokes: Recap.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Recap. That is a great suggestion. That is the most positive suggestion I have had come from the New Democratic Party today.

Mr. Wildman: He said recant, not recap.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I just want to refresh members' memories. I know they were all so attentive yesterday afternoon that they would want to put the remainder of my remarks in focus.

Mr. Ruston: I missed the last 10 minutes, Jim. Could you please repeat that?

Mr. Stokes: Did you read Hansard? It didn't read all that well.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: The last 10 minutes? I have not had the opportunity of reading Hansard, but I hope it makes some sense. Of course, I will be delighted to discuss it with my friend on some future occasion.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, I was very impressed with the remarks of the leader of the third party when he reminded the House of the growing needs of the elderly of this province and in particular the concerns he had for residents in nursing homes. I think he was serious. I think he was not acting in any political way in expressing his real, deep-seated, heartfelt concern for those persons who had to leave their homes and possibly spend the rest of their lives in nursing homes.

I was sympathetic, because I think all of us share that concern. It is not a matter to politicize. It is a continuing need of society that must be addressed regardless of which party is in power at any particular moment. It is a need that will continue to grow as the population ages. All of us become more mentally and physically disabled as we get older; it is part of the ageing process. I will not comment on the age of the opposition.

Mr. Stokes: Almost as old as the government.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: That may be. What I am really saying, and I think what the leader of the third party was saying as well, is that there is a big problem out there. There is a big need that not only is being addressed but also must be addressed in a more effective and sympathetic way in the future. I share that, as I am sure members of the Liberal Party would share that.

He read a litany of letters that were mostly negative. I think many of those criticisms were well-founded. But I tried to point out that there is another side. There is the side of those residents in nursing homes who have never had the level of care they are currently enjoying. I refer to people who have never had the attention and who have never been able to share with others, who were sympathetic, their problems and their concerns as many of the residents in our nursing homes experience today.

So there are the two sides. I suppose, if one wanted to get into a contest in terms of saying we have more letters in support of our nursing homes than we have objecting to nursing homes, we could do that, but that is not constructive; I do not think anybody intends that.

What I guess we are all saying is that there will be a growing need and that need will have to be continually addressed. There is probably some room for stricter enforcement of present regulations, and there may be some need for basic change in the types of accommodation that some elderly persons utilize at present.

I commented on that because—

Mr. Kerrio: Because you are getting older; that is why.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Besides my infirmity, I was thinking of the continuing and accelerating infirmity of some of my good friends and colleagues in the opposition parties and the need, if possible, for an improved system of care as we graduate to some of these other facilities.
3:30 p.m.

Getting back to the relevance of those remarks to the principal thrust of the throne speech, which was an economic thrust, there is a continuing need to support in a financial sense the large spectrum of social services that we not only enjoy but must continue to expand and improve.

In other words, I suppose it is simplistic for the third party to suggest the answer is to nationalize the nursing home system. I personally do not agree with that and I do not think we have to find new ways of discovering government involvement. I think we must find new ways to create national wealth, instead of merely finding new ways to share it.

I then went on to what I perceive are some basic structural changes in the economy of this country, this province and this continent. In that regard, I mentioned we have seen an evolution of our productive system, an evolution or change from a high volume, standardized type of production to the need for, if not in fact the accomplishment of, a more flexible system of production; in other words, a transition. That transition would, of course, require a basic restructuring of business, labour and government.

In that process, I pointed out what is happening and what has happened since the early 1960s, which is basically the transformation of a domestic market to a world market, from a domestic marketplace to a world marketplace. In the early 1960s, for example, probably eight per cent of the commerce and industry of the United States was exposed in terms of imports; today it is probably 30 per cent.

The high volume, standardized production which really created the wealth of the United States and this country is a type of production that has now been transferred to what were developing countries or Third World countries. Those countries initially concentrated their production, in terms of their cheap labour, in the toy industry, the shoe industry, the clothing industry and that type of thing.

In regard to the transfer to those nations, I may say I had the opportunity some 15 or 20 years ago to visit a number of the Pacific Rim countries to look at those economies. Not too long ago I had the opportunity to return and to see the dramatic change and shift. The so-called developing countries now have the capital intensive, sophisticated, often automated equipment that mass produces.

This is mass production by a population that does not have the expectation in terms of general welfare and standard of living that we do in this country and on this continent, so that it has become very difficult for our industry to compete with that industry. We can now see countries that earlier got into mass produced, standardized production, such as Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong and Singapore, getting out of that into more sophisticated, flexible types of production where skills are more important. I would say Japan is the leader in that regard.

Mr. Conway: Have you been reading The Atlantic Monthly?

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Yes, I have. If the member for Renfrew North was here yesterday, I referred to The Atlantic Monthly and to the article entitled "The Next American Frontier," by Robert Reich, in the March issue.

Mr. Conway: You have read the other one too?

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Yes, I have, in response to my well-informed friend.

Mr. Conway: I was not here yesterday.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I know the member was not here and I accept his apologies for not understanding what I had said.

I think it is imperative that we appreciate what is happening in the world marketplace. Yesterday I pointed out in part that this world marketplace has also become a world marketplace for banks. I do not want to get into the banking system today and what has happened there—the judgement calls, the financing of sovereign countries, the financing of very large multinational corporations, and whether banks really can control whom they lend to.

Mr. Stokes: Towers of Gold, Feet of Clay.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Yes. I will not be decoyed by that. I thought that Towers of Gold, Feet of Clay was a very interesting book. I have read that as well. I thought it was rather biased. If the author, Walter Stewart, had been more objective in his presentation, the book would have more credibility. He made some excellent points and I think he did a great deal of research. To some degree his credibility was weakened because of the obvious bias in the book.

I will not go into that area, but just point out that there is a world marketplace now in terms of our banking institutions. We could bring that back to—

Mr. Mackenzie: I think it is time to enter the temples and overturn the tables.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: The member can turn religious if he likes, but I am going to wait a little while. I am just an honest to God, solid, common Christian. I am not into the type of cult religion they have over there.

Mr. Breaugh: You are not born again.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I will not be drawn into some of the academic and philosophical arguments I am sure the member for Renfrew North might be drawn into or my good friend sitting behind him.

Since Bretton Woods and the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, we have seen the development of the single marketplace; and remember the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which was philosophically to reduce world tariffs, so that again we become more exposed to world competition. I think it is imperative to appreciate and set that picture and understand that tone when we look at what government must do in a very serious and constructive way in terms of ensuring we recover and experience a healthy economy.

I would suggest that particular attention be paid to training or retraining workers to perform effectively in flexible production systems. This, in many cases, will involve more than learning a new set of technical skills. It will demand an additional change—an attitudinal change, a mental reorientation towards really what constitutes a job. I say that because of the new flexible approach that workers are going to have to take. Not that straight line approach with a pecking order, but really a co-operative approach in terms of identifying problems and solving those problems.

Another area that will have a profound import on the way in which our economic future unfolds is labour relations. I have spoken on this over the past number of years. Frankly, I think it is time we took a more civilized approach in terms of settling industrial disputes. I think the adversarial approach, the approach that seems to polarize prejudice and create more friction, is obsolete.

But I will not develop some of the suggestions I have made in the past in that regard. I am just putting it to you, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to have to change our attitude and basic approach in the whole field of labour relations.

One of the causes of our poor showing on productivity is the amount of time lost in strikes and lockouts. Unfortunately, Canada leads the world in this category.

Mr. Conway: And the Ontario Legislature must lead Canada in that category—what could be more unproductive than this Legislature?

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, have we had enough interjections? May I carry on? I do not want to respond to the accuracy or inaccuracy—may I say to some degree I rely on statistical material that my research digs out for me, and we can debate that, I know.

Mr. Mackenzie: I am not a betting man but I will make a bet on that.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Sure, sure, any time.

The Deputy Speaker: The honourable member for Prince Edward-Lennox.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Yes, Mr. Speaker, thank you for ensuring that I do not wander from my chosen path.

Mr. Conway: The chosen path took him from Scarborough to Napanee in short order, but that is another story.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Sure, and as I say, I will not let the member decoy me. Again, I was not speaking in a geographical sense and I will leave that for another occasion.

Between 1971 and 1980, for example, we lost on average 896 person-days of work per 1,000 employees a year because of industrial conflict. During the same period—and I think members will be interested in this—the United Kingdom, which we often perceive as a nation usually on strike, lost in the average year 539 days, the United States lost 437 days, Japan lost 103 days and West Germany lost a mere 42 days.

Certainly it is difficult to compete when you lose twice as much production time as your competitors. High-technology equipment is useless if it is sitting idle. Labour and management must finally accept that it is ridiculous in the high-tech 1980s to conduct their relations on assumptions and perceptions typical of the 1920s.

It is also vital at this very sensitive period that workers in the private and public sectors continue to exercise restraint in their wage and salary demands. I appreciate that the question of the level of wages and salaries is a contentious one. I am also aware of the Citibank study, which shows that for the period from 1970 to 1981 Canadian labour costs increased less than in any other industrialized country except the United States.

The problem in Canada has been that salary increases cannot be justified in terms of productivity increases. From 1972 to 1982 Canadian wages increased at an average annual rate of 11.3 per cent. During the same period our productivity increased at an average annual rate of 0.1 per cent. The hard fact is that entering the 1980s we were being paid more and were producing less. This is obviously a trend that cannot continue if we hope to compete effectively in the future.

The speech from the throne speaks of increasing entrepreneurship in small and medium-sized businesses and of increasing innovation in all sectors of our economy. I believe that government's ability to achieve these goals through unilateral action is extremely limited. In this House we cannot pass laws that demand that people take economic risks or have ideas. We can, however, create an environment in which risk taking is more attractive and innovation is more likely to occur and to be supported and implemented. I hope the policies and programs proposed in the throne speech will create that environment.

The focus on small business is quite appropriate. That sector has proved to be the most innovative and flexible in our economy; it can respond more quickly and effectively to new opportunities than can larger firms. All too easily do some relegate to the sunset category industries like the automobile industry, which would, and could if properly managed, continue to make a significant contribution to our economy. That is not a mistake this government will make.

Directly or indirectly the auto industry accounts for one of every six jobs in this province and serves as a base for approximately one fifth of our entire economy. It is our major manufacturing and export industry. This government believes that the auto industry can still be a very positive force in our economy.

Mr. Stokes: Do you drive a Lada or a Mercedes?
3:50 p.m.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: May I just say to my friend the member for Lake Nipigon that when his leader spoke yesterday, I was courteous. I listened courteously to him. I thought that he was sincere in what he was saying. As a matter of fact, I was supportive of much of what he said.

Mr. Haggerty: Don't go too far, now.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I drew the line as I always draw the line, I would expect, for a party that wants to nationalize at an ever escalating rate—and I understand their platform and their philosophy, I understand what they want to do to the health care industry. But I would hope that they would take me as seriously in my concerns for our economy. That is essential if we are going to fund these very necessary and vital social welfare programs. So I ask them to be serious.

If the member for Lake Nipigon wants me to answer his interjection, I will tell him what car I am driving. I drive a Buick LeSabre, if that is relevant to his party's philosophy. I might also say that I purchased, at the same time, a K car, a yellow station wagon. If he wants more details, it is a Dodge Aries. I discovered, after I bought it, that it has a Japanese engine. That is my patriotic gesture and that is what I am driving.

I do not think that is really relevant to the tone or to the thrust of my remarks.

The Deputy Speaker: And so you will drive back to the main road.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: But I did feel that possibly if that is critical to the core of that party's philosophy, I should respond in an appropriate way.

The throne speech did mention a number of items that will be the subject matter, I am sure, of government policy and programs. Pension reform is one of those.

Mr. Boudria: The child rearing, drop-out provision.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Yes, maybe it is appropriate to respond, Mr. Speaker, because I am not being decoyed to my Liberal friend's interjection in regard to the drop-out for women. I would subscribe to that and embrace that recommendation in the report of the select committee on pensions. I do hope that before long we will see that implemented into Canadian law.

Mr. Cassidy: It requires this government to give its consent.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: To the member for Ottawa Centre, I understand all our learning is not achieved in universities. I was vitally involved in this matter some years ago and studied the subject very thoroughly. As chairman of the select committee on pensions I had occasion to refresh my memory and to review the current situation.

I fully understand Ontario's veto in regard to this particular provision which, if I may say, was a reason for not adopting the drop-out provision some years ago. But I want to tell the members that I think the current climate is such that this provision should be adopted and I only repeat myself when I say that I totally embrace the recommendations of the select committee in this regard.

Also, of course, the reference in the throne speech is for an Ontario approach to the federal government. While I think it is essential that we co-operate fully with the federal government, there are many things that we, in this province, can do in regard to pension reform, things that are within our constitutional authority and which we should do.

Mr. Conway: The Legislative Assembly retirement act.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: No, I haven't that in mind. It is an area that may preoccupy the honourable member's mind because of his specialized interest, but it certainly was not a consideration of mine.

Mr. Samis: From a rotten borough.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: In responding to the member for Cornwall, first, on behalf of the constituents of Prince Edward-Lennox, I would like to say they express resentment at a remark that I represent a rotten borough.

Mr. Samis: They are not that touchy.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I am not that touchy, but we have such sound, conscientious citizens who have such a deep and long-embedded faith in the democratic process and the elected process that they would not like to hear that kind of remark coming from the New Democratic member for Cornwall. I just want to put that on the record for his edification.

Mr. Conway: The 1975 election results put that to rest anyway. What was it—600 votes?

Mr. J. A. Taylor: That is right. It certainly was. There is a historian. I can tell a historian.

Mr. Conway: Oh, I was just reminding you of that close race.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: The member does not have to remind me. I was almost a victim of that particular election, but fortunately the wife of the member for Cornwall was. She ran against me.

Mr. Speaker, through the member for Cornwall, I want to convey to her my congratulations on her election to the city council.

In any event, I do not want to be distracted from the remark and reference I was making in regard to pensions because I think most of the citizens of Ontario want to be self-reliant in their retirement. As a matter of fact, I think most citizens want to be able to stand on their own two feet throughout life.

If we are going to give our elderly citizens the opportunity to maintain their dignity and self-respect and self-reliance, then it is fundamental and, I think, vital that we implement pension reform in this province. That reform, of course, would and could follow the basic recommendations of the select committee on pensions.

For example, I would just mention the need to recognize in this day and age that employer contributions to workmen's pensions are in fact deferred wages, and as deferred wages those moneys should be seen as vested so they become a part of the property of the employee.

Mr. Cassidy: That is a good socialist principle.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: It is not a socialist principle, it is a principle of conscience. When the members over there become less doctrinaire and understand that all human beings, we hope, will become more civilized as history goes on—

Mr. Cassidy: That is a good socialist principle.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: That is what the honourable member says. He can adopt what he wants as a socialist principle, but I am not going to get into an argument on that. I will debate you on socialism—

Mr. Cassidy: It is better than the law of the jungle.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I do not want to get into practising the member's laws in this Legislature.

The Deputy Speaker: Reminding all honourable members that the member for Prince Edward-Lennox has the floor.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I do want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am delighted that the opposition party subscribes to the principle of deferred wages and of immediate vesting. The select committee has recommended that the vesting initially be five years. We hope that vesting will evolve without too much delay so that we will have vesting, say, after a year.

Mr. Cassidy: It is a pity your party does not agree with us.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: If that happens, that would ensure to the workers of this province a satisfactory retirement in their future. It would certainly liberate them in terms of their mobility so they could travel from job to job. I think that is important today, and a flexible system of production is important so that workers can be mobile.

4 p.m.

Mr. Cassidy: Workers of the world unite.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: That is right from Karl Marx. I appreciate the member's learning as well. You have only your chains to lose, gentlemen over there, and you have a world to win, a world to gain.

Interjections.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: The trouble with the third party is it seems it has no room to manoeuvre. They have to become radicals.

As a matter of fact, the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie), if I am not mistaken, referred to his leader as a radical socialist. I do not want to get drawn into that either, but I had hoped the member had become more moderate in his views and would support the government when it pronounces policies that are sensible and advance the welfare of the people of this province.

Mr. Samis: Announce your nomination.

Mr. Conway: Get the lead out, Jim.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: I am not running for the federal leadership. I do not think so anyway.

Mr. Conway: What about the federal Tory nomination in Hastings?

Mr. McClellan: Are you going to the convention?

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Which convention? If they send their invitations I will consider them all. No reasonable offer will be refused.

Mr. Cassidy: To make you feel better, we supported you for Speaker. We still do.

Mr. J. A. Taylor: Thank you very much. In seriousness, I appreciate that. I take that seriously because I think he has, and I think we have, sincere people of good conscience on all sides of the House who are here because they really want to serve their fellow man. I mean that. I think the member subscribes to that.

I will not take up any more time but I thought I must say, talking in terms of the welfare of the senior citizens of this province, that we have to start in terms of our children, citizens of an early age, who spend their lifetimes in the work force and who would rather have a pension plan they have supported and towards which they have contributed so they have the independence and security any citizen of this great province should have.

I want to thank all the members for their kind attention.

Mr. J. A. Reed: Mr. Speaker, listening to the comments that have been made in this throne speech debate so far, I marvel that it is such a wise decision on the part of the proceedings of this House not to rule anything out of order.

I also feel it does nothing but improve the level of debate when it comes to this particular throne speech, because I must say it is probably the most repetitive piece of regurgitation we have borne witness to in this Legislature in many years.

However, the latitude extended by the Legislature to the speakers allows us to deal with subject areas that were not mentioned in the throne debate but which, it is the belief of some members, would at least have some level of importance to this Legislature.

Mr. Conway: Now tell us about water power.

Mr. J. A. Reed: I will tell my honourable friend that I will probably touch on the subject before these remarks are concluded, in spite of what the members may think.

Mr. Stokes: No, for the love of peat.

Mr. J. A. Reed: I would like to dwell at the outset on a subject area that had its active origin in the great town of Acton, Ontario, that town which was deleted from the official road map of Ontario in 1982 but for which a return has been promised in the next issue of the map. The good citizens of Acton were at least as incensed as I was when that omission was made and Acton was relegated to a blow-up view of the Toronto area.

A year ago, a handicapped citizen of Acton by the name of Lorne Doberthien, who is the owner of a business, undertook to bring to the attention of government the need for legislation governing parking for handicapped citizens. Mr. Doberthien is a recently handicapped individual and has therefore had the experience of both situations.

With visits and a campaign with various members of government and in the Legislature here, namely the Minister of Transportation and Communications (Mr. Snow), we were promised two things. One, that when the new plating system came into operation licence plates would be available on request to identify the handicapped owners of automobiles; and two, that uniform legislation would come into play to provide common legislation for all municipalities across the province.

To this date we have seen the move to introduce the licence plate for the handicapped owners of motor vehicles, but to the chagrin of many handicapped people we have discovered that to this point legislation has not been forthcoming from the government to provide uniformity for handicapped parking in every municipality in Ontario.

I was quite delighted that the member for Mississauga South (Mr. Kennedy) today introduced a private member's bill to that effect. He can be assured it will receive my support. The most the Minister of Transportation and Communications has been able to volunteer to this Legislature is that he is disappointed that municipalities have not adopted the uniform bylaw that was given to them concerning handicapped parking. To this date, no further action has been taken officially.

It is to be hoped the government might make a rare exception and accept the private member's bill delivered to this Legislature by the member for Mississauga South. However, if the past record of the government is any indicator, we are going to wait a long time yet.

In my hand today I have quite a large number of letters from handicapped people in my riding expressing their very deep concern that while the licence plate move has been made by the government no move has been made to impose uniform legislation. I would like to read into the record a letter from the Hamilton Automobile Club that explains it probably as well as any other. I will just read a couple of paragraphs.

"Unfortunately, most municipalities fail to accept the new MTC-issued plates as adequate to allow motor vehicles fitted with them to be parked in special areas designated for the handicapped. Presently, handicapped users are being misled into believing that their cars fitted with MTC issue may be parked in any reserved handicapped area.

"It is important that this misconception be cleared up immediately and that the Municipal Act be amended so as to provide a uniform bylaw allowing motorists whose vehicles are fitted with these new plates to park in spaces reserved for handicapped persons."

I cannot emphasize too forcefully the need for this kind of legislation. Surely in a province that prides itself as being enlightened we can give some very close attention to this important move forward and see to it that handicapped persons do not continue to be disadvantaged as they are at the present time.

Therefore this member, being the voice in this Legislature of one of the major creators of this idea, Mr. Doberthien, will continue to press the government to see that adequate provision be made.

I was quite impressed, as was the previous speaker, by some of the remarks made by the leader of the third party regarding nursing home care in Ontario and some of its obvious inadequacies. Incidentally, I believe those inadequacies are acknowledged by the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch). I do not want to restate the words of the leader of the third party, but hopefully to add to or expand on them somewhat.

The member summed up his comments on the problem by saying the answer lay in nation-alizing or having all nursing home care in Ontario under government ownership and operation. I would like to respectfully suggest to the leader of the third party that the problem neither begins nor ends with the profit motive in this case.

The solution to the problems we experience on a day-to-day basis—and some of us in this Legislature have personal experience with problems as they arise—really lies in the provision of adequate inspection for nursing home operations. Until we have an adequate number of inspectors and can apply inspection on a uniform basis across all those areas that provide levels of nursing care, whether they be municipally controlled, private or whatever, we are going to have a continuation of these very serious problems.

There is one area that was not touched upon at all by the leader of the third party and I believe it is an area that has been critical in the province, concerning the care of elderly people, for at least as long as I have had the honour to serve in this Legislature. It concerns that group of residences known as rest homes.

We know there is a public perception that people who are residents of rest homes require a certain amount of care if they are elderly, disabled and so on. But to this date there is no legislation in place in Ontario governing the operation of rest homes, other than that provided at the same level for boarding houses. Yet the public concept is that those people who become residents of rest homes are entitled to certain levels of basic care. In fact, we have an appalling situation in Ontario where there are no rules of the game governing rest homes. While legislation has been promised from time to time, I believe since 1976, it has never been tabled in this Legislature.

The absence of legislation is unfair to the families of residents and to the owners and operators of rest homes. How can one expect any accepted level of care to take place as long as we treat them in a fashion no different from boarding houses, which is the way they are being treated at the present time.

I am deeply concerned about this matter. It is something the various ministries concerned have refused to take action on over the years. Perhaps the legislation is a little too difficult for them to consider, but the families of the people in rest homes and the people who operate rest homes need and want legislation. It is my belief the medical officers of health in the various municipalities agree legislation should be forthcoming. I urge the government at this time to proceed with that kind of legislation with a sense of urgency.

In the last year I have changed portfolios from Energy to Natural Resources. It has been about a 12-month learning process to try to have some view of some parts of the largest and most diverse ministry in the province. Indeed, in that area I can sympathize with the difficulty the minister had going into his new portfolio and trying to get a grip on just what is happening in that ministry.

I have been impressed with the broad subject areas he has to deal with. I have been so impressed that I have recommended to the minister that the ministry really should be divided. There is at least one subject area that should become a ministry unto itself, and that is the area of mining. As we go along and gain experience and depth, there may be more areas that might well lend themselves to a separate and distinct ministry.

Surely it is accepted that many of the subject areas overlap between mining and natural resources. There is also an overlap between natural resources and energy. In those areas, liaison has to be strengthened and policies adopted that complement the various ministries.

Once again, I suggest to the minister and to the government as a whole that a new look be given to the Ministry of Natural Resources in terms of the subject areas it is required to carry, because it is an incredibly steep order for any minister. It is no wonder we can say, and I am sure the minister would not disagree, that in many areas it is the bureaucracy that controls the branches of the Ministry of Natural Resources and which considers it has a mandate to apply the legislation. It is very difficult for the minister to undertake the innovative and creative measures he must undertake for the economic and resource development future in Ontario.

Recently the minister and I met at a public meeting in my riding discussing the concerns of citizens over the designation of land for future aggregate extraction. In Halton, outside the Niagara Escarpment, the ministry has identified and originally wanted to impose controls or designation on 16,000 acres of land. On top of that, a recommendation was made by the hearing officers on the Niagara Escarpment that a further overlay take place on the escarpment.

I have to tell members that the designation of land in the manner in which the ministry is proposing it is unacceptable to the citizens of Halton-Burlington and will be found, as time goes on, unacceptable to the citizens of those other ridings that contain aggregate potential. We have borne witness to the imposition of government by policy in this matter rather than government by legislation.

We saw initially a mistake made by the government when it used a threat not to approve official plans to impose land designation in Caledon and in Durham. We saw one judicial decision made in the township of Puslinch using the aggregate policy, the one that Mr. John Masham of the Ministry of Natural Resources says was not cabinet approved. We saw the attempt to make the overlay in Halton. That was when the good citizens of Halton stood up in a body, side by side with their elected municipal officials, to say: "Listen, this is going too far. You must not do this."

It is interesting to note that even now, in terms of the resource base available for the aggregate industry, in terms of licences and active pits at the moment, there is more aggregate available than will be used by the industry to the end of this century. So when we are talking about attempting to designate 16,000 acres of land in Halton for the exclusive use of aggregates in the future we are handicapping a whole municipality. Indeed, we are asking that municipality to do far more than its fair share in supplying aggregates to the Metropolitan Toronto area.

Now I recognize that the aggregate industry is important to the construction business in Ontario and the supply of aggregates is necessary, and an economic supply at that. But I say to the minister and to those officials in his ministry who wish to designate this land that if he were to proceed on the basis upon which he started he would be handicapping a whole ring of ridings around the Metropolitan Toronto area for years and years to come. He would be preventing them from carrying out their normal plans for the future. He would be preventing them from carrying on natural industrial development, and housing development as the need arises, and so on. He would be putting priority on aggregates to the detriment of all other uses.

There are a few exceptions and those exceptions have been made public. In one case the Ministry of Agriculture and Food has said, in concert with the minister's new aggregate policy, that agricultural land used for aggregate extraction would have to be restored to its original productivity.

Let me suggest to the minister that the people who created that statement either had no understanding of the difficulty of achieving a restoration of that kind or perhaps made the statement knowing full well it was impossible to achieve a recreation of productivity. One cannot recreate a microclimate, one cannot recreate the water table relationships that existed before aggregate extraction, so such statements really do not have much foundation in fact.

I would say to the minister that the attempted imposition of these policies has aroused a distrust in the participation process. It has aroused very deep fears and in some cases resentment and anger.

To this date we do not have a new aggregate bill to accompany the new aggregate policy, and therefore we have no real way of knowing just how the two will dovetail in the future. But there are some fundamental concerns that I believe should be addressed in the new bill.

One, of course, is not only to recognize that we understand that aggregates are not evenly distributed all over the province but also to recognize that municipalities should not be expected to deliver more than their fair share of aggregates. The minister knows I have been told that we in Halton deliver 50 per cent of the aggregates from this small area into the metropolitan area.

Surely the minister through his legislation can ensure that Halton is not asked to do substantially more, as it would be asked to do with the designation of 18,000 acres. Surely the minister can ensure legislation so that the municipalities can maintain control over the location of pits and quarries. Surely that could be a fundamental in the legislation.

The bill that died before the 1981 election, Bill 175 as it was known, placed the final authority in the hands of the Minister of Natural Resources. It gave the minister unprecedented control over aggregates in the future. The danger in this is that while one minister may have the finest of intentions governments do not remain and ministers do not remain. People change, personnel change over the years—the present minister (Mr. Pope) replaced another one, the late James Auld, a very fine Minister of Natural Resources—and people's attitudes and thinking change.

It is therefore not legislatively sound to give a cabinet minister powers that usurp the traditional powers of municipalities. Municipalities have their own plans, they have their own direction that they need to progress in, and that need should not be interfered with in the major way this matter is being interfered in, especially through the application of policy.

4:30 p.m.

If the minister were to apply legislation, then this government and his ministry could stand or fall on that legislation, but we believe that government by policy is unacceptable. Policy can become a guideline, but to use the threat of not approving official plans, or to use other economic threats against municipalities if they do not accept policies, is cowardly, to say the least.

I suppose that politically it is a little more acceptable to the government, because it ends up not taking all the heat. The citizens of the riding of Halton-Burlington who are directly affected by future aggregate extraction do not subscribe to the notion of government by policy. They want government by legislation, because they want to know exactly where they will stand in the future.

A parallel situation could be referred to in terms of the flood plain mapping, an issue that has been discussed and raised in the past couple of days. That brings up an area of serious concern, because flood plain mapping is done by conservation authorities. We know that conservation authorities have no guidelines of process. They are kingdoms unto themselves. Their decisions on how they operate and what they consider to be their mandate are of their own choosing and their own creation.

Therefore, when flood plain mapping is being done in a particular area, one conservation authority will hold public meetings to discuss the future flood plain lines and another conservation authority will not. No guidelines are laid down to direct the conservation authorities as to their behaviour. They are only asked to subscribe to some government policy.

The result is that one set of flood plain guidelines will apply in one river valley and a completely different set will apply in another, although they are both supposed to originate from the same concept. That is because one conservation authority will have some public input and the management will undertake to take those views to the ministry when the final flood plain lines are being developed, while another conservation authority will ignore totally the idea of public input.

I may be open to criticism and I may be called not credible because I am not an engineer, but I suggest to the minister that some of the flood plain mapping is not done with accurate criteria. It is not done with the kind of competence that is needed in the flood plain. I speak from personal experience.

At present, 80 per cent of the land mass of my own farm is in the flood plain. The minister is here, and I suggest to him that the flood line passes through the second storey of my house. I say further that the house has been there since 1820 and during Hurricane Hazel there was no water in the basement of that house.

Perhaps some of the criteria are used and some of the flood plain mapping is applied by people who live in apartments in Toronto, who go downtown to their computers every day and never set foot on a flood plain from one year to the next, or who do not experience annual high water levels and so on.

Now, having said that—

Mr. Harris: Put in a turbine so you can generate electricity when the flood comes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order.

Mr. J. A. Reed: The honourable member suggests we might put a turbine in and use the flood waters. I will just tell him that we are about three years ahead of him now.

But in regard to preserving public safety, I have to go on record as supporting a reasoned application of flood plain lines. Certainly we cannot accept or tolerate a repeat of the devastation of Hurricane Hazel, and the flood plain guidelines are set up to prevent that. Presumably they are erring on the side of safety, and we will give them credit. But I suggest to the minister that the conservation authorities that are applying these flood plain lines must remain flexible; there must be a process of contact between the citizens who live in the flood plains and the government. If there is explanation to be made, it should be made.

I am often concerned that instead of explanations, the business of turning down an application for a building permit, for instance, very often is done in an atmosphere of intimidation rather than in an atmosphere of conciliation or of explanation or sometimes in an atmosphere of give and take. Very often it is too easy for a government bureaucrat simply to use an intimidating approach to those citizens who live in flood plain areas.

The reason it happens is that the ministry does not supply the kinds of guidelines to conservation authorities that tell them they have got to become involved in this reciprocal process where citizens and conservation authorities can sit down together through a process of reason and negotiation and come up with something understandable and solid.

That also goes with the necessity to be strong and strengthen the whole question of filling in flood plains. Filling in flood plains is one of the great sins of the past, which we hope has come to an end once and for all. It is one of the kinds of activities in flood plains that take the onus away from one land owner, or stop him from sharing in the rising of water, and throw the rising water on to the other land owners in the flood plain. There are areas of those controls that I find most acceptable and most supportable, but I suggest once again that it has to be a matter of reciprocity, of give and take and of understanding.

I have spoken on the subject of resource development before as the Energy critic, and I would like to refer the House to an article that appeared in the Toronto Star on April 25, entitled "Renewable Energy Use to Grow: Study." It says:

"Washington—The world's use of renewable energy will double by the year 2000, when the sun, wind and water will be supplying power equal to the amount of energy obtained from oil, a study predicts. The Worldwatch Institute forecasts a great future for all forms of renewable energy."

If anyone feels that renewable energy is not a natural resource issue, I have news, because it is a most basic natural resource issue. Just to give the government a few examples of what is happening in renewable energy utilization in the rest of the world, this article shows that in China there are 90,000 hydraulic power installations in operation, including 15,000 that are being installed at present, and that 11 per cent of the homes in Japan and 33 per cent in Israel have solar water heating. The Israeli total should hit 60 per cent by the mid-1980s.

California is leading a global breakthrough in harnessing wind power. In the past year, 1,000 wind machines have been hooked into the state's electric power grid and another 1,700 machines are planned for 1983. I could go on.

It seems ironic that the whole question of renewable energy has been put on the back burner by this government, probably because it has not achieved the high profile it did a couple of years ago when we had what was an apparent glut in the ability to deliver oil. I use that phrase advisedly, a glut in the ability to deliver. There is no such thing as a glut of oil in the world, there is only an inventory. It is just the ability to move it compared to the people who want to consume it.

I believe the president of the Ontario Energy Corp. has gone on public record as saying, "Be sure that this so-called glut and this depression in prices is temporary." It has been predicted that if the free market continues to prevail, and I hope it does in petroleum, certainly outside of Canada—it is not prevailing so much in Canada at the moment—it will result in what will be a perceived shortage in seven, eight or nine years.

In other words, we are going through cycles that were predicted by the Club of Rome, in its book The Limits to Growth, as far back as 1967. As the world's nonrenewable energies reduce in availability, become more expensive and so on, this cyclical glut and shortage will apply for many years to come. Therefore, it behooves any government wanting to participate in the development of renewable energy to use this time as a relief valve to get on with the job.

Instead, what we continue to have through the various ministries is only a token addressing of the problem. The Ministry of Natural Resources, after seven years of effort on behalf of this side of the House, has finally released a couple of power sites on long-term leases to private enterprise to restart small hydraulic power installations. One can understand why they are reluctant. It is so embarrassing to Ontario Hydro. It has to be embarrassing because that power can be produced more cheaply by the private sector and wholesaled into the grid at a profit when Ontario Hydro cannot even touch it—

Interjection.

Mr. J. A. Reed: That is true. I know—

Mr. Andrewes: What time of day?

Mr. J. A. Reed: I beg your pardon. I missed that.

Mr. Andrewes: What time of day do they buy the power?

The Acting Speaker: Please ignore the interjections and continue with your remarks.

Mr. J. A. Reed: The only buyer of electric power is Ontario Hydro, and it does not buy it at retail. It buys it at wholesale from these independent entrepreneurs, and it will not buy it on time of day right now. If the honourable member tells me we cannot store the energy, he does not understand the technology. He should know that some of Ontario Hydro's newer installations are what are called peaking stations. He should understand that certain things can be done with hydraulic power—

Interjection.

Mr. J. A. Reed: The Minister of Natural Resources has a long challenge ahead of him to get his ministry staff, his own people, enthusiastically on side to support this kind of resource development.

I ask the minister to look upon the whole application of this technology as an exercise in conservation, because that is precisely what it is. If we have 7,000, or some people say 14,000, megawatts of hydraulic power available to be developed and redeveloped in Ontario, I ask him to get on with the job.

It is going to be embarrassing to them, especially when the Darlington nuclear plant comes on line at a cost far exceeding the cost of restarting a lot of these smaller sites by private enterprise, but it is an evolution that has to come. It is an idea whose time is long overdue.

The minister knows that, and I am sure he agrees with that, but he has to get his own people on side. Whatever good intentions he may have personally, he has to make sure they are being delivered out on the firing line. To this date, that delivery is not universal in enthusiasm. The minister knows that, and I know that.

This brings us to the question of economic recovery in this province. For each of the initiative areas the government outlined in the speech from the throne, one can put after it, as one of the answers, resource development to stimulate business investment significantly over the next two years.

If one really wants to follow that signpost in the speech from the throne, the thing one has to do is to go back and look at the regulations of the Ministry of Natural Resources regarding some of the resource development areas and the way they are applied. One will find that in some cases they will be obstacles to the kind of progress that has to take place.

To double foreign trade over the next five years: What a commendable objective. Here, one can go directly into renewable energy development. I say to the Minister of Natural Resources, if the free enterprise system can put renewable energy—hydraulic power, solar power, wind power or whatever—on stream with Ontario-created technology, Ontario-improved technology and so on, then for goodness' sakes, we have something to sell to the rest of the world, we have something to sell to the Caribbean.

I happen to have had the pleasure of being in the Caribbean for a couple of weeks during the winter, and I saw the incredible potential for export sales and reciprocal trade; but until we have some technology that we are capable of exporting, we are not going to get anywhere. One can talk all one likes about high-tech industries, but these are not high-tech industries; they are medium-tech industries where we can show the way and lead the world. Until we do it ourselves, we cannot take it anywhere.

Increase the domestic market expansion: Once again, one can go back to resource development. The minister knows there is an incredible energy potential that is sitting wasting in northern Ontario at present, which with a little seed money and assistance from government could provide a substantial energy base for the market that is already here, a market where money is being expended to the tune of $11 billion or more a year for energy that we bring into this province from outside. The minister knows this, and we have talked about this many times before.

We say that in 1983 it perhaps does not appear to be politically sexy to talk about making liquid fuels from forest wastes. Perhaps it does not, because we are paying as low as 19.9 cents at the gas pumps now. But mark my words, that is temporary. That is a temporary blip on the whole petroleum scene that will come to an end. We have the opportunity to use that time to get our technology working and make it applicable to Ontario. We are not touching it; we are not doing a thing to increase the productivity and entrepreneurship of small and medium-sized businesses.

Once again we can go back to resource development and renewable energy. A good many of these energy technologies lend themselves completely to small and medium-sized businesses. They do not necessarily lend themselves to large, production-line businesses, especially at present.

We have studied the application of solar water heating in Ontario, and it is ironic to look at the way we did it. We put the study of solar water heating in the charge of Ontario Hydro, and the result was not too promising. If there ever was an instance of the turning of the fox into the chicken coop, that was it.

I know my friends on the left want to have Ontario Hydro's mandate expanded so that it includes lots of other forms of energy, at least according to the former member for York South.

Ontario Hydro's mandate has to be confined and it has to be confined to the thing that they have historically done best: the generation of electric power. These other ventures into new technologies for application in Ontario have to come under other wings. We cannot turn these things loose to an organization with as large a vested interest as Ontario Hydro. It is just—

Mr. Stokes: Confine it, something like Petro-Canada.

Mr. Martel: Touché.

Mr. J. A. Reed: Have it your way. Whatever you like.

Mr. Sweeney: Are the NDP against Petro-Canada now?

Mr. Martel: Not at all.

Mr. Stokes: We just want to know where he stands on it.

Mr. J. A. Reed: The honourable member brought up Petro-Canada, and I suppose nothing is out of order in this debate. We can talk about a federal issue if we like. If we want to talk about the oil business in Ontario, let us talk about Suncor. That is something that applies directly to Ontario, and I could talk the clock out on that exercise in idiocy undertaken with the opposition of the Treasurer of Ontario (Mr. F. S. Miller). There were four people privy to that purchase. One of them was opposed; he had to swallow the words he had spoken six weeks before in Quebec and come back here and justify that $650-million fiasco. That one has to go down in history as the largest ego trip the Premier and his henchmen have taken in a long time.

I do not think it matters much whether the price of oil goes up, down or sideways. We are never going to be able to look on Suncor as one of the moments when the government looked to the future with any kind of vision.

To digress back to the line I was working on here—

The Deputy Speaker: Digressing back to the throne speech.

Mr. J. A. Reed: —increasing innovation in all sectors of our economy, I suggested a number of years ago to the Minister of Energy (Mr. Welch), and the Minister of Natural Resources should be aware of this too, that we do have the opportunity to innovate if we will only seize upon it. We have literally billions of dollars' worth of assets sitting in Ontario which are not being effectively put to use.

Our concept of forest utilization is based on a combination essentially of the pulp and paper industry and the sawlog industry. We have continued to ignore the byproducts from those industries which have the capability of providing energy on a much larger scale than they provide at present.

I know that some of the pulp and paper industries have taken it upon themselves to utilize their own wastes, and they have done it very well. They have done it in spite of the apparent lack of co-operation, sometimes, from areas of government, or quasi-government. Ontario Hydro, which could be of great help in co-operating with the aspirations of some of the pulp and paper companies, is not. It is simply putting obstacles in the way, perhaps because it considers the generation of electric power, for instance, as competition.

I suggest to this government that such should not be the case if we are going to make progress. I believe Ontario Hydro has its own role to play in energy production in this province. It does not have the only role to play, nor does it have the only role to play in the generation of electricity, and should not be considered to have.

I say to the government that if Ontario Hydro, for instance, as the only purchaser of electricity from the private sector cannot pay enough for that electricity, then the private sector should be encouraged to go out into the marketplace and sell the power it can produce, because it knows its own cost. The real cost then would be boiled down to the ability of that entrepreneur to produce.

For goodness' sake, one cannot have a more free market than that. Perhaps that should bring reality back to this overexpanded utility so we could do it through innovation. We can do it through innovation and resource development. We have to get on with the job. We have to identify where the obstacles are, where they lie within the various ministries. Whether it is the Ministry of Energy, the Ministry of Natural Resources, or whatever, surely we can identify those obstacles, deal with them and move ahead.

I am concerned that the Ministry of Natural Resources has a protectionist instinct about it that often does not allow it, by virtue of its considered mandate, to move ahead. I think the minister would sympathize with me to a certain extent. It does not consider itself to be an organization of service to the people. In fact, the function of the ministry is changing. It is evolving, and it is evolving very quickly. It is evolving as we pay more and more attention to the need to develop resources in many different innovative ways than we have in the past.

Surely that should flag to the minister that he has to change the mandate of his ministry to a certain extent so it can serve the people rather than simply be the great arbiter that says no to every new idea that is brought forward.

It is unfortunate when that does happen. Very often reasons are not given for saying no and often, when reasons are given, they are quite debatable reasons. They are reasons that often do not have much foundation. I say to the minister that if we are going to move ahead there has to be a new joining of hands between the ministry and the private citizen. We cannot continue in this manner.

One of the specific items I would like to talk about before the hook comes out this afternoon has to do with the area of firefighting in the forest industry of Ontario. It has been suggested to me that the two water bombers which replaced the purchase of the now infamous Challenger jet are only about one sixth of the number necessary to be considered an effective fighting force for fire control in the forests of Ontario.

Perhaps this is a good time to put on record a question to the minister, which I hope he will answer in a future speech, about whether or not his ministry will participate in the new federal government budget program.

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Help bail out the feds.

Mr. J. A. Reed: Well, it is going to be a shared proposition, as the Minister of Natural Resources knows. If he is going to buy some water bombers, I wonder if he is going to buy some more of these.

It is ironic that the same minister rejected that very water bomber on at least two previous occasions. I have the correspondence in my files, which shows that those CL-215 water bombers were rejected as not being suitable for fighting forest fires in Ontario. One has to ask the question, and I think it is a reasonable question, why did he then decide not to proceed with the expenditure of $10 million for the Challenger jet but to proceed instead with the expenditure of $13 million for the purchase of two water bombers that had not been considered acceptable by his ministry.

I think perhaps we all know the answer. Politics caught up with him on that and he had to do something. It is probably evident that these CL-215s are pretty good aircraft, and maybe the ministry could use some more of them. The forest industry certainly says the ministry can use more of them, that we do need more if we are going to have an effective firefighting force over the forests of the province in the future.

Our province faces a lot of challenges in the resource sector. We will not make any progress until we recognize and accept the mistakes that have been made in the past and move on into a new future. It is the function of the critic of the official opposition to point out those failings and also to try to be constructive in his criticism so he can offer suggestions and help to the minister in order that he may move forward in a sensible and rational way.

I would suggest to him that the sooner he does, the sooner Ontario will embark on the economic recovery it needs and the sooner the north will embark on the economic recovery it needs so desperately. The minister must know, since he is from the good riding of Cochrane South, that of all of the basic demands in the north, the most important is to broaden the economic base so that people are not going to be victimized in the future, as they have been during this last recession, when one-industry towns closed up and people had to leave or go on unemployment insurance, welfare or whatever other option they had. To date this government has not paid enough attention to the north other than to its ability to provide some raw materials that come out of there.

There are so many opportunities, and we know mostly what they are. We need the political will to move ahead. If we do move ahead, sometimes haltingly, the Minister of Natural Resources knows he will get my support if he makes those forward moves. But if he continues simply to reflect the status quo, the minister will be criticized roundly in those areas as long as I remain Natural Resources critic.

So get on with the job. We have no place to go but up. The minister knows the government will get my support for all the positive moves I expect it to make as a result of this throne speech.

The Deputy Speaker: At this time I am very pleased to recognize the member for Sudbury East.

Mr. Martel: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope you will remain as pleased during my speech.

Let me say to my friend the member for Halton-Burlington that if the minister gets what he said as quickly as he gets a food terminal for Timmins, we are going to be a long time waiting.

I want to deal primarily and only with one issue at some considerable length. The first question I raised in this Legislature dealt with health and safety. I have since been involved with such issues as the sintering plant at Copper Cliff where several months ago we buried our 100th victim of cancer.

Along with my colleague the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren); the former leader of this party, Stephen Lewis; and Linda Jolley from the research staff of the New Democratic Party, I was significantly involved in that whole battle that ultimately led to Bill 70. Bill 70 is there, but I want to report that it is not working well.

First, let me say to my colleagues that I appreciate the time they are giving me in this debate because I am usurping a good deal of their time. I am grateful to them for the surrender of their time because I want to put on the record carefully and precisely what we witnessed during the past 17 or 18 months.

Let me begin, however, by acknowledging the assistance of a number of people. The report I am about to present is the culmination of about 18 months of intensive effort by many groups and individuals. It represents the first comprehensive study ever to be undertaken after the implementation of the Occupational Health and Safety Act, and I am glad to be able to publicly thank the following people:

The Canadian Union of Public Employees, which provided a major amount of organizational help for some months in working with various unions and communities; the Windsor occupational safety and health group, known as WOSH, which assisted us not only in Windsor at the hearings but in many other ways; Stan Gray, whom some of you know about, of the Hamilton District Labour Council, who organized the Hamilton hearings; the unions which made their halls available, provided meals and co-ordinated briefs both from their head offices and in the municipalities we visited; the unions who helped with the massive task of transcribing the tapes from our hearings; and all those groups and individuals who made presentations, both the unorganized and the organized;

My caucus colleagues who travelled with me: the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie), the member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Charlton), the member for Hamilton West (Mr. Allen), the member for Algoma (Mr. Wildman), the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren), the member for Scarborough West (Mr. R. F. Johnston), the member for Windsor-Riverside (Mr. Cooke), the member for Oshawa (Mr.

Breaugh), the member for Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden), Donald MacDonald, the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy), the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) and, in particular, the member for Lake Nipigon (Mr. Stokes) and the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Foulds), who took my place as chairman when I was incapacitated;

From our own staff, Rose Bahr, caucus special assistant, and her staff, who looked after all our complicated travel arrangements; Linda Jolley, whose reputation as an expert in the whole field of occupational health and safety and on the act itself proved to be well deserved. She shared her knowledge and gave advice to us in full measure.

Janis Sarra and Anne Wordsworth of our research staff not only travelled with the task force, but spent untold hours in preparation for the hearings and eventually in drafting the type of report I am about to present. They also carried out the vital job of confirming the facts—and we are attempting to do this very carefully—in all of the issues which were raised with us. Without their help this would and could not have been done.

Maria Lopez, Linda Mitchell, Sandra Ferguson and Carol Freeman contributed much time and effort in support work for this report; and Elizabeth Diehl, my assistant at Queen's Park, worked on the never-ending correspondence, the phone calls and the endless details for our visits. Finally, special thanks to the ad hoc committee of some 40 people from the field of labour and outside it who worked and encouraged our efforts on this endeavour.

Because of the facts which have emerged and the tremendous effort put forth by all, now it is my hope that the government will at last respond positively to our concerns and implement our recommendations, which will for the first time give the workers of Ontario the health and safety protection they desperately need.

The Occupational Health and Safety Act, 1978, came after a long battle by labour and the New Democratic Party. It came into existence in Ontario on October 1, 1979. After three years of experience with the act, the inadequacy of the legislation was becoming apparent to workers struggling to use the act to improve health and safety conditions in the work place.

Specific problems were presented to me, and as the occupational health and safety critic, I raised a number of these matters in the Legislature during the two sessions, September 1981 to March 1982. Each time an issue was raised, the Minister of Labour treated the particular case as an isolated example.

In order to examine in greater depth the failures of the Occupational Health and Safety Act and to gather information from the workers with first-hand experience in trying to make the act work, in the spring of 1982 the NDP set up a task force, which I had the honour to chair, to visit major industrial centres in the province. From September to November of 1982 the task force visited 10 cities and heard more than 100 briefs and personal accounts from trade unionists and unorganized workers.

The task force held hearings in Sudbury, Thunder Bay, Windsor, London, Kitchener, Hamilton, Peterborough, Toronto, St. Catharines and Ottawa. These hearings confirmed that the problems that were surfacing were part of a much deeper pattern of difficulties arising out of the interpretation and implementation of the act across the province. The hearings also found that there was widespread dissatisfaction with the Ministry of Labour's performance in applying and enforcing the act.

The cases, which the Ministry of Labour had portrayed in the Legislature as isolated incidents, in reality turned out to be an accurate reflection of the difficulties experienced in many work places. Not only does the act fail to provide workers with any explicit right to a work place free of hazard, it does not have any stated purpose.

In 1963 the International Labour Organization defined the objectives of occupational health as "the promotion and maintenance of the highest degree of physical, mental and social wellbeing of workers in all occupations." The Ontario act has no such objective. In this respect the act reflects the government's lack of commitment to a rigorous cleanup of the province's work places and has left workers vulnerable to the economic decisions of their employers.

Workers in every city gave detailed accounts of the difficulties they faced in making the internal responsibility system work as a means of resolving health and safety problems between management and workers. Ultimately, workers had to depend on the willingness of management to institute suggested reforms. There was widespread reluctance on the part of management to accept the interpretation of the act to protect workers. When faced with an uncooperative management, workers had far too little power to make their work places safe.

When the problems were severe enough, workers turned in frustration to the Ministry of Labour, which they often found unsympathetic and unwilling to act in response to legitimate concerns. Even when the act or the regulations clearly required management to undertake certain responsibilities, the Ministry of Labour would not use its legal clout to force the company's compliance. Clear violations of the act went unheeded by the ministry, often without so much as a slap on the wrist of the company. In the more severe and tragic cases, workers died or were seriously injured before action was taken to correct the problems.

In work places where the right to refuse to work in unsafe conditions was exercised, refusals were treated lightly by the ministry. Often the ministry did not even investigate the refusal immediately. Workers who became suspicious of chemicals being used in the plant tried to wrest information from the company on the toxic or the potentially hazardous nature of the substances. When information was given to workers, it was often incomplete, particularly in identifying the health effects of the chemicals on the workers. The difficulty in obtaining information compounded the difficulties for workers in identifying and raising specific health related issues in their plants.

The task force found that medical confidentiality does not exist in many of these plants across Ontario. The task force was repeatedly told that when company doctors or nurses examined their worker patients, the information was made readily available to management. Workers could not be sure that the information would not be used against them in their work with the company.

The recent regulations on designated substances and the provision for testing workers for symptoms of illness have created new threats to workers' rights to keep their medical problems and histories confidential. They have also sparked a new battle between workers and management to allow workers to select the doctors of their choice when medical examinations are required.

These are some of the more blatant failures of the Occupational Health and Safety Act. However, throughout the province, the task force found workers engaged in struggles to force management to establish a safe and healthy work place. Although there was a general recognition of the economic hardship caused by the recession and the resulting loss of jobs, there was never a suggestion that the fight to health and safety should be relaxed.

Although regulation of occupational health and safety has made some forward strides in the past few years, there is a growing danger of reversing the gain. Increased unemployment and the overall economic slump put pressure on government to respond by relaxing the stand on basic worker rights under corporate pressures. Diligence must be maintained to keep a forward movement since, in reality, the needless loss of one human life because of preventable occupational illness or accident is too heavy a premium. I would like to simply indicate that the latter statement came as a result of a quote from Mr. Ron Rowbottom, occupational health and safety co-ordinator, Simcoe Can Workers' Union Local 535.

We have one recommendation with respect to this first section I have been dealing with:

1. A purpose for the Occupational Health and Safety Act must be established, such as the International Labour Organization statement, which defines the objectives of occupational health as "the promotion and maintenance of the highest degree of physical, mental and social wellbeing of workers in all occupations." Our act contains none of that.

The area that caused the workers, I guess, the most difficulty and about which I want to go on at some length is the internal responsibility system. I would like to quote Colin Lambert, the national health officer for the Canadian Union of Public Employees. When he appeared before the task force in St. Catharines, he made the following statement. "The internal responsibility became the proclaimed panacea for all problems at the work site."

Although the internal responsibility system is not defined in the Occupational Health and Safety Act, the Ministry of Labour's intent was always to use the system as the basis of the implementation of the act. Yet the mechanics of the system and its implications have never been clearly articulated.

5:20 p.m.

The ministry's Guide to the Occupational Health and Safety Act describes the internal responsibility system in this way:

"Fundamental to the act is the concept that employers and workers must share responsibility for occupational health and safety and that both must actively seek to identify hazards and develop responses to protect workers. This internal responsibility system assumes assessment of the system itself by employers and workers through the appointment of health and safety committees and representatives and through regular inspections of the work place."

Under this system, the Ministry of Labour expects workers and management to co-operate in the work place and on the joint health and safety committees to clean up the hazards—rather idealistic.

However, the task force was told repeatedly that the internal responsibility system did not work. The imbalance of power between workers and management meant co-operation and information sharing often broke down to the detriment of workers' health and safety. As long as management enjoys a monopoly over final decisions to clean up the work place, health and safety conditions can never be improved to the satisfaction of workers.

The Ministry of Labour sees its own role as a facilitator to be called upon to assist in the resolution of health and safety problems that cannot be solved by the workers and management sitting down together.

The Ministry of Labour was reluctant to intervene and management could and often did ignore the concerns of workers. Workers viewed the internal responsibility system ultimately as a way in which the Ministry of Labour could avoid its own responsibilities as enforcer of the act.

Furthermore, broad provisions or specific gaps in the legislation allow the Ministry of Labour to avoid taking a position and create irreconcilable problems for the internal responsibility system.

"The Ministry of Labour pushes an internal responsibility system whereby the company and union solve their differences and problems by themselves. It sounds good on paper, but in reality it does not work all the time. The company always has the last word: 'No.'"

I quoted that from Don Fraser of the United Steelworkers of America, Local 1005, Hamilton.

In some work places, rights that workers have been guaranteed under the act have not been recognized and the companies involved are therefore acting in direct violation of the act itself. In other cases, failure of the act to set out specific workers' rights or failure of management to co-operate beyond the precise wording of the act has led to failure of the internal system of co-operation.

Let me give some examples: First, the establishment of the joint health and safety committees.

Section 8 of the Occupational Health and Safety Act establishes the principle that each work place with more than 20 employees must have a joint health and safety committee with equal representation from workers and management. Sounds relatively straightforward, does it not?

If the objectives of the internal responsibility system could be accomplished, the work of the health and safety committees would be fundamentally important in achieving internal co-operation to resolve health and safety problems. However, even in the establishment of the health and safety committees, the task force found direct violations of the legislated procedures. The task force also found that the way in which management disregarded the health and safety committees' concerns was the first major impediment to cleaning up the work place.

Office, retail and construction workers and workers in libraries, theatres and social organizations are specifically excluded from these provisions of the act. This has meant that where employees do negotiate voluntary joint health and safety committees, they do not have the statutory powers which, under the act, guarantee access to information or the right to regular committee meetings.

In work places of less than 20 workers, regardless of the work involved, there is no automatic right to joint health and safety committees. The task force was told repeatedly that the act should be amended to establish committees in all work places.

Where there are legal rights to committees, making these rights a reality is another matter. In a submission by United Automobile Workers Local 27 in London, representing more than 4,000 workers in 24 companies, Francis Perencsik spoke of the frequency with which worker representatives are appointed by management and therefore are management-oriented.

For example, the management of Proto Canada in London initially allowed the union to appoint only one worker health and safety representative on a committee, while the company appointed the rest of the worker representatives. Since subsection 8(5) of the act specifies that half of the joint committee will consist of workers chosen by their union or by fellow workers, management does not have the right to appoint worker representatives.

In another situation in Toronto, workers faced similar problems in choosing their own appointees to the health and safety committee. At Jas. F. Gillanders Co. Ltd., a store fixture manufacturer, the company had appointed two management members to the joint committee but would allow only one worker.

The United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 2679, spent months corresponding with management and the Ministry of Labour seeking to have an equal number. This right is guaranteed under subsection 8(5) of the act which states, "A committee shall consist of at least two persons of whom at least half shall be workers. . ."

In many work places, these minimum requirements of the act are adopted and two-member committees are put in place. It places the single worker in the untenable position of having to fight management alone for health and safety in the work place. The worker has no statutory right to assistance by fellow workers. The enlargement of such small committees was seen as a priority for health and safety committee members in this situation.

In terms of enforcement, there are no requirements to file with the Ministry of Labour the names of health and safety committee members. It means there is no central record of whether companies have set up joint health and safety committees or are meeting requirements of the act. Where committees are required, yet not set up, it is impossible for the internal responsibility system even to begin to work. This is particularly important in unorganized work places.

At Irwin Toy Ltd., for example, on Hanna Avenue in Toronto, where no union has yet been certified, workers have been exposed to methyl ethyl ketone, a toxic substance. Management reported to the Ministry of Labour that a joint health and safety committee was in place. However, according to the ministry's own report of May 26, 1982, the company had contravened subsections 8(5) and 8(10) of the act. The worker representatives on the committee had not been selected by the workers, and the company had never posted the names of the committee members. So much for the act.

Let me deal with a second problem workers encountered; that dealt with meetings. In practice, management often controls the health and safety committees by exerting its influence in those areas not clearly defined by the act: calling the meetings, setting the agenda, chairing the meetings and keeping the minutes. A code of practice for committees promised at the time of the enactment of the act has still not been developed. It takes a long time.

Minutes of joint health and safety committee meetings are a necessary record of complaints, problems and promised solutions to hazards, a vital part of the internal responsibility system. However, the act requires only that minutes of proceedings of committee meetings be kept.

The minutes are also supposed to be made available for examination by Ministry of Labour inspectors, but the task force was told that inspectors rarely use this record to identify ongoing hazards and violations.

5:30 p.m.

The act does not specify who will keep the minutes, whether the minutes need approval of both workers and management, or how disagreements will be resolved. The wide-open wording of the act has meant problems for workers. In the case of a health and safety committee meeting at Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd. in Peterborough, a version of the meeting prepared by John Ball of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, Local 524, and a health and safety committee member detailed a serious incident in the plant in which a worker was overcome by toluene fumes and rushed to hospital. According to Mr. Ball's evidence before the task force, management did not believe the worker's troubles were caused by the toluene fumes and would not accept the union's typed record of the minutes. It just chose to ignore them.

Another problem is that the minutes of the meetings do not correctly reflect the concerns of the committee. In St. Catharines, Bill Craine of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 1287, told the task force that controversial items have been either mentioned briefly or left out of the minutes prepared by the secretary of the committee, a management representative.

A third problem is the failure to resolve issues. The act is silent on resolution of problems through the joint health and safety committees. The result is that problems are often not resolved. There are no time limits or even requirements for management to act or respond. The committee can have access to information and identify hazards, but under the act it can only recommend improvements to the employer. From there, there is no requirement upon the employer to act on these recommendations.

Workers observed at the joint health and safety committee meetings management rarely raised issues of any significance in terms of health problems. Almost every substantial item addressed at these meetings was initiated by the workers. Since management has resources and authority to act upon the recommendations of the health and safety committee, if management does not support taking action the problem is not corrected.

Workers have stated that the ease of having a problem corrected is directly proportionate to the cost involved. It is relatively easy, for example, to have a yellow line painted on the floor, but impossible to force management to improve the ventilation in an area where it is badly needed. Witness the Wilco situation today. The internal responsibility system consistently breaks down when management will not voluntarily undertake improvements in the work place to eliminate hazards.

Since companies resist accepting the financial costs of improvements, the Ministry of Labour should then become the final arbiter in these disputes. Where it is obvious that the act or its regulations are violated or where "every precaution reasonable in the circumstances" under clause 14(2)(g) is not taken to protect employees, the onus should be on the Ministry of Labour to force management to make improvements in the work place.

At Raybestos Canada Inc. in Peterborough, the internal responsibility system broke down completely. In November 1982, the union, Steelworkers Local 5141, withdrew its members from the joint health and safety committee to protest management's refusal to take any action on the frequent accidents in the plant. According to former health and safety committee member Ray Collet, the numerous accidents included several amputations in an 18-month period. Even the Ministry of Labour inspector, in the past year, described the internal responsibility system at Raybestos as "poor." The union has set up its own health and safety system within the plant to keep up its vigilance.

A fourth problem is management's responsibilities. The Occupational Health and Safety Act, under sections 14 and 16, directs employers to appoint front-line supervisors who are knowledgeable and responsible for the health and safety of workers, to inform workers of hazards, to provide information on proper procedures and to "take every precaution reasonable in the circumstances for the protection of the worker." This is critical to the success of the internal responsibility system if workers and foremen on the shop floor are to resolve unsafe conditions. However, there is no test of competency for supervisors, and inspectors do not require supervisors to demonstrate that they are competent and responsible as defined under subsection 1(2) of the act.

Front-line supervisors, who receive the first complaint on a work refusal, often are not trained or knowledgeable on the rights of workers under the act. This has led to failure to notify the ministry, failure to correct hazards, and the intimidation of workers. At Allied Chemical Canada Ltd., Amherstburg, when two pipefitters refused unsafe work on August 21, 1982, the supervisor told them the act did not apply on Saturdays and refused to follow the procedure under the act. Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? The act does not apply on Saturdays. In some cases, front-line supervisors jeopardized their own health by doing work refused by the workers.

For the edification of members, let me put on the record a case study of what we learned at Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd. as a result of our task force. In late 1980, workers belonging to United Electrical Workers Local 537 noticed an unusually high number of their fellow workers had been diagnosed as having tumours. The workers, almost all of whom were women, worked in the small coil winding department of the CGE lamp works in Toronto. At the time, the department employed approximately 50 people.

The union brought this concern to the attention of the company in December 1980. The company doctor, Dr. Jack Richman, immediately notified the Ministry of Labour. The union also raised the issue at the next regularly scheduled meeting of the health and safety committee in January 1981. Dr. Richman indicated he would investigate and report back to the committee.

Over the next two years the union compiled a list of 24 of their fellow workers who reported to them that they had tumours, many of which were malignant. Of the 24 women, at least five died from cancer. In March 1981, Dr. Richman told the committee that "there was no abnormal incidence of cancer" and assured them that a written report would be presented soon.

For almost two years, the issue of the high incidence of cancer in the coil winding department remained on the agenda of the health and safety committee meetings. Workers repeatedly expressed concern at the delay in receiving Dr. Richman's report, and in April 1982 the minutes officially reflected the concern of the whole committee. However, because the workers on the committee had no right to compel the company doctor to produce the report, they were forced to wait until the company wished to answer their concerns.

Finally, after the local union presented this problem to the task force in September 1982, I confronted the minister in the Legislature. The company was forced by the ensuing publicity to agree to a proper epidemiological study. Dr.

Richman's report was finally given to the local president, Cathy Treacy, in October 1982, a month after her presentation to the task force.

This is very interesting: Contrary to Dr. Richman's statement to the health and safety committee in March 1981, the report revealed "a higher than expected incidence rate of gynaecological and breast cancer among the workers in the coil winding area." In company press releases of November 10, 1982, the company indicated the report had been completed in November 1981, 11 months before it was given to the workers.

The situation at CGE shows that the internal responsibility system as it exists only works when the company and the union are equally committed to making it work. Otherwise, management can ignore the concerns, even when the situation is as serious as the one I just commented on.

In this instance the Ministry of Labour was informed in December 1980 of a potentially serious situation, yet it took two full years for the union to receive vital information from the company and almost three years for a proper epidemiological study to be undertaken in this plant. Surely it must be said that both the company and the ministry have failed to make internal responsibility work.

With that in mind we decided that we had to make certain recommendations pertaining to the internal responsibility system. They are as follows:

2. The internal responsibility system must be redefined to ensure the right of every worker in Ontario to a healthy and safe work place. This right includes the worker's right to participate the right to inspect, the right to shut down any operation that is unsafe, the right to full wage and benefit protection as a result of any medical monitoring program or during any work loss or shutdown due to health and safety problems, the right to know, the right to refuse and the right to strict enforcement of the act by the Ministry of Labour. These rights must be entrenched in the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

3. The Occupational Health and Safety Act must be amended to cover all work places in Ontario under provincial jurisdiction.

4. All work places shall have the right to joint health and safety committees.

5. A code of practice for joint health and safety committees consistent with the principles of this report shall be immediately published.

This shall include the number of workers on joint committees, departmental representation and guidelines to ensure that both union and management agree to the agendas and minutes of meetings, and guaranteed access by all workers to the information. This code of practice would require workers and management to co-chair the joint committee. Work places of 10 or more employees will have a minimum of two workers on the joint health and safety committee. In work places of less than 10 employees the health and safety committee shall have a minimum of one worker.

6. Major employers shall have committees in each large department, the numbers of which would be determined by the code of practice.

7. On construction sites the union or, where there is no union, the workers shall designate one or more worker health and safety representatives to carry out inspection and investigation functions.

8. In work places other than construction, the union or workers, in selecting the workers on the joint health and safety committee, shall have the right to designate one or more worker health and safety representatives to carry out inspection and investigation functions.

9. No worker shall suffer a loss of wages or benefits for work loss or shutdown due to health and safety problems.

10. Worker health and safety committee members and representatives shall have the right to shut down an unsafe work operation.

11. Worker health and safety committee members or their representatives shall be protected from liability if they have acted in good faith.

12. The act shall require health and safety committees to meet a minimum of once a month or at the insistence of either party.

13. Health and safety committee members or representatives shall have the right to a complete work place inspection at least once a month or at their request.

14. The act shall include an arbiter to resolve unregulated issues upon which the joint committee cannot agree. Issues covered by legislation or regulation should be strictly enforced by the Ministry of Labour.

I now want to turn to the second problem, lack of enforcement. I think one of the most interesting quotes we came across during the entire tour was by Len Belford, Brian Demers and Gloria Puckerin, Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 503 in Ottawa. They made this very interesting statement:

"If the provincial police were to enforce the highway speed limits in the same manner as the Ministry of Labour enforces the Occupational Health and Safety Act, then the only thing on the highways doing less than 150 miles per hour would be a jogger."

That sums up nicely what people think of the enforcement by the Ministry of Labour on this. Although workers acknowledged that the act has been an important step forward in the struggle for a safe work place, the effectiveness of the act has been crippled by the Ministry of Labour's lack of enforcement.

Since the act does not provide any mechanism for resolving disputes between management and labour at the level of the health and safety committee, the Ministry of Labour must exercise its authority to enforce the act if workers are to be protected.

However, the Ministry of Labour has shown great reluctance to force companies to abide by the act. Consequently, the task force was presented with many startling examples of work places where hazards have been identified and remained outstanding since the introduction of the act.

By failing to enforce its own legislation, the Ministry of Labour has given a clear signal to industry that it does not have to fear the penalties set out by the act. This has resulted in bitterness and frustration on the part of workers who believed that the legislation would mean significant improvements in health and safety. Inspection of the work place was very significant for the workers, or should I say the lack of it?

The extent to which companies are cleaning up the work place under the act is monitored by the Ministry of Labour inspectors on regular tours. When the inspector visits a plant, he is accompanied by the designated worker health and safety committee member or a representative. The inspector subsequently writes his report on the problems observed, giving either recommendations or orders for remedying the problems.

Case after case presented to the task force showed that the inspectors would not force companies to comply with either the spirit or, in some instances, the letter of the law. This was the single most common complaint in submissions across the province.

Although clause 14(2)(g) of the act makes the employer responsible for taking "every precaution reasonable in the circumstances for the protection of a worker," inspectors would not take advantage of this broad language in the legislation to make recommendations or to write orders that would result in specific improvements. Instead, the inspectors arbitrarily limited their own ability to force the company to clean up the work place. They resorted to the most narrow and technical reading of the act and regulations to avoid writing orders or taking positions that would be unpopular with management.

For example, in the utilities department of Stelco Inc.'s Hilton works in Hamilton, two boiler operators refused to work because Stelco wanted to use an unqualified person to put one of the boilers in operation. The two experienced operators felt that that this constituted a dangerous situation for them. This is the intriguing part. Although Stelco's own rule calls for a qualified operator, the Ministry of Labour inspector called in would not uphold the work refusal because there was nothing in the act that covered this specific situation.

Testimony was presented to the task force which had raised doubts about the commitment of the ministry to enforce the act. In particular, the task force heard of the ministry's reluctance to issue orders on ventilation and hazardous substances.

A pattern emerged that clearly showed the ministry inspectors would refuse to require the company to clean up a work place by issuing orders which involved extensive costs. Not only were inspectors reluctant to write strict orders, they often overlooked outstanding hazards at the plant. Union representatives pointed out time and time again reports from the inspector that understated the gravity of certain problems in their plants or omitted significant issues raised by the health and safety committee members during the tour.

In many instances, after tours on which numerous safety violations had been pointed out, the inspector did not write down many of the outstanding hazards. Instead, the inspector would urge the union to work it out with management.

Inspectors also asked specifically at the end of each tour if there were any unresolved problems. If the union said there were, the inspector would ask whether the problems were being discussed at the health and safety committee meetings. The inspector would consider the problem resolved if the matter was before the health and safety committee. This would happen repeatedly even though the continuing appearance of certain problems on the agenda of the health and safety committee clearly showed they were not being resolved. In this way the inspectors absolved themselves of their obligations to ensure companies would find solutions to difficult problems.

5:50 p.m.

At Rheem Canada Inc., a water heater manufacturer in Hamilton, workers of United Steelworkers of America Local 6868 employed in an area where glass-lined water heaters are being made have been exposed for more than four years to free airborne crystalline silica many times above the exposure guideline accepted by the Ministry of Labour. The initial alarm was raised in 1979 at one of Rheem's first health and safety committee meetings shortly after the introduction of the new act. In spite of modifications to the silica spray booth, and after four years of discussions with the company and the Ministry of Labour, workers are still being exposed to the high silica levels. The most recent testing in September 1982 showed levels as high as nine times the guideline. In response to the highest levels detected in the last three years, the ministry has given the company yet another year to control silica. Great stuff!

Another common complaint heard by the task force was that even when inspectors did issue orders, the orders were often simply issued, reissued and reissued by the ministry after no action by the company, without charges ever being laid against chronic violators.

In fact, according to the Ministry of Labour's most recent annual report, 71,000 orders were issued from April 1, 1981, to March 31, 1982, in the industrial sector alone. Of the 71,000 orders, 8,500 were orders that were repeated. Even when the companies involved had to be told at least twice to comply with these 8,500 orders, the Ministry of Labour prosecuted only 82 cases.

Just to give members an example, Firestone Canada Inc. is a company that has been served with numerous repeat orders. Within a one-year period, from January 1981 to February 1982, 173 orders were issued at its Hamilton plant, including many repeat orders. On a tour the ministry inspector would find a guard missing on a particular machine and write an order for that machine. On his next visit the inspector would find another machine of the same type with the same problem and write a new order. Despite repeated violations of the same nature, the inspector has been reluctant either to close down a particular machine or to prosecute for breach of the act.

Many workers described inspectors in their regions as having an anti-labour bias, which they attributed to the Ministry of Labour's hiring practices. The number of ministry inspectors drawn from the ranks of management far outweighs the small number of inspectors coming from a labour background.

Although there was widespread dissatisfaction with individual inspectors, it was recognized that the inspectors were working within a framework of legal interpretations handed down by the Ministry of Labour's legal branch. These interpretations amount to an unpublished code of practice that has been used to reinterpret crucial sections of the act. The decisions of the inspectors, in accordance with the ministry's interpretations, have stripped away rights that workers believed they had under the act.

For example, in Sudbury, ambulance workers belonging to Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 2412 were disfranchised from a joint health and safety committee because "work place" was reinterpreted in July 1982 by the regional manager of the industrial health and safety branch to mean each separate dispatch centre. There are not the minimum 20 workers required by the act at any one of these dispatch centres, so section 8 of the act does not apply.

In the case of Wilco Canada Inc., which we heard about today, the Ministry of Labour refused to lay charges against the company in London, even though the company sent letters in December 1981 to the workers who were the most militant against the excessive lead levels in the plant. I will come back to this in a case study that I will present.

In some cases the workers were not healthy enough to return to work at lower lead exposure jobs; yet the letter said: "If you do not accept this transfer, we have no alternative but to terminate your services with our company. You would not become eligible for workmen's compensation or unemployment insurance benefits." This is a letter written by the company. But there is no intimidation—never.

The ministry excused its failure to take this action regarding these letters under section 24 of the act by explaining that the workers had not exercised their right to refuse work under section 23. To quote the minister's memorandum of July 29, 1982, "It is difficult to prosecute successfully under subsection 24(1) or subsection 14(2) when an employee does not exercise his right under subsection 23(3) of the act."

Workers found they had no protection from threatening letters unless they specifically invoked section 23 of the act. This interpretation runs directly counter to interpretations made by the Ontario Labour Relations Board. For example, in a July 23, 1980, decision in Gedraitis versus Adelaide Building Services, the OLRB determined "that provision [subsection 24(1)] does not, on its face, limit its protection or application to situations where a worker has refused to perform work." Then we get a new interpretation by the legal department which rules that out.

Another problem is the enforcement of designated substances. If the enforcement of the act itself has not been rigorous, when substances have been regulated under the act, the ministry has been even less vigilant in forcing companies to comply with the regulations.

The lead regulations have been in effect since August 1981; yet the legal obligation of companies using or storing lead to produce an assessment and a control program have been ignored by many companies, often in spite of repeated orders to observe the regulations.

At the time of the task force hearings in September and October, workers across the province, from Thunder Bay, where United Auto Workers members at Hawker Siddeley Canada Inc. complained that no lead assessment had been done, to Windsor, where workers at Windsor Bumper told the same story, companies were ignoring the new regulations. When assessments had been done, they were often inadequate, with the company ignoring obligations in the regulations such as their duty to consult on the assessments with the health and safety committees.

In the case of Dow Chemical Canada Inc. in Sarnia, a one-page vinyl chloride assessment was prepared by the company's manager of industrial hygiene. This assessment gave no information on the quantities being used or stored in and around the plant. The union did not accept the assessment and called in the Ministry of Labour.

Companies which have successfully stalled in completing their assessments are not forced to proceed with the introduction of control programs. Once there is an assessment, one would assume it would go on to a control program. That is not the case in Ontario.

At Westinghouse Canada Inc. in Hamilton, testing done in the transformer division revealed lead levels as high as 20 times the legal limit, demonstrating the urgent need to control lead levels in the paint shop. Despite two orders from the Ministry of Labour to produce a lead assessment and despite two orders to control lead exposures in the paint shop, Westinghouse did not comply with either directive for months until pressure from the union and the Legislature finally forced the Minister of Labour to intervene personally.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Tuesday, April 26, 1983

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner hour I was discussing the matter of Westinghouse Canada.

Mr. Boudria: Maybe you should repeat it.

Mr. Martel: I was thinking I might repeat the whole thing, but I want to be brief, so I will not. And I see the Speaker with his gavel out, so I will just continue from where I left off.

The intention of the control programs required under the regulations clearly is to force companies to keep hazardous substances at a regulated level by introducing engineering controls, work practices, hygiene practices and facilities.

Control programs, like assessments, require consultation with the joint health and safety committees. Again the role of the health and safety committee is limited to offering suggestions and recommendations. If there is a dispute, the committee has the right to call in an inspector. However, the union representatives lack the real power to ensure that their recommendations are incorporated in the final control program.

Consequently, company control programs often become solely programs of personal hygiene practices and protective equipment other than the adoption of engineering controls. Although this is contrary to the spirit of the regulations, the ministry has not acted to correct these abuses.

Because respirators and other protective devices cause considerable discomfort to employees, many workers take risks by not wearing them. Respirators also provide a false sense of security in cases where they are inadequate protection against the levels of some substances or the combination of certain substances.

For example, during an ammonia leak at the Inco Ltd. iron ore recovery plant in Sudbury on February 4, 1983, a worker was overcome by fumes. The Ministry of Labour's own assessment on February 8, 1983, showed that the worker's respirator was approved for up to 300 parts per million for ammonia and that this respirator would be ineffective in the concentrations of greater than 500 parts per million that the worker was exposed to during the leakage. Since the company did not sound the alarm to evacuate the building, the worker continued to work, confident that his respirator was protecting him. He soon afterward lost consciousness.

Another problem with this whole area is the penalties and fines. In the few cases where violations are recognized and charges are laid by the ministry, the fines and penalties are no incentive for employers to clean up the work place. Although the act provides for penalties of up to $25,000 or 12 months in jail or both, the average fine for a conviction under the Occupational Health and Safety Act has amounted to a little less than $2,000.

For example, John Joseph Royal, an 18-year-old employee of Ontario Gypsum Co. Ltd., died on September 23, 1981, by falling into a mixing vat of plastering compound. The crown was able to prove management was responsible for removing the guarding over the vat to speed up production, yet the company was fined only $1,500 and the owner $500. This case is a tragic example of the value placed on workers' lives, a grand total of $2,000.

In contrast to the general practice of levying small fines, a recent Court of Appeal decision upheld a relatively large fine of $12,000 against Cotton Felts Ltd., a small Toronto manufacturing company, in a case where a worker lost his arm cleaning a machine. The court's decision to uphold this fine has been viewed as a positive signal from the courts that fines should serve as a deterrent to employers who violate health and safety laws.

Although the Ministry of Labour is not responsible for the fines set by the judges of Ontario, many workers who have seen charges laid against employers for serious accidents or deaths in their plants did not believe the Ministry of Labour pursued the companies with the kind of thorough investigation likely to result in a serious prosecution and conviction.

After an explosion blinded employee Terry Ryan on November 19, 1979, in Westinghouse's transformer division of the Beach Road plant in Hamilton, ministry officials did a quick investigation clearing the company of any responsibility. Stan Gray, the United Electrical Local 504 health and safety representative in the plant, was dissatisfied with the ministry's treatment of the case and exercised his right under subsection 8(9) to conduct his own investigation of the accident. His lengthy report implicated the company in its handling of toluol, the flammable solvent that caused the explosion.

Because of his report, the ministry laid charges against the company. However, the charges, when they were laid, contained a number of errors, including the date of the accident. These errors would have resulted in the charge being thrown out of court if they had not been revised at the insistence of the union.

When the case finally reached the courts, it was repeatedly remanded. At the very point when union witnesses were about to give evidence, the ministry prosecutor negotiated an agreement with the company and all but one of the charges were dropped. The company pleaded guilty to a single charge and received a fine of $5,000. The man is blind as a result of that accident.

At National Steel Car in Hamilton a young worker, André Robillard, was severely burned in a flash fire at the plant. When the Ministry of Labour refused to lay charges even though an inspector was in the plant at the time of the accident, Mike Skinner, the chairman of the health and safety committee at the time, laid his own charges. The company was fined $20,000 on March 8, 1983, one of the highest fines levied under the Occupational Health and Safety Act. The members will note it was a worker who brought that charge.

I want to describe a case study indicating the minister's refusal really to get serious. It deals with Rothsay Concentrates, now a division of Maple Leaf Mills Ltd. Wayne McTaggart and Gary Wierts of Energy and Chemical Workers Union Local 39 are the health and safety committee members at Rothsay Concentrates in Moorefield, a company which produces high-protein feed meal. They have struggled with their company and the Ministry of Labour to get the Occupational Health and Safety Act enforced. Their submission to the London hearings illustrated the reluctance of the ministry to take action against chronic violators.

In January 1982 a worker believed he was instructed to climb into a feather pit and remove frozen feathers from a large beater. While he was working, the foreman, not realizing he was there, turned on the beater and the employee became entangled. He required more than 200 stitches, with deep gashes near his eye and jugular vein, and missed six weeks of work. The employer gave him a one-week suspension. A one-week suspension to the employee; is that not fine?

The Ministry of Labour inspector would not come to the accident because he did not consider it a "critical injury." Eight days after the accident, another worker exercised his right to refuse to enter the feather pit, because there was still no warning device attached to the starting system for the beater. When the inspector was called in, he initially sided with the company, suggesting to the worker it was an illegal work stoppage. Only after considerable protest by the union did the inspector retract his interpretation and issue stop work orders until the startup warning device for the feather pit was in place.

When the ministry finally did a full inspection of the plant on January 26, 1982, with the union health and safety committee representatives there, the resulting report was 17 pages of recommendations and 72 orders, including failure to put guardrails over cookers, vats and pits; failure to have functioning eye-wash fountains next to the chemicals; no startup warning devices on conveyor belts; and poor housekeeping in almost all parts of the plant, with grease, ice, parts of dead poultry and blood on the floors. During this inspection, the union pointed out hazards of 27,300-litre (6,000-gallon) chemical tanks that had been noted by the inspector since 1981; yet the inspector would not issue an order.

Two months later, the company wrote the ministry and said 31 of 72 orders had been complied with. The union protested that the company had misinformed the ministry on more than 20 of these. The union received no response to its complaints until I raised the matter in the Legislature. When the ministry finally inspected again, the inspector refused the union's request to inspect 53 of the outstanding violations. Continuing union protest leading to further inspections produced more orders. Yet the ministry refused to charge the company.

In March 1982 another employee was injured, this time by a tallow hose which improperly had hot steam injected into it to clear a blockage. Although it was serious enough that the worker missed a month of work, it took the company 16 days to notify the union of the accident—another contravention of the act. Again the ministry refused to charge the company. Despite continued protest by the workers, the union and the New Democratic Party, the ministry has laid no charges and has demonstrated its failure to enforce its own legislation.

With that in mind, we have come up with the following recommendations which we believe the minister must introduce into the legislation if workers are to have protection. These concern lack of enforcement:

15. There shall be time limits in which management must respond to recommendations of joint committees to clean up the work place, such time limits to be enforced by the ministry.

16. There must be strict enforcement of the act by the Ministry of Labour.

17. Enforcement by the ministry of the violations shall be immediate, as in the Highway Traffic Act.

18. Time limits shall be placed on all orders.

19. Time limits shall be introduced to ensure control programs are in place for designated substances.

20. Where there are reprisals taken by a company against a worker carrying out any responsibilities under the act, the Ministry of Labour shall prosecute the employer. This shall be done in addition to any action taken by the worker to the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

21. The OLRB shall be given power to provide costs to workers bringing complaints forward.

22. When companies send letters of compliance of orders to the Ministry of Labour, they shall first secure the signature of the union to ensure their validity.

23. A coroner's inquest shall be mandatory in all work place fatalities. Workers and their unions shall be automatically allowed standing.

24. The anti-labour bias of Ministry of Labour inspectors shall be addressed through better education and hiring procedures.

25. The Ministry of Labour shall publish all interpretations of the act and its regulations immediately upon making such interpretations.

I want to move on to some of the things that have to be changed and some of the problems confronting workers in another area; that is, the right to refuse dangerous work.

The right to refuse dangerous work, as it is described under section 23 of the act, is one of the most important rights awarded to workers under the act. Section 23 gives a worker facing a hazardous job the right to refuse dangerous work, the right to have the refusal investigated immediately and the right to have the investigation undertaken in the presence of a union representative or a health and safety representative. After the company's own investigation, any further dispute over whether the job is hazardous enough to justify a work stoppage is supposed to be resolved by calling in an inspector from the Ministry of Labour.

The task force heard evidence from workers that the strength of the right to refuse dangerous work, as provided by the act, has been undercut by the Ministry of Labour's practices in handling work refusals. Consequently, many workers are finding it is not to their advantage to refuse hazardous work.

On a temporary work project in Windsor, for example, members of CUPE Local 543 renovating an old courthouse, MacKenzie Hall, began to suspect that they were being exposed to asbestos. The building had not been inspected for asbestos, although later testing showed asbestos was indeed present; nor were any of the Ministry of Labour's guidelines for the removal of asbestos being properly observed.

In an attempt to force the city of Windsor to take proper precautions, one worker, Marc Blanchette, refused to work on three separate occasions. Mr. Blanchette first refused to work on November 3, 1982, unless he was provided with a proper mask and clothing. He was sent home by his superior. He and two co-workers who also refused returned to work when they were given protective equipment.

However, two days later it was felt that the project still was not being run according to the asbestos guidelines, and on November 5, 1982, Mr. Blanchette again refused to work. A Ministry of Labour inspector who happened to be touring the building at the time did not treat the incident as a work refusal, and management sent Mr. Blanchette home again.

A third work refusal came on November 19, 1982, when workers returned to find that the foreman did not have proper protective clothing or masks available. The supervisor told the employees that they were laid off and that the job was closed down. Despite three work refusals and two Ministry of Labour orders to follow the guidelines for the safe removal of asbestos, the renovation work was never carried out in a way that satisfied the union's understanding of the act and its regulations.

Here is another example. In Ottawa the task force was presented with an example of a situation where the Ministry of Labour would not co-operate with Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 1400 to protect the health of a worker who believed she was working under unsafe conditions. Employed by the Ottawa Board of Education, a female employee who operated duplicating machines was suffering headaches and other health problems from working in a closed room all day long. Although she did not exercise a formal work refusal, the woman had a doctor's certificate advising her to work fewer hours on the machines.

The assistance of the Ministry of Labour was requested when the board of education and the union could not resolve the problem. The inspector said it was an internal problem to be dealt with by the health and safety committee of the board in spite of the fact that a memo on the subject of spirit duplicators had been sent to the board by the Ministry of Education. The memo instructed the board to protect employees working on duplicators because liver damage could result from long-term exposure to methyl alcohol. The employee was subsequently shifted to another job, but she returned to her old job when the board replaced the duplicating machines with a photocopier.

The onus of refusal by workers in unsafe situations can also pit worker against worker. In a work refusal a steelworker at the Copper Cliff refinery in Sudbury would not work unsafely with uncapped tie rods coming out of the furnace. The refusal was at 5:30 a.m. on February 10, 1982. It took the inspector three hours to arrive. In the meantime, management sent all 10 workers in that production area home, even though they were not doing the same dangerous work. In situations such as this there is no guarantee that workers other than the worker who refused will receive lost wages because of production shutdowns from unsafe conditions.

The Ministry of Labour has been encouraging companies to treat work refusals as though an employee is merely informing the company that a hazardous condition exists. Under section 17 a worker is obliged to report an unsafe condition. Thus, many employees who refuse to work under conditions that jeopardize health find that their work refusals are not being treated as such by either the company or the Ministry of Labour. If the work refusal is treated as a report, the refusal does not have to be investigated with a health and safety representative, and the worker may never get a decision on the dangers of a particular job.

I would like to quote the president of the Hamilton area occupational health and safety committee, Hamilton and District Labour Council:

"Inspectors have been asserting that the rights workers have under section 23 can only be exercised if there is a prior use of their responsibility under article 17," which is to report. "But the refusal right in the act is absolute, not contingent. It seems the ministry is trying to rewrite the act because it is too favourable to the workers here. At any rate, it is certainly doing a service to the employers, allowing them to circumvent the procedures set up by legislation."

8:20 p.m.

Let me give another example. A work refusal on October 15, 1982, at Aerofin Corp. (Canada) Ltd. in Gananoque confirms this interpretation. A worker refused to use coal oil to spray a machine because it would fog up the room. Although the Ministry of Labour was called in, the ministry telephoned the plant manager. The plant manager then informed the ministry that no problem existed and it was not necessary for the ministry to come in. When the health and safety representative, Bill Bolton of United Electrical Workers Local 522, called the ministry to find out why an inspector had never been called, he was told that the problem came under section 17 and that the union should work it out with management. They did not even treat it as a work refusal.

The right to refuse work in unsafe conditions is the fundamental procedure of protection a worker requires. If a worker faces reprisals such as suspension, loss of pay, demotion or job loss for refusing unsafe work, there is no protection to that worker against those sorts of reprisals.

As representatives Bill Bolton and John Lameront of United Electrical Workers Local 522 said: "To us, a serious problem with the act is that a worker can still be suspended, downgraded, disciplined or lose wages for discussing or reporting an unsafe condition to the company workers have suffered penalties and even layoffs as a result." Although employers are legally prohibited from taking reprisals against workers under section 24 of the act, workers have found in reality that they are often penalized for taking a stand over health and safety issues.

Although the act prohibits the firing of workers who have refused to do dangerous work many workers have found themselves reassigned to menial or dirty jobs as a form of punishment. The fear of reprisals or penalties is so strong that many workers accept dangerous work although they know they should refuse. This is especially true for seasonal workers or workers still in their probationary periods who do not want to jeopardize their prospects for more permanent employment by offending their employers.

Let me give an example. In Ottawa, members of CUPE Local 503 are hired by the city of Ottawa every winter to keep the city's sidewalks free of snow. A fleet of Bombardier snow removal machines are used by the city. On at least nine occasions over the past two years, city workers have been overcome by carbon monoxide fumes as they sat in the cabs of the Bombs for up to 12 hours at a time clearing snow. All have gone to hospital for medical attention.

Despite the problems with nauseating fumes, workers would like to take out the Bombs because of fume problems do not declare formal work refusals; they do it anyway. Therefore, the mechanical problems causing the fumes have never been effectively repaired. The next worker offered the machine usually takes it out. Workers are not anxious to be regarded as troublemakers despite the fact that certain Bombs in the fleet have caused health problems for a number of operators. As I said, nine of them went to hospital.

Although section 24 was written to protect workers against reprisals, the procedures in the act for challenging reprisals leave few options. The union or the individual can take a case of reprisal to the Ontario Labour Relations Board or to arbitration. This places the onus on the worker to bring forward his or her own case and can result in a long and expensive procedure that falls on the worker. The Ontario Labour Relations Board has no authority to award costs to workers or unions for bringing the case forward, often making such actions financially prohibitive.

The Ministry of Labour may also prosecute the company that has taken reprisals. However, even if the ministry wins the case, there is no guarantee that a fired worker will get his job back. It is clear that the Ministry of Labour has not been aggressively challenging employers who act against an employee in violation of section 24. In fact, there has never been a conviction by the Ministry of Labour under this section.

The following case study illustrates this very clearly. Workers at the fabrication plant of Dresser Industries Inc. in Cambridge have found through experience that work refusals are no guarantee that unsafe work places will be cleaned up. The workers, members of United Steel Workers of America Local 5475, make valves, gauges, cranes and, until recently, drilling rigs.

In March 1982 an inspector noted 38 lost-time accidents in a three-month period and 45 accidents in another three-month period. One inspector noted this was far in excess of anything reasonable for this type of operation.

Workers began to exercise their right to refuse unsafe work as a means of cleaning up immediate dangers in the work place. Yet they found that even rights given to them under section 23 of the Occupational Health and Safety Act, such as the right to an investigation and the right to avoid wage losses due to work refusals, were not always respected.

In May 1981 a worker refused to move a heavy load by means of a pushbutton-controlled crane because the area he was to work in was hazardous. He followed the proper work refusal procedures, but Dresser management refused to investigate and rectify the problem. Instead, the company sent the worker home and docked his pay. It required Ministry of Labour intervention, at the union's request, to reinstate his lost wages. Even then, although the inspector agreed that section 23 had been contravened, no charges were laid or orders issued about this contravention.

In November 1981, in the same company, a worker refused to work inside a crate suspended by a wire five metres above the ground. There was no safety harness and no one safeguarding the controls on the plant floor while the worker was suspended. He was threatened by his supervisor with loss of wages and he returned to the hazardous work.

In March 1982, 38 workers in the same company refused to work in an excessively smoky area of the fabrication plant where tests by the Ministry of Labour had found welding fumes levels above the Ontario guidelines of five milligrams per cubic metre and where ventilation had been found inadequate. Again, instead of following procedures under the act, management suspended the workers, all 38, and sent letters on March 12, 1982, threatening dismissal if they were to exercise their legal right to refuse unsafe work again.

The union had to take the matter to the Ontario Labour Relations Board before the company reinstated the wages. The Ministry of Labour took no action to restore the wages and only "transmitted a message" to the company that it could not take away workers' statutory rights to refuse unsafe work. No punitive action was taken against the company for the letters threatening dismissal or for lost wages from the 38 work refusals.

In this case, workers were forced to use work refusal because of the complete breakdown of the joint health and safety committee. Yet even the work refusals did not guarantee that hazards in this plant, including concerns about welding fumes, carbon monoxide, noise, asbestos, zinc, lead, aluminum and isocyanates, were reduced. The ministry issued 82 orders in 1982 and 10 per cent of them were repeat violations. Yet the ministry never laid a charge. Days after the local made its submission to the task force, the fabrication plant was shut down and the workers indefinitely laid off.

With this in mind we can only make the following recommendations to the government through the Ministry of Labour.

26. Subsections 23(1) and (2) of the act shall be removed, thereby giving all workers the right to refuse unsafe work.

27. Workers shall be given the right to group work refusals.

28. The right to refuse shall be extended to include conditions causing stress, including assault or attempted assault.

29. Workers shall have the right to full wage and benefit protection as a result of any work loss or shutdown due to work refusals.

I want to move on to an area that caused great concern out there as we travelled. I entitled it "Workers' Right to Information." Let me quote from Don Fraser of the United Steel Workers of America, Stelco Local 1005:

"The more information and knowledge a worker has, the greater the chance of survival in the work place." That makes abundantly good sense.

The difficulties in acting effectively as a health and safety committee member or representative were compounded by the problems of acquiring accurate and useful information or, in many instances, acquiring any information at all. Let me just illustrate those.

Toxic substances: Thousands of chemicals are in constant use in the work place, yet very little information is available on the hazards of these chemicals. Although the act does include a provision that employers are obliged to provide information to assist in recognizing hazardous conditions, very little information is available on the hazards of these chemicals.

8:30 p.m.

Although the act does include a provision under clause 14(2)(a) that employers are obliged to provide information to assist in recognizing hazardous conditions, and committee members have a right to information under subclause 8(6)(d)(i), these sections have done little to ease the difficulties in obtaining information on hazardous substances.

The basic data available on any work place chemical is contained in material safety data sheets. These sheets are compiled by the suppliers of a chemical to provide employers with information on flammability and other hazards.

The law does not require employers to have safety data sheets; nor does the law require manufacturers to supply them. Where health and safety committee members or representatives tried to take advantage of their right to information under the act, they found the companies did not have the information, refused to release it or did not offer the information to their committees.

For example, in the case of International Harvester Truck Centre—now Bay City International Ltd.—in Hamilton, the workers requested material safety data sheets on the 48 questionable substances in use in their plant. The company then asked the union to list these substances and submit the list to them. The company claimed after several months delay that it did not know where to look for the information. The only information that the health and safety committee received was data sheets on half the substances, and these data sheets were provided by Du Pont Canada Inc. and CIL, two of the company's suppliers.

The onus of identifying hazards then fell squarely on the shoulders of the union or an aggressive health and safety representative or committee member. Hazards were only rarely identified by management or Ministry of Labour officials. However, even when material safety data sheets were available, these sheets were seriously limited in the kind of information they provided. Workers still needed to know the generic names, which were not given on these sheets, rather than trade names, if they wanted to search further for scientific studies on any controversial chemicals. They also needed to know the chemical constituents of any complex chemical so that chemical additives could be identified and the toxicity of any additive determined.

Because the material safety data sheets are provided by the manufacturers of the chemical, the most serious deficiency in this information is any suggestion of the damaging long-term effects on human health, particularly after repeated exposures.

At Canadian General Electric Canada Ltd. in Peterborough—and I am sure Mr. Speaker is aware of this area—the union found the kind of information presented in the material data sheets was so minimal it could not properly assess the real dangers to human health. Four workers from UE Local 524, working with a certain kind of cutting oil, broke out with very serious skin rashes. Because the material safety data sheet on the cutting oil was so vague, the workers, although they believed the rashes were caused by the cutting oil, did not have access to more explicit information that could confirm their suspicions.

In general, there was much better access to information where the chemicals were established as designated substances, such as lead and asbestos, for which we have regulations now. In the case of both substances, workers were more aware of where these chemicals were being used in the plant and the importance of protecting workers from excessive exposure to them. However, in spite of the well-recognized hazards of both these substances, the task force found instances where foremen and supervisors still downplayed the problems with these substances.

In Cambridge, where some employees of the city were working on brake linings while others were cutting asbestos pipe for sewers without any protection, a health and safety committee member found that these workers had not received information from management about the dangers of asbestos. For those of you who read the newspapers, just last week Dr. Jim Nethercott indicated a young man had died from grinding down brake shoes which contained asbestos, and he had no protective device.

In the case of the chemical industry, workers at Dow Chemical Canada Ltd. in Sarnia explained that because of the sheer number and complexity of the chemicals in use in their industry, inspectors from the Ministry of Labour did not always have the extensive knowledge necessary easily to identify chemical problems in their plants. This meant the majority of problems identified by the inspectors related more often to violations of safety procedures than to chemical hazards.

Representatives of ECWU Local 914 at Polysar and ECWU Local 672 at Dow in Sarnia felt that they had better access to information on the hazards of particular chemicals than most other plants in Ontario. They were supplied with data sheets by the companies and acted as unofficial clearing houses for workers anxious to obtain information on chemicals because some workers could not.

We also had an interesting presentation made when we were in Windsor documenting the community right to know. The task force also heard from several community representatives about the importance of uncovering information on toxic substances that would be available not only to workers, but to the community at large.

Because of the awesome number of toxic substances in use today, it was felt that the transportation, storage and use of chemicals which could be hazardous should be reported to city government as well as to the workers handling the chemicals. Peggy Simpson, a councillor for the city of Windsor, described her effort to draft a right to know bylaw for the city that would include requirements for disclosure on the toxicity of chemicals, on their transportation and storage, and on the need for a uniform labelling system.

Another problem in this area was the inappropriate testing and monitoring of toxic chemicals and substances. The task force was told repeatedly that one of the weaknesses of the act is the failure to guarantee that a designated health and safety committee member or representative will accompany an inspector from the Ministry of Labour or a company official while conditions in a plant are being monitored. Since either the company or the ministry make the decision about when and where to do the monitoring, the health and safety representatives feel that they must be present to observe the conditions under which the monitoring is conducted.

Many workers told the task force of situations in which inappropriate testing was done without their input. In Westinghouse Canada Inc. in Hamilton, the ministry tested for solvents in the paint shop without testing for paint particulates and lead at the same time. The ministry ignored the combination of hazards that workers would have been exposed to at the time the testing was done. Later on, the ministry chose to test for lead in the same department on a day when the type of paint being used in the company shop had the lowest lead content of any paint used by the company, rather than testing at a time when painters would have been exposed to very high lead levels under more representative conditions at the plant.

On another occasion in the same plant, in an area where welding fumes were very dense, the ministry tested in 1982 for carbon monoxide, even though carbon monoxide was not the major hazard from this type of welding. When their tests showed insignificant levels of carbon monoxide, the ministry, in spite of the obvious problem, gave the area a clean bill of health. Later tests showed welding fumes and oxides of nitrogen above the guidelines.

In Ottawa, in response to Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 503 complaints that fumes inside the cabs of snow plough machines were sending their workers to the hospital with nausea and headaches, on March 18, 1982, a Ministry of Labour inspector investigated only one machine by turning it on for 10 minutes and testing for carbon monoxide. No orders were written on the basis of the low level of carbon monoxide detected under these conditions. The inspector did not even test the machines that were causing the workers the most serious problems and ignored the fact that the problems developed after the employees had to sit in the cabs for shifts of up to 12 hours, not 10-minute intervals.

Workers also found that they were not properly informed of the company's communications with the ministry, particularly in the areas of testing and monitoring, and that they were not always given copies of reports on testing when they were done by either the company or the ministry.

In another case, American Can Canada Inc. in Simcoe was using silica-based dusting powder, which aroused the concern of the workers using the material. The company instituted procedures for handling the powder until testing could be done to determine the levels of silica. When the testing did not occur, union officials, trying to find out why, discovered that the company had written to the minister indicating it was no longer using the product. Although the company did stop using the powder temporarily for several weeks, the company began to use the product again. Ron Rowbottom of Simcoe Can Workers' Union Local 535, using this example, stressed the need for the union to be fully informed of all communication between the company and the Ministry of Labour.

The Ministry of Labour is obliged to post any order or report and give a copy to the committee under subsection 29(6) of the act. However, where samples are collected by ministry officials, there are often excessive periods of time before the results are conveyed to the union or workers.

Library workers in Sudbury, members of CUPE Local 207, waited eight months, from September 1981 to May 1982, for the results of a sample taken by an inspector showing 50 per cent chrysotile asbestos. Yet the report was dated shortly after the samples were taken.

Another problem is that of rights to information and investigation of accidents. When a death or critical injury occurs in a work place, the health and safety committee members or representatives are guaranteed the right to do their own investigation under the act, subsections 8(9) and 7(8). However, the definition of "critical injury" has often been used by management to bar unions from investigating accidents. Since the task force finished its hearings, a more detailed definition of "critical injury" has been published in the Ontario Gazette, and we appreciate that. It remains to be seen whether this will clear the way for workers to do important accident investigations.

For example, outside city workers in Sudbury, members of CUPE Local 6, were not allowed to investigate an accident where a sidewalk plough rolled over on a man, causing him to be off work for five months. Because the city of Sudbury did not concede that the accident was critical, the union was never notified nor allowed to investigate. Health and safety representatives repeatedly pointed out that only by doing their own investigations of these accidents can they determine the circumstances that resulted in the accident. They felt it was crucial to understand the conditions that contributed to any accident in order to avoid similar accidents. That makes sense. Although the act explicitly guarantees their right to accident reports—subsections 25(1) and 26(1)—many committee members and representatives reported that they were unable to obtain these reports without applying pressure to management.

I want to give members such an example in detail and what it means to workers. I want to deal with Ferranti-Packard Transformers Ltd. here in Toronto. In March 1980 five workers in the insulation department of Ferranti-Packard Transformers in Toronto refused to work. The workers, members of United Electrical Workers Local 525, had been unable to get information on a new insulating material called GPO-3 glastic board, which they were cutting and fitting for the inside of transformers. The workers had been experiencing severe headaches, loss of co-ordination and runny eyes. The inspector who investigated the five work refusals took a sample of GPO-3 glastic board for analysis. The inspector reported the testing was done; yet the union waited and waited for the results. On October 6, 1980, seven months later, Don McMillan, Local 525 president, sent a letter to the ministry's chief hygienist asking for the information promised.

The chief hygienist responded through management to the union that the sample had been tested but the results were confidential. Is that not magnificent? The results were confidential even if it was killing them. The plant health and safety committee then directed the management health and safety co-ordinator to try again to obtain the information. He was apparently turned down again. McMillan wrote another letter on December 16, 1980, requesting the information and never received an answer from the Ministry of Labour. The right given to worker health and safety committee members under the act to receive a copy of the report was not recognized.

Our task force received a copy of this confidential information in a brown envelope after we began to investigate the matter. The report was dated March 31, 1980, the same month as the sample was taken. It states that the GPO-3 glastic board contains styrene. Styrene is a highly toxic substance which in the short term irritates the eyes, nose, throat and skin. In the long term it can cause skin disease, exacerbate chronic respiratory disease and possibly impair the liver and kidneys.

When confronted in the Legislature by this failure to give access to important information to workers, the Minister of Labour produced a communication to the union president, stating that Mr. McMillan had received the information. Yet it was dated a full nine months after the union's initial request, even though the test results were available within 25 days of the sample being taken. In any case the union never received the communication and wrote the ministry again, saying the local had never had a response to its requests for information. Why would the ministry not respond to this letter if it had released the information?

Most important, the ministry would not give access to the information on the toxic substance and it did not take any responsibility to conduct air monitoring or to order the local ventilation needed to eliminate the hazard at the source. To date, the union has been left in the dark on these issues. I understand styrene is to become one of the substances that is going to be regulated.

With that in mind we make several recommendations to the Ministry of Labour with respect to workers' rights to information.

30. Health and safety committee members or representatives must be present when all testing or monitoring is done to ensure that proper procedures are being followed under representative working conditions.

31. Health and safety representatives shall have the right to do their own testing and monitoring and the right to bring in their own experts for the same purpose.

32. Health and safety representatives shall have the right to be notified and participate in any accident or safety or health-related investigation.

33. In addition to posting inspection orders, copies shall be given to the union representatives representing the workers.

34. Companies must forward copies of all monitoring reports and copies of all correspondence between them and the ministry to members of the health and safety committee in their union.

35. Labelling requirements shall be implemented on all chemicals in the work place so that the containers readily display chemical compositions and generic names, handling precautions and associated hazards.

36. Safety data sheets will be standardized with trade name, generic name, chemical composition and quantity, physical data, handling information, associated health hazards, including results of short-term, animal and epidemiological testing done.

37. The Ontario government shall ensure access to health and safety information, particularly material such as safety data sheets, inspectors' reports, assessment and control programs as required by the designated substance programs and testing reports.

38. Workers must have the right to generic names and chemical composition of substances in use in their work places. Workers shall have the right to all the information recommended in No. 33 on safety data sheets.

39. Companies shall have no right to market or use products if they will not give full disclosure of chemical use and file the information in a central registry. Information which companies call trade secrets, patent rights or proprietary rights shall not take precedence over health of workers.

40. A copy of the act, paid for by the employer, shall be given to every employee and supervisor and the act shall be made available in other languages.

41. There shall be a community right to information so people know what toxic chemicals are being used, stored or transported in their community.

We have another serious problem on which there was a whole royal commission just several years ago launched by the Ontario government with respect to medical confidentiality. It was called the Krever royal commission. This is being violated terribly. Let me quote from Teena Flood, whom my friend might know, of the United Electrical Workers Local 524, Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd., Peterborough. She says, "Medical monitoring is being substituted for work place monitoring. Workers are still being used as guinea pigs to detect work place chemical hazards."

Medical monitoring refers to the practice of gathering information on workers' health. This monitoring includes not only pre-employment physical examinations, but also more specialized examinations that reflect exposure of workers to toxic chemicals. Because of the sensitive issues involved in the practice of medical monitoring, such as confidentiality of medical records, many workers are insisting on strict agreements as a condition of their co-operation with monitoring programs.

CUPE Local 1348 in Windsor has referred its union's objections to pre-employment medical examinations required by the Essex County Board of Education to the Ontario Human Rights Commission. Prospective employees of the board have been asked questions related to the mental health of their families. The union has argued that such inquiries are not job-related considerations and are insulting to the dignity of the person undergoing the medical. The board has also been using its doctors for these examinations rather than allowing prospective employees to consult their own doctor.

Many workers also expressed concern that the confidentiality of medical records was not being respected. Medical monitoring was seen as a way in which employers could obtain information on workers that could later be used against them in claims before the Workers' Compensation Board.

As Ken Glassco of ECWU Local 914, of Polysar Ltd. in Sarnia said to us, "The use of extensive medical monitoring leaves no doubt in my mind that information of this type is not only used for monitoring the work place and our bodies, but could be used as a detriment to the wellbeing and health of the workers."

Where the company has its own doctor or nurse on staff, workers regard the medical staff as employees of the company, representing the interests of the company and not the workers.

Workers also felt the medical monitoring shifted attention from the hazards in the work place to the worker. In certain plants monitoring the workers was used as a substitute for monitoring the work place. This would result in companies removing individual workers from jobs involving the use of hazardous substances when the workers showed signs of damage, such as lead poisoning, instead of taking measures to remove the hazard.

In another situation, at Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd. in Peterborough, workers in an area of the plant where silver soldering was done were exposed to cadmium as a result of the soldering. According to health and safety committee member Teena Flood, these workers were monitored for cadmium in their blood. However, this test is of little or no value in indicating environmental exposure, which is really the culprit in the whole scene.

This is also consistent with the way in which employers respond to evidence of unacceptably high levels of toxic chemicals or physical hazards. As a substitute for proper controls, employers have, instead, engineered the workers to suit the environment by insisting on the use of personal protective equipment such as ear plugs or respirators, rather than cleaning up the problem.

Another section I want to deal with is the controls program. The regulations on designated substances, such as lead, provide another avenue for collecting information on the health of workers. The new regulations require, in addition to monitoring levels of these substances in the work place, that workers be tested for exposure to these chemicals. A key issue for workers in submitting to these monitoring programs is the question of who does the examination.

At Aerofin Corp. (Canada) Ltd. in Ganaoque, UE Local 522 has resisted the company's efforts to require workers to use the services of a doctor chosen by the company to monitor blood lead levels. The union has been successful in its efforts to allow workers to be tested by a doctor of their own choice. They are searching for a doctor who will keep their medical records confidential and who will simply advise the employer whether a worker is fit, fit with limitations or unfit, as the regulations require.

As part of the Ministry of Labour's interpretation of the act for use by its inspectors, the ministry's legal department has prepared a letter to a company which asked for an interpretation on the issue of who does the medical monitoring. This letter indicates the intention of the regulation was that the physician be a company physician. While the ministry is attempting to interpret the act in favour of companies, as John Lameront and Bill Bolton of UE local 522 told the task force: "Law is determined by what the act and regulations say, not what the authors may have intended. Nowhere do the act or the regulations say 'company physician.' They only say 'physician' or 'examining physician.'" The workers are having great difficulty with that.

I want to deal with workers' clinics in relation to all this. The best medical treatment we found for workers was the assessment, treatment and counselling which has been done by the Hamilton Workers Occupational Health Clinic. Doctors at the clinic not only have the specialized expertise to deal with occupational health and disease, but they also have provided medical care which serves the needs of the workers, not companies.

The clinic does not receive any provincial funding other than the medical claims processed through the Ontario health insurance plan. The bulk of the funding is from United Steelworkers Local 1005. In addition to treatment, the clinic has worked as an advocate, identifying hazards in the work place. In some cases, the clinic has been instrumental in having dangerous chemicals replaced by less toxic substances.

Despite the valuable work undertaken by the clinic, both the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Labour have been reluctant to fund worker-controlled clinics. Since they would provide both medical treatment and preventive care in a specialized way, these services are a desirable alternative to company doctors. We, therefore, make a number of recommendations with respect to medical monitoring.

42. Medical monitoring shall be voluntary, not mandatory.

43. Workers who choose to undergo medical testing have the right to a doctor of their choice.

44. Medical monitoring must be paid for by management.

45. Medical monitoring must be work-related.

46. All medical information must be kept strictly confidential unless a worker approves release of the information, and the information should not be used by the employer in any way that could affect the employee-employer relationship. General pre-hiring medical release forms now required by companies should be made illegal.

47. Independent occupational health clinics shall be established in every major industrial city and shall be funded collectively by employers. These clinics shall be worker-controlled.

I thank my colleagues for sending this fresh aqua over here.

I would like to turn next to the regulation of toxic substances and work place hazards. The Occupational Health and Safety Act sets out the framework and the general policy for health and safety in the work place. The regulations issued under the act were to provide the working tools for enforcement. There are two types of regulations: those covering particular sectors—industrial, construction and mining—and those covering toxic substances and other physical hazards.

Submissions to the task force raised concerns about the inadequacies of the regulations in place, the enforcement of the regulations and the failure of the government to move quickly enough to regulate in other areas.

There are currently over 25,000 known toxic substances in the work place and more than 500 new substances are introduced annually. Yet to date, the Ontario government has regulated only five designated substances: asbestos, mercury, lead, vinyl chloride and coke oven emissions. The government is in the process of designating silica, noise and isocyanates and has given notice of eight others to be regulated under part X, paragraph 41(2)(14) of the act.

Deficiencies in the regulation process: The regulation process is slow and complicated and ultimately fails to protect workers by not requiring the elimination of the hazard.

Essentially, the process takes place behind closed doors. While a single public meeting has been added towards the end of the designation process, the fact that the regulation is not provided before the meeting and the way in which the meeting is conducted essentially stifle any serious debate.

The ministry has no obligation to publish a written justification for the actual standards it sets, and while it is clear that cost-benefit considerations of some kind do enter into the deliberations, there has been no open discussion or justification for them.

The ministry argues that the Advisory Council on Occupational Health and Occupational Safety provides the format for the necessary review by all parties. However, its mandate does not include the evaluation or alteration of the actual levels set or any requirement in the standard. The result is that the regulatory system lacks accountability, to the detriment of workers' health.

In 1978-79 the Ministry of Labour issued a priority list of 52 biological and chemical substances and physical agents to be regulated; yet the ministry has fallen far behind on its proposed schedule to regulate many hazardous substances, despite pleas by the unions. The result is that thousands of substances used daily across the province are unregulated by any government legislation.

I want to deal with unregulated substances. Unregulated substances fall into two categories: those subject to exposure guidelines and those that have no guidelines for their use at all. For workers, even the guideline approach adopted by the ministry has often proved to offer little or no protection from harmful substances.

First, the guidelines are not enforceable by law. Second, the process by which the guidelines are set is both confusing and suspect.

Without the ability to enforce guidelines for so many substances, workers find the guidelines are almost useless. For instance, workers who had fought for protection against asbestos before it became a regulated substance appeared before the task force in Windsor. In this case, a Windsor Board of Education employee was exposed to asbestos and alleged that management had failed to inform him of the hazards or to provide him with personal protective equipment.

CUPE Local 27 charged the Windsor Board of Education under the Occupational Health and Safety Act. The judge ruled that since there were no asbestos regulations he could not judge whether the worker's health had been jeopardized. The decision of this case was a major setback for workers exposed to unregulated substances.

The implication for other workers is clear. With only five regulated substances, they are left with little protection from exposure to many toxic chemicals.

In a case presented to the task force, workers at Canadian Trailmobile Ltd. in Brantford had been exposed to isocyanates for more than 12 years. Testing over the past few years has shown exposure to the substance in the foam insulation spraying operation to be above the guideline of 0.02 parts per million set by the ministry.

Initially, workers were not given any protection from the substance. Then, under pressure from the union, the company provided personal protective equipment—described by the Ministry of Labour, by the way, as “primitive”—in the form of plastic bags over the workers' heads with an attached air hose. Workers suffered respiratory problems and one 1980 ministry test showed 10 of 35 workers with lung dysfunction abnormalities. Yet the company was not charged, nor is it likely to be charged because there is no regulation on isocyanates. In the absence of regulation, the company cannot be forced to provide either proper ventilation or, at the very least, effective personal protective equipment approved by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health. Only through the aggressive efforts of the UAW have gains been made in this area.

The other major problem with the guidelines is the way in which they are set. Submissions to the task force expressed many frustrations over the fact that the Ministry of Labour is changing the terms and method of measuring toxic substances in the work place. The result has been confusion for labour, management and even the ministry's own inspectors.

Under clause 20(8)f) of the act, intended for the control of toxic substances, the ministry issued in 1981 a discussion booklet called Exposure Criteria for Potentially Harmful Agents and Substances in the Workplace. The booklet, known as the yellow booklet, will form the basis for exposure levels of toxic substances. Yet it is overly complex and fails completely to identify those substances which are known or suspected carcinogens. The booklet assumes that there is an acceptable level of risk, an approach which implicitly acknowledges that workers will experience health effects at levels below those set out.

The real confusion comes when trying to determine exactly how the ministry intends to set guidelines or regulations. On the one hand, it seems to have reverted entirely to using “threshold limit values” produced by a private American group called the American Conference of Governmental and Industrial Hygienists while at the same time using the term “time-weighted average exposure limits” to describe its approach.

On the other hand, the ministry has introduced a new element of confusion by its method of measuring exposure limits. Rather than measuring substances over an eight-hour work day, as required when using TLVs, the ministry has moved to measuring them over a 40-hour work week. The result has been the mystification of data given to workers by ministry inspectors, doctors and hygienists and a lack of clear enforcement.

In his submission to the task force, Dr. Jaime Meuser of the Toronto Occupational Health Resource Committee criticized the ministry's introduction of time-weighted average exposure limits:

"The eight-hour TWA limit used by the ACGIH and other standard-setting agencies is difficult enough to enforce. The ministry has made enforcement even more difficult by opting for a 40-hour time-weighted average limit or criterion. . .

"Given that the burden of proof in prosecution for noncompliance lies with the crown, the ministry has saddled itself with the onerous task of collecting enough evidence to prove that the average exposure over the course of an entire week has exceeded the limit. It would be simpler to base exposure limits on the same principles that underlie the breathalyser principles of the Criminal Code. In these, evidence of noncompliance is strictly defined in terms of threshold reading."

The guidelines in the yellow booklet are under public review. But promises by the ministry to hold public meetings on the levels proposed in the booklet have been delayed for months, and even when they are held labour is not necessarily included. In the case of one meeting held on polychlorinated biphenyls, industry was notified but the Canadian Union of Public Employees, CUPE, whose Hydro workers are exposed to PCBs probably more than any other group, was not notified. Colin Lambert of CUPE, in his submission in St. Catharines, stated:

"It is just an illustration of the contempt and depth of anti-labour feeling of the occupational health branch. We suggest that they would not treat the International Nickels, the Stelcos, the Ontario Hydros or any of the employers in this province in a similar fashion." When workers have been asked to make presentations at meetings reviewing the guidelines in the discussion booklet they have had difficulty in obtaining or have been refused the supporting documentation commissioned by the Ministry of Labour.

In St. Catharines, a submission by United Auto Workers Local 199 gave further evidence of the ministry's dubious approach to reviewing the guidelines. In an appeal on an order resulting from a work refusal by a General Motors of Canada Ltd. worker in St. Catharines, the director of the ministry's occupational health branch ruled that the time-weighted average exposure level for PCBs should be 50 times the level proposed in the ministry's discussion booklet.

He set this level after receiving scientific evidence from General Motors and after carrying out a telephone survey of major industrial users of PCBs. The survey indicated the current levels of exposure in industry and what was reasonably achievable. The director then selected the highest of these levels, five times higher than the level of exposure achieved at the GM plant, and rescinded the original order against the company. So even where an exposure criterion is proposed, it is subject to reinterpretation by the ministry, based on what industry wants.

Let us look at another problem: noise. Despite the promise to regulate noise, the Ministry of Labour has never acted to curb workers' exposure to excessively high noise levels. As a result, hundreds of workers have been victimized by industrial deafness. I would just like to digress to tell the House that all the experts in this province will tell members that there should not be one person suffering noise-induced deafness in this province, not one, and we have them by the thousands.

According to testimony presented to the task force by John Lennie from United Steel Workers of America Local 1005, even one case of industrial deafness is one case too many since industrial deafness is a totally preventable problem. Although the Ministry of Labour has considered setting 90 decibels over an eight-hour period as the exposure limit, Mr. Lennie argued that even much lower levels could cause problems for workers. Many workers complained that no attempt was made to limit the noise in their plants. Instead, workers were forced to wear ear plugs or muffs to protect their hearing, a practice which can cause infections for many workers.

Even though noise could be successfully engineered to a minimum, there was no attempt by companies to use techniques such as spreading machines out over a larger area or using building materials to absorb sound. For example, in a new spike mill at Stelco's Hilton works where noise could have been engineered down to acceptable levels, the noise in the new mill consistently registered over 100 decibels, a level bound to damage the hearing of workers in the plant.

I want to turn to another problem on my list: cancer. I want to quote Don McMillan of United Electrical Workers Local 525, Toronto: "When it comes to a carcinogen there is no 'socially acceptable risk,' as the Minister of Labour would have us believe. We are tired of their body counts." As I said this afternoon, just recently in Sudbury we buried the 100th man from the sintering plant. There is no level—and without government interference it is going to continue.

There are 111 known human carcinogens, according to the International Agency for Research on Cancer, and a further 100 suspected carcinogens based on animal tests. Yet of the designated substance regulations, only three regulate cancer-causing agents in Ontario. Where there are regulations, they do not advocate substituting less dangerous substances for cancer-causing chemicals.

Workers continue to be exposed to dozens of cancer-causing substances, about which they have no information because of trade secrets. Workers have no protection because these substances are not regulated. They have no choice but to work because they need their jobs.

Heather Webster of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers' Union told the task force that most textile workers are not aware that the benzidine dyes they commonly use are a leading cause of bladder cancer. The textile workers have unsuccessfully tried to get the minister to regulate benzidine and to require substitution of less hazardous chemicals.

The advisory council on occupational health and occupational safety recently has proposed a cancer policy for Ontario. While the requirement for premarket testing of any new chemical and the testing of all chemicals now in use is essential for the protection of workers, the notion of setting acceptable levels for carcinogens is unacceptable. There are no acceptable levels. Just as in the designated substance regulations, workers in Ontario are denied the right to an open justification of safe levels.

The issues at stake are basic human values. Workers have a fundamental right to participate in the decision and to have the decision justified to them. To move the decision into the realm where only scientists and economists can participate is fundamentally undemocratic. It also, by the way, jeopardizes health.

Those making submissions to the task force demanded clearly that the government require premarket testing of all new chemicals. Michael Hutsulak of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners Local 2679 urged that the government clearly prohibit the introduction of any new carcinogen into the work place.

Less dangerous chemicals should be required to be substituted for cancer-causing substances wherever possible. Independent short and long-term animal testing must be undertaken instead of the current testing by manufacturers who stand to profit. Chemicals now in the work place should be categorized and workers should have full access to that information. Most important, there needs to be an immediate generic cancer regulation that protects workers against known carcinogens until such time as they are fully regulated.

Labour has presented an alternative regulatory strategy for the testing, classification and removal or control of all toxic substances, physical agents or work processes. Fundamental to their approach is the assumption that all chemicals and physical agents are guilty until proven innocent through independent testing.

Each employer should be required to provide a written inventory of all chemicals, physical agents and work processes, complete with chemical formulations, generic names, amounts used and workers exposed, to the Ministry of Labour and to be posted in the work place to ensure that every worker has the right to know exactly what he or she is exposed to at work. From a set date, each employer would need to notify the ministry and its workers of any intention to introduce a new chemical agent or work process and fulfil all of the testing requirements and control measures before the substance is introduced.

All new chemicals would have to be thoroughly tested in short-term and long-term animal testing and then classified as to their potential carcinogenicity before they are allowed into the work place. Where new chemicals are found to produce positive results in any of the tests, they would be classified as confirmed or suspected carcinogens and would not be allowed to be introduced into any work place. All chemicals currently in use should be thoroughly tested and classified within five years, and any chemical found to be cancer causing in humans, or suspected of causing cancer in animals as a result of short-term testing, would be immediately controlled to no detectable level until such time as a safely tested substitute is available.

All testing would be carried out by independent testing facilities or by approved international agencies and the cost must be borne by those employers or groups of employers who wish to use the substance.

Overseeing this approach would be a permanent committee comprised of a majority of labour representatives who would approve all the testing requirements, the classification system and any exemptions to the elimination or control strategy. A labour majority can assure that decisions are made by those who assume the most risk.

A generic approach to the testing, classification and elimination of cancer-causing agents in our work place provides an automatic system which would avoid the time-consuming process that the designation of individual substances involves. There are no lengthy debates about the extremely controversial and value-laden approach of risk assessment, cost-benefit analysis or the establishment of what some call "acceptable levels of risk." There is just no debate about how much cancer is too much, since the purpose of the regulatory exercise is surely to prevent all cancer in the work place.

I want to deal also in a similar vein with the reproductive hazards, and I want to quote Shelly Acheson of the Ontario Federation of Labour women's committee.

"By failing to identify and control our exposure to hazardous work place conditions, we not only risk our own health but we are gambling with the health of future generations."

The National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, NIOSH, has identified 1,800 chemicals associated in one or more studies with reproductive abnormalities which affect workers' ability to have healthy children. In its submission to the task force, the Ontario Federation of Labour women's committee expressed great concern over the thousands of other chemicals, processes and conditions of work which may pose dangers to reproductive health but which are completely unknown.

Shelly Acheson told the task force that the Ontario government's policy on reproductive hazards excludes women from employment in higher paid industrial jobs. For example, the lead regulation requires male workers to be removed from exposure at 0.70 milligrams per litre of blood lead levels. Men are deemed fit for exposure and must return to work when their blood lead count drops below 0.5 milligrams per litre. Yet women capable of bearing children are required to be removed at 0.4 milligrams per litre, and if a woman is pregnant she is to be removed immediately.

These measures—removing the worker instead of the hazard—serve to exclude women from employment in higher paid industrial jobs. They also penalize men by exposing them to greater risks of reproductive and blood damage. The American standard removes both men and women from exposure at blood lead levels of 0.4 milligrams per litre, a level that workers in Ontario have demanded as a first step. However, workers agreed the long-term goal should be to eliminate exposure for all workers to substances such as lead.

Genetic screening programs are another tactic of industry to hire "healthy workers" instead of cleaning up the work place. Evidence of this in Ontario is hard to find, but the Institute of Industrial Relations in California has published evidence that Dow Chemical Co. in Texas has for 10 years conducted pre-employment testing and blood analysis to screen out workers with genetic damage or a chromosomal susceptibility to damage. Remove of "high risk" workers is no substitute to cleaning up the work place, and the Ontario government has not investigated employment and medical monitoring procedures to ensure this is not happening.

Just as the government needs to move immediately to identify carcinogens and legislate a generic regulation, it also needs to test for the other harmful effects of chemicals. This would include a chemical's ability to cause birth defects or genetic changes. Generic regulations are needed for all substances that can cause reproductive damage as a stopgap measure to protect workers and their children.

In our report we make a number of recommendations in this area.

48. Every effort must be made to reach a "no exposure" level on any substance not proven 100 per cent safe. The burden of proof that there are no adverse health effects shall rest with the manufacturer.

49. There must be premarket testing of all chemicals and testing of all chemicals on market.

50. Current guidelines for limits of exposure that are being regulated shall be considered a minimum requirement, with the goal to be reducing the exposure to zero.

9:20 p.m.

51. We support the Ontario Federation of Labour's cancer policy paper, including the following: premarket testing and classification of new chemicals and of all chemicals currently in use; those classified as carcinogens or potential carcinogens by short-term or animal tests should be removed from the work place and replaced with safer products. Until such time as this removal is possible, companies and employers shall decrease exposure to no detectable level.

52. There must be a generic cancer regulation to protect workers against exposure to any carcinogen.

53. There must be a generic regulation to protect workers against reproductive hazards.

54. The government must move quickly to introduce the long-promised regulation for health care and education sectors.

I want to deal with worker education as a problem we encountered. I want to quote David Christopherson of United Auto Workers Local 525, Hamilton:

"We see a world of difference in the plants where the act has been studied and an attempt made to enforce it and those plants where workers are struggling along, not even aware of their rights on the job."

The Occupational Health and Safety Act clearly places the responsibility for carrying out key provisions of the act such as inspecting the work place, identifying hazards and investigating accidents on the shoulders of the workers. However, the act makes no provision to ensure that workers are properly informed of their rights and responsibilities as described in the act.

Clause 17(1)(a) states that a worker shall work in compliance with the provisions of the act and regulations. Yet the only guarantee that a worker will have access to the act is the provision under clause 14(2)(h) which requires companies to post a copy of the act in every work place.

Even this guarantee has not been met by employers such as Windsor Bumper, where at the time of the task force hearings the company still had not posted a copy of the act, three years after its introduction, "on any wall in the plant" that the workers could find. In another case that illustrates the difficulties workers face in learning the act, Stelco provided only one copy for over 300 workers in part of their massive Hilton works operation.

Many workers paid tribute to the Ontario Federation of Labour for its highly successful training courses which the majority of health and safety committee members and representatives appearing before the task force had taken. The OFL's 30-hour certification program has been a key factor in making workers aware of their rights and in teaching them how to use the act effectively in their work place. Because the course is taught by health and safety representatives who have taken a specialized teaching course, also run by the OFL, and who volunteer their time to teach, a large number of workers have had access to valuable training.

However, despite its success, the OFL's training program does not have guaranteed funding and operates from year to year by applying for provincial lottery funds and a Ministry of Labour grant. On a minimal budget of $1.3 million for the last three years, the OFL has trained more than 4,000 students.

In contrast—and you will appreciate this, Mr. Speaker—the well-funded training programs of the nine accident prevention and safety associations were not regarded as useful by workers. The accident prevention and safety associations' educational programs are funded out of the Workers' Compensation Board assessment of companies operating in the province and received in 1982 over $27 million. Compare $1.3 million to the OFL for three years on an ad hoc basis and $27 million in one year alone to the accident prevention and safety associations. It boggles the mind, to say the least.

Workers appearing before the task force described the associations' courses as management-oriented programs which emphasize the carelessness of workers as the cause of accidents. If members do not believe me, I would ask them to look at any ad run by the accident prevention and safety associations on television on any given night and they will see that the workers are dumb slobs who manage to get hurt. Just look at them. I ask my colleagues to look at them. They are deplorable.

Most workers did not feel those courses offered by the accident prevention and safety associations made any contribution to their knowledge of the act.

Many workers who have been trained in health and safety by the Ontario Federation of Labour have returned to their plants to find that management, supervisors and even their fellow employees do not know either their responsibilities or their rights under the act. This has led to confrontations between management and health and safety committee members and representatives, trying to establish such rights as the right to refuse dangerous work or the right to investigate accidents, and foremen who either do not understand or who do not want to recognize their obligations under the act.

Many examples were cited to the task force of violations of the act; for example, foremen who do not call in the health and safety representative or the ministry where a worker has exercised his right to refuse to work under unsafe conditions. There are foremen who violate the act by ordering other workers to substitute for a worker who has refused a dangerous job. That is contrary to the act.

At Union Carbide in Welland, where workers are represented by UE Local 523, a worker's right under subsection 23(4) to call in a health and safety representative or committee member to investigate a work refusal was challenged by management representatives who apparently did not know the procedures set out under the act. When an employee refused to use an air hammer under conditions he considered unsafe, the foreman challenged the worker's right to have the health and safety representative called in. The issue was resolved only because of the persistence of the health and safety committee member who knew the act and who threatened to call the Ministry of Labour if the foreman did not co-operate.

Several submissions also raised the need for education of immigrant workers in their first language. Heather Webster of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union spoke at the task force hearing in Toronto of the difficulties that textile workers, many of them immigrant women, face in understanding their rights in the work place because of language problems.

The Ministry of Labour has not produced copies of the act in any language other than French or English, and there are virtually no health and safety courses in major languages such as Italian, Portuguese, Chinese or Greek.

Workers' knowledge of health and safety and their rights under the act should be developed not only through special training courses, but should also be an integrated part of the provincial education system. Teach it where it counts, and that is when they are young.

We make some recommendations with respect to worker education.

55. The act shall ensure that all union health and safety representatives complete the Ontario Federation of Labour's certificate program within a specified time of their election or appointment to a health and safety committee.

56. Education of all workers will be undertaken with the employer paying lost-time wages and shall be available in the language spoken in the work place.

57. The Ministry of Labour must ensure a system of training for supervisors, including a requirement to certify competence as required under the act.

58. Mandatory health and safety training is urged for the public school system for all students using a curriculum approved by representatives of labour and management.

59. An amount of money equivalent to the amount currently allocated to the accident prevention and safety associations shall be given to a worker health and safety association run by the OFL to train workers, both organized and unorganized.

I want to deal with those who are not included in the act, the exclusions, because they are in difficulty.

Let me quote from a home worker in Toronto dealing with fabrics: "The most difficult fabrics are the velours. The nap comes off and gets all over everything in the house and the air is filled with it. The dust from the fabric is very fine; the consistency of flour. If I am sewing with velour fabric, my nose begins to run blue. My doctor says it's no good for me to sew this material, even though I am taking allergy shots, but I need the money. Now I usually tie a handkerchief mask over my nose and mouth when I am sewing."

This statement, quoted in a submission to the task force, exemplifies the health problems confronted by workers excluded from the act. These workers, including farm workers, home workers and teachers, have absolutely no legal protection against hazards in the work place.

Farm workers: Mutale Chanda of the Canadian Farmworkers Union told the task force of serious health problems facing the 50,000 full-time and 100,000 seasonal farm workers in Ontario. Farm workers face increasing hazards from exposure to pesticides sprayed on vegetables and fruits. I do not have to remind the members of the dramatic case we heard about in Toronto during the winter and the operations to try to save that man's life.

9:30 p.m.

Yet those workers have no right of access to information on the health effect of pesticides or on the proper handling procedures. Women tobacco pickers experiencing numbness in the hands complained to the Ministry of Labour and were told that the ministry had no mandate to investigate pesticides. That is a sad commentary on Ontario in 1983.

Other legislative restrictions prohibiting the organizing of farm workers into unions mean that farm workers cannot even negotiate health and safety protection into contracts, nor can they be protected by a union.

In an increasingly automated industry accidents are becoming more commonplace. At Wellington Mushrooms Ltd. in Picton, the mushroom farm is an assembly-line operation, and work is performed indoors year-round. Yet the Ontario Labour Relations Board ruled in 1980 that the operation was still farm work since the workers handled soil in the farm warehouse.

Gary Cwitco, representing the health and safety committee of the Labour Council of Metropolitan Toronto, spoke of the exclusion from the act of farm workers and other workers. He told the task force of assurances by the Ministry of Labour at the time the Occupational Health and Safety Act was passed that farm workers would be included.

It was recognized that farm work is one of the most hazardous occupations in this province—just look at the Workers' Compensation Board statistics and you will see. We were assured by the ministry that it was just a matter of time until the regulations were developed to include farm workers.

Well, it has been four years and it still has not happened, and that needs to be changed. When you have sectors of the economy excluded from the law, that certainly does not allow workers to have equality in the law. Cwitco recommended that there should be no categories of workers excluded by the law.

Let me deal with teachers for a moment. Teachers and their representative federations were initially excluded from the legislation at their own request, yet many found they had abdicated rights that were necessary to their good health in the work place. In several cities, teachers made submissions to the task force expressing concern that they had been excluded.

In Toronto, the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario, representing 30,000 elementary teachers, outlined their three-year struggle since the act's inception to be brought under the Occupational Health and Safety Act. Hazards faced by teachers include exposure to communicable diseases such as lice, exposure to poor ventilation and exposure to toxic substances in art rooms, science rooms, industrial shops and duplication areas.

The Ontario Public School Men Teachers' Federation raised, among other issues, stress-related illnesses from increased class sizes and the changing nature of education—for example, mandatory special education. To quote: "Heart disease, ulcers and nervous breakdowns are three of the most common symptoms (of stress). Over the last five years the incidence of members suffering emotional breakdown has increased by about 25 per cent each year."

Almost every submission made to the task force by teachers raised the unknown dangers of work with video display terminals, which are increasingly common in the education system.

Home workers, people who do their work at home, are also excluded from the act. In a submission to the Toronto task force hearings, Laura Johnson from the department of sociology at the University of Toronto, the author of Seam Allowance, pointed out the hazards of working in the home, including poor ventilation and stress created by long hours and the double load of simultaneously caring for children and working. An estimated 7,500 people are doing home work in Ontario, most in the garment industry.

The effects of textile work in industrial settings are well documented, but the potential hazards and incidence of respiratory diseases associated with garment work in the home are unknown, including the potential hazard to children and other family members. Health and safety inspectors cannot visit a home work place without prior agreement of the owner or a search warrant. Arbitrary access to the homes of these workers is not desirable because of the prospect of intimidation. Yet the health hazards faced by these workers must be seriously addressed, and a full disclosure of who is responsible and of the measures to eliminate unhealthy conditions must take place before the legislation is changed.

Furthermore, the increasing trend towards home work, including relocation of clerical jobs, such as putting data on video display terminals in the home, makes the possibility of an "electronic cottage industry" a reality. In her brief, Ms. Johnson stressed that the time had come creatively to address health and safety conditions in the home work place.

Selective exclusions from provisions of the act: Many other workers are excluded from particular rights under the act. Firefighters, police and workers in correctional facilities, training schools and observation homes are not entitled to refuse unsafe work under any circumstances. Workers in hospitals, nursing homes, psychiatric or other mental health or rehabilitation facilities, ambulance drivers, laboratory workers, laundry workers, food service workers, all have the right to refuse unsafe work only in cases where the refusal does not jeopardize the life, health or safety of another person.

The problem with this category is that it has been broadly interpreted to mean the workers have the right to refuse in virtually no circumstance. An example of this was a work refusal by Mary Lou Ruttan, of OPSEU Local 226, a residential counsellor at Midwestern Regional Centre, a retardation facility operated by the Ontario government.

Ms. Ruttan was seven months pregnant when a patient in the residence in which she worked was identified as a hepatitis B carrier. She was concerned about putting herself and her unborn child in danger of contracting hepatitis. When she exercised her right to refuse, a Ministry of Labour inspector informed her she did not have the right to refuse unsafe work. However, both management and the union agreed that by refusing to work she was not placing any patient in imminent jeopardy.

On a verbal appeal by the union to the London regional office of the Ministry of Labour, Ms. Ruttan was told that she could not refuse work because there were no health care regulations under the act. Twenty days later, Dr. James of the occupational health branch issued yet a third and different interpretation of her right to refuse. He wrote that her unborn child was at high risk of contracting hepatitis but that she was not. Therefore, since foetuses were not explicitly covered under the act, her work refusal was not upheld.

Questions in the Legislature led to a new interpretation by the ministry which clearly indicated that women had the right to protect unborn children.

Firefighters' right to refuse; they were excellent in their presentation: Not having the right to refuse has placed groups like firefighters in an untenable situation. According to Frank Durocher, of Local 455 of the International Association of Fire Fighters, when a fire breaks out in a plant where a number of different chemicals are stored, firefighters may have no knowledge of the kinds of substances or quantities to which they must expose themselves. This also applies when firefighters clean up chemical spills. In addition, many chemicals interact or react to heat, producing new hazards.

It is the responsibility of the senior officer on the scene to evaluate the situation and to decide whether to risk the lives of the men fighting the fire. However, the officer must make this decision without knowing where the chemicals might be stored or what the dangers from the chemicals might be. Without the option of the right to refuse, workers are forced by law to take risks in many situations where risks cannot be properly evaluated.

If they are not allowed to refuse, firefighters feel there should be strict right-to-know legislation which would force companies to identify the chemicals they are using, where they are stored, the hazards associated with these chemicals and the proper medical treatment in the event of exposure.

We deal with yet another section to be included, because these are things we did not consider at the time: retail workers, the right to health and safety committees. Retail workers are also excluded from rights under section 8 of the Occupational Health and Safety Act on the assumption that places like supermarkets and other retail outlets are not hazardous work places. Retail employees, along with many other workers, have therefore been denied the right to join health and safety committees.

Diane Holland, of United Food and Commercial Workers Local 633, gave many startling examples of situations in supermarkets that were hazardous. For example, in the meat department, water on the floor often does not drain properly and employees operate bandsaws while standing in water. Employees are exposed to toxic fumes from the polyvinyl chloride film when it is cut to wrap meats and produce. Retail workers faced additional hazards of poor storing of merchandise and long hours on their feet. Cashiers experience cold and drafts from check-out counters which are close to doorways.

In a submission from Organized Working Women, a 1981 survey done by the Ontario Retail Council of United Food and Commercial Workers on the health effects of ring-and-bag systems was cited. Under the system, cashiers must lift products and pass them over a computer reader with one hand while ringing up with the other.

More than 80 per cent of all surveyed cashiers reported experiencing negative health effects while more than 20 per cent had continuous or frequent pain in one or more parts of their bodies. A full 62 per cent reported back problems caused by repetitive forward stretching for articles and bending to bag them. In addition, the computer surveillance of ring-and-bag cashier work creates enormous stress to workers.

Because of their exclusion, retail workers also have no right to regulate inspection, and inspectors visit as infrequently as once every three years.

We make the following recommendations with respect to exclusion:

60. Section 3 of the act must be removed. No worker shall be excluded from the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

61. All the rights and provisions granted to workers in these recommendations must apply to all workers.

There is another group that is even more vulnerable, if that is possible, and that is the unorganized workers. Susan Meurer, an unorganized VDT operator, came before our committee and she said: "There is always the problem that if you complain too much in the work place, the employer will say, 'If you find it unsafe, you should probably go and find some other kind of work.'" That is the solution, of course.

If there was one area of concern about which the task force could not get adequate information, it was in the area of unorganized work places. It is clear that workers in all sectors who do not have union representation have not been made fully aware of their rights under the act. As well, most of these workers would not come forward to the hearings for fear of reprisals by their employers.

Yet those who did come forward gave ample evidence to suggest that the act is not working for them and that the problems in the unorganized work place are even more severe than most of the cases documented in this report. Workers at Wilco in London, for example, have been exposed to excessive levels of lead and have suffered debilitating health effects. The case study of Wilco in this section graphically illustrates the problems faced by the unorganized workers.

Video display terminal operators, the majority of whom are unorganized and work in offices, have virtually no protection under the Occupational Health and Safety Act. One unorganized operator making a submission to the task force said the following:

"It is a controlled function, working on a VDT or computer. Your working situation is completely controlled. You do not have any control over your work process. It is a very stressful working situation. In most cases low-pay, unorganized female workers even now have few rights and very little protection. One of the concerns of people in my work place is where do we go, to whom do we go with our concerns and our unorganized work place. The ministry would not come out to test our terminals even though at management's request." So much for the Ministry of Labour again.

When an unorganized VDT operator at Petrosar's corporate office exercised her right to refuse work on the VDT because she was pregnant, the ministry inspector did not uphold her refusal because "the VDT is not likely to endanger the worker or another person." The worker sought assistance from the organized workers in the plant and, with the help of the Energy and Chemical Workers Union, won her case. Most unorganized workers do not have access to unions to help back them in their efforts to protect their health.

Worker intimidation, failure to establish committees and the ministry's failure to enforce are experienced in work places across Ontario. The unorganized workers are particularly vulnerable. The effectiveness of the internal responsibility system in nonunion plants is completely unknown.

Bray W. D. Rivett Company Ltd., a plant in Gananoque, has been organized for only two years. Prior to the workers, becoming members of the United Electrical Workers, there had been no discussion on health and safety. In a submission to the task force in Ottawa, John Lameront of United Electrical Workers Local 522 said that in eight years there had been only one ministry inspection the workers knew about, and no health and safety committee was set up when the Occupational Health and Safety Act was proclaimed.

Contracting out is another means of transferring hazardous work conditions from a unionized shop to a nonunionized work place where workers are not always aware of the hazards. In a United Auto Workers' submission at the London hearings, workers at Northern Telecom Ltd. expressed these concerns. In June 1982 a beryllium-copper alloy was to be machined in the company's tool room. Two workers refused to work. The ministry upheld the refusal and issued extensive orders regarding beryllium alloy machining. The company, instead of making repairs, contracted out the work to unorganized work places and the ministry accepted this contracting out as compliance with the orders. Yet there was no follow-up by the ministry to ensure these unorganized workers were protected from exposure.

After the task force submission, questions were raised in the Legislature, and the ministry is now monitoring the contracting out in this work place. However, the task force is not convinced that efforts are being made to correct the larger problem of the ministry accepting the practice of contracting out to unorganized work places as compliance with orders, with no follow-up to check those new work places working with toxic substances.

Voluntary health and safety committees in organized work places have little ability to encourage their employer to clean up the work site, but still have recourse to negotiations. Unorganized workers concerned with health and safety, however, have to rely entirely on the Ministry of Labour to support their positions. When a dispute arose between workers and management over whether fume hoods were necessary to ventilate a hospital where workers were inhaling potentially carcinogenic drugs, the ministry admitted fume hoods were necessary, but did not order the hospital to ventilate.

Without a union, there is no other body to negotiate health and safety matters for workers when the ministry fails to initiate cleanup orders. In addition, employees who have witnessed others losing their jobs over health and safety in these situations are afraid that by raising these issues they will lose their jobs.

Lest members think I am being overly heavy, let me quote from Bruce Doern from the Centre for Policy and Program Assessment at Carleton University. In his study done for the royal commission on asbestos, he concluded by saying the following:

"The job of the inspector in the small unorganized establishment is made particularly difficult by the tenuous position of the employee. It is almost trite to point out that the internal responsibility system cannot operate effectively where a worker thinks or fears that he jeopardizes his job every time he lodges a complaint." This is the real key line: "Prohibition of reprisals notwithstanding, an employer can almost always find some excuse to dismiss an 'obstreperous' employee."

Let us look at a case study at Wilco-Canada Inc., just briefly. The complete vulnerability of the unorganized worker was made clear at the task force hearings in London, when workers had the courage to tell their experiences at Wilco.

Wilco-Canada Inc. in London is a plant which manufactures tubular products for automotive and refrigeration industries, employing 190 workers in 1982. Early in 1982, workers found that 20 employees had lead poisoning within an eight-month period, and at least three of these had become sexually impotent. The company had violated both the Occupational Health and Safety Act and the lead regulations. It failed to inform workers of the hazards of working with lead.

After some workers contracted lead poisoning the company provided inadequate respirators. It failed to post results of the air sampling and monitoring in the work place. There was no joint health and safety committee in place. There were inadequate facilities for washing up and eating, so contaminated clothing was being taken home. Also a lead assessment, as required by law, had not been undertaken, nor was a lead control program in place.

In December 1981, 16 employees who were off work from lead poisoning were sent letters saying that if they did not return to the plant to lower-risk work at lower pay, they would be ineligible for workers' compensation or unemployment insurance benefits and would be fired. I raised this matter in the Legislature, but after a flurry of meetings and orders, little seems to have changed.

Several workers who had suffered serious health effects appeared before the task force. Brad Tunks was a tube mill assistant who was given no information on the hazards of lead when he started work in February 1981. By November of that year, he was experiencing irritability, stomach cramps, headaches and excessive sleepiness, all signs of lead contamination. Blood tests showed excessively high levels of lead and he was removed from his work. However, he too received a letter which threatened dismissal and he returned to work in January 1982. By March, the lead poisoning was so severe he required hospitalization and special drugs to clear the lead from his body.

With no union to represent him, Brad attempted to fight the company, but was passed between the Workers' Compensation Board, the Ontario Labour Relations board and the Ministry of Labour. At the end of July, the WCB cut off Mr. Tunks's benefits because his blood lead levels had dropped although some of the health effects were still present. Simultaneously, Wilco laid him off saying they had fulfilled their staffing requirements. To date, Mr. Tunks is still waiting for an appeal hearing for the WCB.

This is one story of many. Another person at the task force hearing told of four workers, aged 18 to 23, who were off work from lead poisoning. The WCB sent them back to work when their lead levels dropped below 0.50 milligrams per litre, and the next day they were laid off.

Dan Wood, another Wilco worker, told the task force conditions in the plant had not improved since the ministry had issued orders. The lead control program had been designed by management without worker consultation and still no ventilation has been put in place to remove the lead. Mr. Wood relayed how workers were still getting sick from lead contamination.

Yet the ministry has not enforced the act or the lead regulations. It has failed to protect workers who are struggling to have a union, the United Auto Workers, but to date do not have that protection and representation. The Ministry of Labour told the New Democratic Party it would not prosecute the company for reprisals under section 24 of the act because the workers had not exercised their right to refuse under section 23.

Finally, in April 1983 the ministry laid charges against Wilco. It charged six workers for failing to wear respirators, and it charged two supervisors and the company for recent violations. One charge against Wilco was laid under subsection 24(1) for reprisal against a worker who exercised his right to refuse. The charges have not yet been heard. The ministry has never moved against the letters threatening dismissal, nor has it moved to correct the lead hazard in the plant which has been the cause of the health problems of Wilco workers.

Because of this, we have made a number of recommendations which, we hope, the government will introduce to protect the vulnerability of the unorganized.

62. The greatest health and safety protection for the unorganized will be achieved by amending the Ontario Labour Relations Act to facilitate organizing workers into the unions which can provide the most protection to their rights.

63. Special protections must be developed and incorporated into the act to protect the unorganized workers, including central reporting of committees to the Ministry of Labour and central reporting of inspections and follow-up to unorganized plants.

64. There shall be guaranteed funding to community occupational health and safety groups, such as the Windsor Occupational Safety and Health Council, in each major industrial centre to carry out vital education and advocacy work. This is particularly important for the unorganized workers.

I am winding down now, as the members can see. The pile is getting smaller.

Mr. Sargent: Let it go, Elie.

Mr. Martel: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Ashe: There are only 35 minutes. Keep it going. Use all your time tonight.

Mr. Martel: If the Minister of Revenue (Mr. Ashe) is learning something it will help.

Hon. Mr. Ashe: It gets repetitive.

Mr. Martel: I have not repeated a thing.

Special sectors: There are many special sectors for which there are no specific regulations, yet for which a number of problems exist. Day care workers, social service workers and others who appeared before the task force explained the problems this creates.

In other cases, the act has explicitly excluded a sector. Elliot Lake miners, for example, who fought for health and safety protection in Ontario, still have not acquired the same rights for themselves. Last year there were 1,700 orders issued against the two companies in Elliot Lake. That was in one year. There is not a charge.

I want to deal with office workers. William Dickerson, Mid-Canada Council, Office and Professional Employees' International Union, said to the task force: "Due to recent innovations in office technology, office employees find themselves exposed to an environment drastically different from that of years past. The introduction of Xerox copy machines, video display terminals and teletype machines, for example, expose operators to new hazards affecting their physical wellbeing."

Many workers appearing before the task force were working in offices. Their complaints were universally similar; the hazards of office work are not taken seriously by management and the current legislation inadequately protects them. The fact that office workers are expressly excluded from having joint health and safety committees, under clause 8(b)(1) of the Occupational Health and Safety Act, confirms this.

More than 80 per cent of office workers are women, the majority of whom are unorganized workers in banks, insurance companies, law offices and other nonunionized work places. These workers need the protection of strong legislation. There are not even specific regulations prescribing safety standards for office work. Workers in offices are currently administered under the general provisions of the industrial regulations, which are totally inappropriate.

David Foley of CUPE Local 791 made a submission on behalf of workers of the Corporation of the City of Kitchener. He, like many other workers, complained of the failure of the Ministry of Labour to inspect office work places. In the case of CUPE Local 791, the local inspector will inspect only the industrial area of the corporation, not the offices. Mr. Foley also expressed concern about the employer's attitude towards office hazards, which are not seen as important.

He stated: "When we discuss the problem of lack of blinds on windows, improperly designed chairs and desks, improper ventilation and overcrowding, not to mention obvious concerns such as electrical outlets which are mounted on the floor in travel areas, we are ignored regarding the obvious, told to get substantiated proof regarding the ergonomics and advised that because the budget had to be trimmed, other considerations were more essential. This comes from a supervisor whose well-furnished, air conditioned office is larger than the entire work area provided for a portion of his staff."

These hazards are in fact real, and the traditional assumption that the office work place is safe must be challenged. There are hazards from the physical environment of the office: improper lighting, excessive or repetitive noise from copiers and key punch operations, or overcrowding. The increased number of sealed or climate-controlled buildings has often meant employees work in environments improperly ventilated, with inadequate air changes and exposure to toxic substances or bacterial infection. Many products used in the office are hazardous. Toluene and other solvents from toners, erasers and cleaners pose hazards in both the short and long term. Ozone from copiers can result in dizziness or drowsiness; in the long term its effects are unknown.

Yet these concerns are often ignored, and even where unions fight for testing, it is often inappropriately done. Greg Randle of CUPE Local 87 produced documents at the Thunder Bay task force hearings showing that management had complied with requests to test for ozone, but it was done on a one-time basis on a day when the copier had been mostly idle. Mr. Randle argued that the failure of management to conduct a series of tests under realistic working conditions indicates a lack of respect for workers' concerns.

The massive influx of microchip technology into the office has had a major effect on workers. Many submissions to the task force raised concerns about the health effects of video display terminals. The Occupational Health and Safety Act has no regulations governing work conditions on VDTs, and there are no laws in effect which require testing at the point of the machine's production. In addition to the suspected hazards from low level radiation, there are also concerns about exposure to PCBs, excessive heat and glare.

The strain of repetitive work with improper lighting and no required breaks heightens the hazards. Poor machine design, incorrect layout of equipment and overcrowding are further ergonomic hazards experienced by office workers. One of the newest problems intensifying office stress is the use of technology to monitor productivity of workers.

Workers are pitted against each other and themselves, with constant monitoring, accompanied often by reprimand and pressure tactics by management. Workers have no protection under the law against these practices.

Susan Meurer, a video display terminal operator in Toronto, raised concerns that equipment capacity now dictates the work load: "In the two years I have been doing it"—that is, operating a VDT—"I would say my work has doubled, and this is because the equipment is constantly changing and able to handle a greater capacity, at a faster speed. Of course, we have to keep up with whatever the increased load is."

The stress created by increased work loads is but one of the health effects. VDT operators report skin rashes, strained eyes and muscle and back problems due to poorly designed equipment. Bob DeMatteo of the Ontario Public Service Employees Union spoke of a case the union is currently fighting for a clerical worker who has cataracts that some medical evidence suggests may have been caused by radiation.

Questions about reproductive hazards have not been seriously addressed by the government. Mr. DeMatteo in his submission to the task force raised the matter of the cluster of miscarriages in an office of old city hall in Toronto, where the miscarriage rate in 1981 was 62 per cent, a staggeringly high figure. Yet the doctor sent in by the ministry to investigate recorded only superficial information, never contacted the women involved and concluded that there was no significance to the cluster.

The occupational health branch did radiation tests and found that the VDTs were emitting fairly high levels of low-frequency radiation, yet the Ministry of Labour would not issue orders to shield the machines. To date there has been no satisfactory study done of reproductive hazards here or in any other Ontario work place.

Workers must fight even to have health effects properly recorded. Workers from the Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 543, from the city of Windsor, submitted to the task force a copy of a questionnaire on VDTs circulated to VDT operators by their management. It was interested primarily in the workers' miscarriage history and in exposure to colour televisions and microwave ovens. There were no questions in the survey dealing with immediate health effects such as eye problems, physical effects or stress.

Microchip technology and the failure to protect is not confined just to the traditional office work environment. Joyce Rosenthal, in her submission on behalf of Organized Working Women, stressed the potential hazards to both children and teachers in the school system, where VDTs are being introduced. Children may be more susceptible to the possible radiation hazards of VDTs, and all workers and students using the machines should have guarantees of proper lighting, adjustable furniture and proper spacing, shielding and ventilation of machines.

In addition, office workers in nontraditional environments often face industrial hazards but have no rights to health and safety committees. Dawn Cartwright of de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Ltd., where the office workers are members of United Auto Workers Local 673, spoke of the frequency with which office workers are sent into the plant to communicate information.

Bill Dickerson, a member of the Office and Professional Employees' International Union, is an office worker at Domtar Forest Products in Red Rock, Ontario. He and other office workers face hazards of excessive dust because they work in portable offices on the industrial work site, yet they are classified as office workers and thereby excluded from section 8 of the act.

I want to deal briefly with the health care sector. I want to quote Bob DeMatteo, health and safety co-ordinator of OPSEU: "Three years ago health care regulations were promised to us in one month. Why should we go through the farce of participating in a consultative process if the ministry is not interested in giving us protection?"

Health care workers are currently administered under the general umbrella of industrial regulations by the Ministry of Labour, totally inappropriate protection for their health and safety in the work place. The health care regulations were drafted three years ago and have yet to become law. This failure to regulate has become a convenient excuse for the ministry not to enforce protection under the act.

Workers at St. Lawrence Lodge in Brockville, members of CUPE Local 2107, were required to transport patients with psychiatric disorders, some of whom were violent, to hospitals in Kingston, a distance of 96 kilometres. The practice had always been to have two workers, one to drive and the other to care for the patient. When management directed that only one driver would make the trips, the employees protested to the Ministry of Labour under clause 14(2)(g) that the employer's duty is to take every precaution reasonable in the circumstances for the protection of workers.

At the same time there were an increasing number of complaints from workers about the violence of patients in nursing homes. In both cases the area manager for the Ministry of Labour ruled that since there were no regulations covering the health care sector, he was powerless to act upon the complaints of the threat to workers from violent or dangerous patients.

Patient violence was cited in a number of submissions to the task force as one of the principal hazards of working in chronic care facilities, hospitals and psychiatric institutions. Shirley Scarrow of Ontario Public Service Employees Union Local 111 from London Psychiatric Hospital cited a growing incidence of worker assault by patients, including 13 in her facility in the first eight months of 1982. At the time of the task force hearings, two staff members had been off work for six months after having been beaten by patients.

These examples point out the serious gap between staffing standards and what is necessary for the protection of workers. The Ministry of Health sets by regulation the requirement for staff-patient ratios and the required hours of nursing care. These are outdated and inadequate because of the changing nature of institutionalized patients. The government's policy of deinstitutionalization has meant a higher concentration of more disturbed patients in the psychiatric facilities and a patient population requiring much heavier care in chronic facilities. Inadequate staffing creates problems of stress and even the possibility of violence.

It has also meant a staggering increase in back injuries. In every single submission from health care workers, this was cited as a major occupational hazard. Inadequate staff to lift patients and inadequate numbers of mechanical lifts have contributed to this. I believe nurses and nurses' assistants have now equalled miners for back injuries in the province.

George Wilson, on behalf of Joan Duerden of CUPE Local 1263, appeared before the task force representing 600 workers in homes for the aged in the Niagara region. They blamed safety problems, resulting in things such as back injuries, on the restraint policies of the provincial government. I quote:

"Underfunding of these homes means understaffing, and understaffing means that a staff member is under considerable pressure to try and lift the resident alone rather than consume the time needed to find another overburdened staff member to help lift. This in turn is resulting in back injuries to staff and in some cases has resulted in injuries to residents as well."

Communicable diseases are regulated under the public health laws, but worker exposure is not specifically covered. For example, ambulance drivers of a CUPE local in Sudbury have complained that they do not know until after they have handled a patient whether the patient has a communicable disease.

The task force heard of instances where registered nursing aides at Perley Hospital in Ottawa, members of CUPE Local 870, were not informed about patients having communicable diseases, so they did not know whether they were being exposed to a patient with contagious health problems; yet they are routinely expected to assist patients with personal hygiene. The solution is clearly to set up a preventive information system where RNAs are warned about the exposure before working with a patient.

The issue of anaesthetic gases and other toxic fumes is an important concern of hospital workers both in respect to short-term hazards and long-term reproductive effects. Members of CUPE Local 424 from Stratford General Hospital spoke of their hospital management, which is quite co-operative on most issues but which has not yet resolved the continuing problem of alcohol fumes in the lab.

CUPE's national health and safety representative, Colin Lambert, learned that the Ministry of Labour, in co-operation with the Ontario Hospital Association, had conducted a 10-hospital study on workers exposed to ethylene oxide and had concluded there was not a problem of exposure. At no time during this study were the workers in these 10 hospitals consulted. Only after considerable pressure did the Ministry of Health make available the names and study results of just six of these hospitals. Yet based on these results, a more extensive 75-hospital study on anaesthetic gases is under way, excluding ethylene oxide. To quote Colin Lambert at the St. Catharines hearings:

"So we are faced with a real game of catch-22. The Ontario Ministry of Labour tells us that all the hospitals in Ontario have no real problems with ethylene oxide, that they do not feel there is any need to change the present threshold limit value; nor do they feel that there is any need to monitor hospitals to determine whether there is overexposure to ethylene oxide for workers. They base this decision on a study of 10 hospitals, the results of which are confidential."

10:10 p.m.

Until hospital workers are given access to information on toxic substances unique to their work environment, and real access to management's and government's decisions about the hazards of such gases, they will not be protected. Many workers urged task force members to press for specific regulations to protect the health and safety of workers in the health care sector.

Coming from Sudbury as I do, I could not help but include a small section on mining. I am quoting from Dan Sweezy, the health and safety officer for the United Steelworkers of America, Local 6500.

"The one area in which the ministry has not improved, but failed drastically, is the enforcement area of the mine safety inspection branch. This branch has used the terminology 'internal responsibility system' as a definite crutch to shirk its responsibility."

Last year there were 12 mine fatalities and countless other accidents and injuries. Mining continues to be extremely hazardous work and those who appeared before the task force stressed a number of concerns which need to be immediately addressed. Despite all the technological advances, mines today still need better lighting and substantial reduction of noise and dust levels. Workers still have inadequate sanitary and cleanup facilities and need improved lunch areas. In addition to the toxicity of the mine materials, workers face hazards of abnormal air pressure and carbon dioxide from emissions from constantly running machinery.

Dr. Joseph Cummins, a geneticist with the University of Western Ontario in London, told the task force that recent changes in mining technology posed new hazards. His experiments have shown that the oil-salt explosives being used leave mutagenic, carcinogenic residues in the air and on surfaces. Plastic polymers now being used to retain tunnel walls react with nitrogen oxides from diesel exhausts and nitrate-oil explosives to release highly carcinogenic nitrosamines. Cummins stressed that new protective devices are needed to rectify those problems. In the case of nitrosamines, for example, they readily penetrate rubber protective clothing.

Workers told the task force of unsafe conditions created by home-made parts of mining machinery. One steelworker in Thunder Bay spoke of modifications to equipment because the proper replacement parts were not available. Clause 14(1)(b) of the Occupational Health and Safety Act states, "The equipment, materials and protective devices provided by him"—that is, the employer—"are maintained in good condition." Yet this does not preclude home-made devices as stop-gap measures, which are often dangerous underground.

The same holds true in the work process. Steelworkers at the Thunder Bay hearings cited one example of a concentrate dryer where the igniting flame of an oil-fired system could not be started one night. The supervisor, concerned about production, told a worker to ignite the dryer with an oxygen acetylene torch. That worker refused, believing it to be hazardous, then another worker refused. Instead of following the work refusal procedure under section 23, the supervisor did the hazardous job himself. And he got his head blown off too.

Another problem is the high number of mining inspectors and engineers who bring a management bias to the job. Workers at the task force hearings urged that more inspectors be appointed from the ranks of workers. According to Dan Sweezey of USWA Local 6500, of the last few appointments to the mining branch of the Ministry of Labour, five of six hired were former Inco management.

Accessibility to ministry inspectors during weekends or graveyard shifts is also a problem. Local 6500 of the Steelworkers pointed out to the task force that 24-hour operations need 24-hour availability of inspectors in case of accidents. An incident after the hearings clearly confirmed their concerns.

On January 29, 1983, during the graveyard shift at the Copper Cliff nickel refinery in Sudbury, excessive amounts of nickel carbonyl were twice released, entering the plant and surrounding environment. The workers experienced dizziness and had to be given oxygen. Of the 13 workers, nine had amounts of nickel carbonyl above permissible levels in their urine. The Ministry of Labour was called at 5:30 a.m. Not until two days later, on the Monday afternoon, did they come to investigate—two full days.

The threat of fires is another imminent hazard for underground workers. Workers told the task force that section 34 of the mining regulations requiring safe procedures for hot work, such as blowtorch or welding, are not followed by management and not enforced by the ministry. They urged that the requirements for firefighting equipment under this section of the regulations be strengthened to make it mandatory that firefighting equipment be attached to the welding gear.

Andy Delarosbil of USWA expressed concerns about the mining regulations allowing workers to work alone underground. He stated: "It is a common experience for a worker to be assigned to work alone." This is under section 15 of the mining regulations. "However, in underground mining this could be disastrous. The company's practice is to visit at least every two hours. What happens if the worker is drilling and loose rock falls on him? If his shift boss was in just 15 minutes ago, the result is he could be pinned under for a minimum of one hour and 45 minutes before someone comes. One hour and 45 minutes could be the difference between life and death." It is imperative that no one works alone underground.

The distance from medical help is also a problem. There are often accidents in mines, yet Shebandowan mine, for example, is almost 100 kilometres from the nearest medical attention. Mine workers urged the task force that a qualified industrial nurse be on all operating shifts and that management should pay for first aid training for workers. Both measures would help save lives.

Other concerns raised by workers include incomplete inspections of mining properties, the exorbitant costs of protective clothing and training requirements under the mining regulations being interpreted as maximum requirements instead of the minimum resulting in less than fully skilled new workers in the mines.

The construction sector: Every year a large number of construction workers fall victim to industrial accidents and disease. Although the act has contributed to improved working conditions on construction sites, incorporated into the act are limitations or lines of responsibility that make health and safety problems on these sites difficult to resolve.

For example, a safety representative is only mandatory on a construction site where the number of employees is greater than 20. This is in subsection 7(1) of the act. Since many small construction projects employ far fewer than 20 people, often no one on a construction site is responsible for health and safety.

On larger construction projects where there are more than 20 workers, the worker who is selected as the health and safety representative may only be knowledgeable about the hazards of one craft. The construction unions told the task force that, as in collective bargaining, the selection of health and safety representatives on construction sites should allow for one representative from each craft working on the site.

The union representatives also pointed out that the act places greater responsibility on the employee to act as his own protector in identifying and pointing out hazards to the employer. Since construction work depends on moving from one job to the next, workers on construction sites are reluctant to point out hazards for fear of being discriminated against on a new site when their current job ends.

Another difficulty for construction workers is in section 13 of the act which places responsibility for health and safety matters at a construction site on the contractor, rather than the owner.

Where a work place is a project, the contractor must look after health and safety problems. However, construction workers have had difficulties in being exposed to hazards which were beyond the control of the contractor, such as where a construction job involves an addition or renovation to an industrial operation. Workers in Thunder Bay working on an addition to a pulp and paper mill found that stack gases from the mill were building up in an area where construction work was taking place. Because they were not part of the joint health and safety committee in the mill, they could only appeal to the contractor to solve their problems.

On certain construction projects the owner may hire two contractors for separate aspects of the job. Because the responsibility for health and safety does not rest with the owner, if one contractor is negligent, workers hired by the second contractor may be exposed to hazards over which they have no control.

For construction workers the key to a safe work place is vigorous enforcement by the Ministry of Labour. The union representing the largest number of construction workers in the province—Labourers International—believes that while work sites in major cities such as Toronto may be inspected frequently, remote work sites, particularly in northern Ontario, suffer from understaffing and a subsequent lack of enforcement.

However, even frequent inspections by the Ministry of Labour have not guaranteed construction workers freedom from hazards on the job. Rodmen, who as part of their work on construction sites are required to hang off belts on vertical walls, have suffered from acute back injuries, as well as developing serious degenerative back disease.

A 1977 survey by the Iron Workers Union Local 721 showed that 70 per cent of the rodmen responding to the survey suffered degenerative back effects, while 90 per cent of the rodmen and ironworkers quit their work because of back problems. Yet there is virtually no legislation that would address the health problems of rodmen arising from work practices such as climbing and hanging off vertical walls or bending over all day tying steel rods.

Although section 76 of the construction regulations has been interpreted as prohibiting the practice of hanging off belts as a substitute for scaffolding, the Ministry of Labour is not enforcing the legislative protection that exists. In addition, these back problems have not been recognized historically in claims to the Workers' Compensation Board.

I want to finish by saying that the most important thing we have is our health. Yet the conditions in which thousands of people work in our province place their health in jeopardy. Many of the causes of industrial diseases and accidents have been known for 40 or 50 years, according to Dr. James Nethercott, director of the occupational health clinic at St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto. Despite this knowledge, Ontario has not done nearly enough to eliminate the causes of these problems.

The key to our approach is to give workers the ability as well as the right to assure themselves of a healthy work place. We based our recommendations on the experience of working people, as we heard their concerns at hearings and through submissions. We did so not just on the dozens of specifics which flaw the Occupational Health and Safety Act, but also on the approach of this government to this vital human field.

What did we find and what did we hear?

Principally, it was dissatisfaction, frustration, fear, disappointment and a sense of futility.

There is dissatisfaction with the internal responsibility system. Management, and not the health and safety committees, decided in the final analysis what would be done to correct health and safety problems. Frequently, if more than token costs were involved, that proved to be very little. There is dissatisfaction with the lack of enforcement of this province's laws. Tens of thousands of orders are issued, and 10 to 15 per cent must be repeated because companies fail to comply. Yet charges are few, fines are low and workers continue to get hurt or become ill.

There is frustration with their difficulty in improving conditions despite much time and effort. Many workers spend hours of their free time trying to improve working conditions at their plants, factories or offices. But when they are continually thwarted at every move, exasperated union and health and safety committee members are tired of the fight because they are essentially powerless to bring about meaningful change.

There is fear, from their inability to obtain adequate information about substances they handled or inhaled in their work. Firemen did not know where the substances were located and what quantities were involved when fighting a fire. When working with drugs, workers often did not know the effects on them. Constant attempts to get information about chemicals and their hazardous effects proved futile for many, and when workers have tried to claim their rights to a healthy and safe work place, they have been threatened with letters of dismissal, have lost pay, have been sent home from work and have been subjected to other subtle forms of intimidation.

There is disappointment, because many workers felt that the Occupational Health and Safety Act would make a safe work place possible. Many told us they were no better off now than before the act was introduced. Many have never seen a copy of the act and are not trained to make the act work.

There is futility in that many felt a higher value was attached to their employer's costs than basic health and safety concerns. If costs are minimal, changes are possible. But all too often, health becomes secondary to the balance sheet.

For many, these concerns can be traced back to one key fact: too much power in health and safety matters continues to lie in the hands of those whose actions resulted in introduction of this legislation way back when. The clear consensus among those who presented evidence at our hearings was that only where management wanted a safe working place would it occur. But without enlightened companies and managers, the inherent flaws of the act and the failure of this government to enforce its own laws has meant there is no meaningful health and safety program in this province for hundreds of thousands of workers.

To those who still believe this act to be tough, strong or even slanted towards working people, let us examine the record. We have made every effort to report accurately and fairly what we have heard. We used a number of case studies to show where the act has failed and the way in which the ministry has failed to enforce the act.

Across the province, we found no abuse of the right of workers to refuse dangerous work, nor have workers been frivolous in their efforts to improve their working life. They are simply trying to protect their health, their lives and their families.

This report is a challenge to the Tory government. It is also a challenge to the people of Ontario. Those who say, "We cannot afford to do more," are really saying health is less important than private enrichment. The choice is clear.

Profit is paramount, it would appear, in our society. Yet if we lay aside the human calculus for a moment and simply examine the balance sheet, our failure to regulate health and safety and enforce even those inadequate laws on the books is costing society dearly.

In 1981, $984 million was paid out in direct compensation to victims of occupational disease and accidents. In the same year, an estimated $3.9 billion in indirect costs resulted from job-related diseases and injuries. When all the diseases proven to be work-related yet not accepted by the Workers' Compensation Board are added, billions of dollars more are hidden in our general health bill.

Too many workers are being used as guinea pigs while government and companies conduct epidemiological studies. We, in our party, have made our decision and our commitment. We do not think health is a commodity to be bought and sold. We cannot afford to wait.

The work of changing the law has to be matched by a change in attitude as well. Nothing is more precious than life itself.

Mr. Cousens: Mr. Speaker, since I am usually sitting where you are at this time and the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) has gone on for such an extraordinary length of time, I will move adjournment of the debate and then have a fresh chance to get going when the next day comes.

On motion by Mr. Cousens, the debate was adjourned.

The House adjourned at 10:28 p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Thursday, April 28, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

YOUNG ONTARIANS

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: I think it is most important that the members of this chamber recognize the deeds of young Ontarians, particularly when those deeds are slightly different from the norm and when those deeds will bring benefits to the people of this province.

I am referring to the pending marriage of Mr. Gary McGuffen of London, Ontario, to Joan Wood, a young lady from Bracebridge. That of itself is noteworthy; I am sure all of us would wish them every success.

But beyond that, these two young people are taking a two-year honeymoon, travelling the route of our early explorers here in Canada from the Gulf of St. Lawrence up to the Arctic Ocean. During that time they will be noting their adventures and recording them for our students here in Ontario and for the Ministry of Education through a slide presentation they will be making along the way. I want to bring this to the attention of the chamber and I am sure the members present will wish, as I do, every success to these two wonderful young Ontarians.

DEATH OF HARRY BRAY

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House would want me, on its behalf, to pay tribute to a former vice-chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission, Harry Bray, who has served this province well and who passed away yesterday. Harry Bray's contribution is recognized by many. His role in terms of the financial industry of this province and the preservation of its integrity and of the public interest is well understood. Indeed, many would look on him as the Elliot Ness of this province. It is with great sadness that I express regret at his passing.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I would like to join, as I know my colleagues would who knew Harry Bray, in expressing our immense regret at the suddenness of his death. Over the years, I had occasion to have been associated with Mr. Bray. I did not always agree with him but he brought an unfailing courtesy to the work of the commission. He had served this province on the commission for something over 30 years. He was Mr. Securities as far as Ontario was concerned. The knowledge, skill and ability which is reflected in the Securities Act is a monument to his passing.

The remarks which he made at the end of December, when he attended the last meeting of the Ontario Securities Commission in his capacity as vice-chairman, are ones which should on an appropriate occasion be noted. He contributed to the integrity of the securities markets in this province in a way that this province must be indebted to him for his contribution. On behalf of my colleagues and others in the assembly who knew him, I would like to extend our condolences to his widow and to his children.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I would rise to add a personal contribution on the passing of a most distinguished constituent of my riding, as well as a most distinguished public servant of this province, with whom I had the honour to serve both as a parliamentary assistant in the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations while many of the present statutes were being drafted and again as the minister when that particular legislation and many of the administrative practices were finalized.

Mr. Bray exemplified all that has made the public service of Ontario the finest in the world. He had an enormous zest for work, in a field that is infinitely complex, infinitely challenging and where the calibre of the man and his character are virtually always under test. It is true that from time to time there were allegations that Mr. Bray was too firm, too dedicated, but if Mr. Bray had any failing it was that he was too honest, and I do not think that is a failing.

At the same time, he was a very practical, realistic and very progressive public servant. As the former minister and as his member of the Legislature for many years, I would extend to his widow not only the usual condolences but also the fact that this assembly does recognize the tremendous contribution he made to the people, the investors and the business of this province.

2:10 p.m.

FLOOD PLAIN MAPPING

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: In answer to questions put by the member for Essex North (Mr. Ruston) and myself on Tuesday, the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. Pope) said, "The honourable member knows that the flood plain policy is one of the policies that will be applied under the Planning Act. He is aware that as a provincial policy that will take effect under the Planning Act."

I just want to say that in that statement the minister has misled the House, perhaps inadvertently from lack of knowledge. The facts are the flood plain mapping is applied independently of the Planning Act unless a council takes initiative on its own—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

OUTLOOK AGRICULTURAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Riddell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: I am sure you will agree that as elected members to this assembly we all share the responsibility of how the taxpayers' money is spent. I learned that the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Timbrell) held an outlook agricultural conference on Monday at taxpayers' expense. He did not extend an invitation to the agricultural critics of the opposition parties.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Riddell: He is obligated to do so and I think he is a small, narrow-minded man for not doing that. He aspires to become leader of this province and he ignores the important opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely with the number of times we have spoken about identifying points of order and points of privilege, you must understand there is nothing out of order.

DIGITAL CLOCK IN CHAMBER

Mr. Speaker: Now that we are quite through with this informal period of whatever—

Mr. Sargent: Do it over again.

Mr. Speaker: No, please don't. I would like to point out, as I am sure all members have noticed, that the new timing device is now in place. I am not going to attempt to outline all its functions, but I am sure we are going to find it very useful and I am sure it will become familiar to all members as time goes on.

For today, I just want to point out that when question period starts, 60 minutes will show on the two display panels and will count down to zero, when they will flash for several seconds before returning to the time.

In the throne speech debate, when a member starts to speak the panels will indicate how much time the party has had in the debate following the leadoff speakers and will count upwards, adding the time as he or she speaks.

I am sure you all understand that and I am sure we are going to have complete co-operation.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: Is it planned to ring a bell after a minute of the Premier's responses or nonresponses to questions?

Mr. Speaker: I think you should ask that during the proper time in oral questions.

Mr. Cunningham: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: Dealing with the comments you have just made with regard to the timing device, I wonder, as you contemplate the use of the new timing device, if in the spirit of equity and fair play you would consider permitting a question to be answered after it is put, even as we approach the 60-minute mark.

It would sometimes appear we are endeavouring to run this place like the German railway in terms of time. In fairness to all members who would like to ask questions and obtain answers we might have those questions entertained even as we hit the conclusion of the 60-minute mark.

Mr. Speaker: I think I have attempted to use some discretion in that regard.

PREMIER'S HOROSCOPE

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: I refer you to the Globe and Mail of today, Thursday, April 28, 1983. You will be aware that the Premier's (Mr. Davis) birthday is July 30 of this year—and every year as far as that goes. I refer you to this because for Leo, July 23 to August 22—and I want you to listen to this, Mr. Speaker—it states: "The field is clear for you to gain a leadership post. Keep your emotions under control. The less you say now the better. A romantic"—

Mr. Nixon: Now listen. Here's the big thing.

Mr. Peterson: "A romantic entanglement is sapping your energy."

Mr. Speaker: That is very interesting indeed, and I am sure the Premier will pay heed.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

DEATHS AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the honourable members an update on the investigation into the tragic death of a six-and-a-half-month-old baby who died Saturday in the cardiac ward at the Hospital for Sick Children.

The infant, Gary Murphy of Kitchener, who had a severe congenital deformity of the heart, had been in hospital for more than three weeks. At about 6:20 p.m. last Saturday the baby went into cardiac arrest and efforts by the medical staff to revive him failed. Gary was pronounced dead at 6:37 p.m.

The first blood sample was taken from the heart three minutes after the baby was declared dead and a preliminary test indicated elevated levels of digoxin. A second test done three hours later substantiated the first. Dr. Murray Naiberg, the investigating coroner, informed the parents that elevated levels of digoxin had been found in the baby's blood and that an autopsy would be performed. An autopsy was performed at the hospital at 3 a.m. Sunday by Dr. Charles Smith. All of the levels obtained in the post mortem were above the normal level.

At 5 a.m., after consultation with Chief Coroner Dr. Ross Bennett, it was decided to call in the Metropolitan Toronto police to assist in the investigation. On Sunday morning Dr. Naiberg and doctors from the hospital met with the family and explained that further testing confirmed the high levels of digoxin and that further investigation was under way.

A team of scientists at the Centre of Forensic Sciences is still conducting tests at this time. Some 50 items, including tissues and materials from the room in which the child died, must be tested. Members can appreciate that this is meticulous and time-consuming work. To date, 15 tests have been completed. I am advised by the forensic staff that tests will not be completed until the end of next week.

My office has been in contact with Chief Jack Ackroyd and he has said that, contrary to reports, he cannot indicate that this death is a homicide. It continues to be investigated to determine the cause of death.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I too would like to share with the House as much information as I can about the death of Gary Murphy in the cardiac ward of the Hospital for Sick Children.

First, however, I wish to remind all honourable members that we have three considerations at this time. The first, clearly, is to find out why the Murphy child died, the second is to see whether anyone deliberately or inadvertently contributed to that death and the third is to scrutinize the procedures in the hospital to ensure that they meet all reasonable standards for the care and safety of patients.

The first two issues are, as my colleague has stated, within the purview of the criminal justice system and are being vigorously pursued by the coroner, the police and the forensic scientists.

The third matter is the responsibility of the Ministry of Health and the subject of this report to the House. In presenting it I must ask all members of the House, the media and the public to avoid leaping to conclusions based on evidence so far available to reflect unfairly on anyone at the hospital or undermine public confidence in the Hospital for Sick Children. That would only compound the tragedy.

I say this recognizing the terrible impact of these events on the parents and families, on physicians, nurses and staff of the hospital and on the community, which certainly cannot be allowed to lose faith in the Hospital for Sick Children. As the committee under Mr. Justice Dubin observed, "It is truly one of our indispensable institutions;" and that, "It is still deserving of the complete confidence of the public."

In considering what has just taken place, I ask members also to reflect on the observations of what has come to be called the Atlanta study, which was carried out by the staff from the Centers for Disease Control in the United States and by members of my ministry staff. In the recommendations I tabled in the House on February 21, they observed:

"For the future, it is important to recognize that no hospital is immune to the possibility of intentional harm to patients by hospital employees or others in the hospital. Situations of the sort have occurred before and may well occur again. Although absolute prevention of all possibilities for such actions would not permit hospitals to function, steps can be taken to discourage their occurrence. In the light of the current Toronto hospital experience we"—that is, the CDC—"would make two general recommendations, one concerning management of medications in the hospital, the other concerning the use of ongoing surveillance mechanisms to give an early warning if an abnormal mortality pattern is developing."

The safeguards they recommended varied only slightly in process from those recommended by Mr. Justice Dubin and his colleagues, and they were in place in the hospital when this most unfortunate death occurred.

As a result of procedures and controls introduced in the cardiac wards following the discovery of the epidemic in March 1981, mandatory tests of digoxin levels were begun immediately following the death of the Murphy baby last Saturday night. The first results showed elevated levels of digoxin and these, as my colleague has indicated, were immediately reported to the coroner, who triggered the police investigation that has been referred to.

Since then my staff and I have met the senior trustees and officers of the hospital and we have reviewed all of the circumstances known to them and the procedures in the cardiac ward that might have a bearing on this tragedy.

Members are aware that the hospital board, management and staff welcomed the recommendations of the Dubin and Atlanta inquiries and have been moving towards their full implementation with great dispatch, particularly with those that affect patient care and safety.

On the basis of the information available to us at this time we are satisfied that the hospital has been faithful to its commitment to comply with the Dubin and Atlanta recommendations and that the procedures of the hospital do not appear at fault. As members know, the hospital has provided me with periodic detailed reports on the implementation of each of the review committee recommendations and it is doing a conscientious job.

Despite this, we must recognize realistically that the death that is now under investigation is bound to create apprehension and adds what I fear are increasingly intolerable burdens on the staff and administration of the hospital. As Mr. Justice Dubin noted:

"Those providing professional services at the hospital have found it difficult to practise their profession under such circumstances and the morale is strained. It is to their credit that their professionalism and skill and their work does not appear to have suffered to date even under such stress. Their ability to do so in the future will, we think, depend very much on the degree of support that the hospital receives from the public."

From my meetings these past two days I am certainly very aware of the toll these events are taking on the administration of the hospital. These are fine and dedicated people who are doing everything possible to ensure the necessary standard of excellence that is so much a part of this hospital.

From the time they originally became aware of this problem in the cardiac wards they adopted a whole range of new procedures to reinforce patient care and safety. They have welcomed outside advice from all quarters and they believe they have taken every reasonable step to protect their patients.

Let me give some illustrations. A unit dose system for digoxin has been instituted in the cardiac wards. The nursing staff there has been reorganized and expanded with the appointment of a new head nurse and two highly trained clinical instructors. They have spent $100,000 on new patient monitoring equipment for a new intermediate care unit in the cardiac ward. The medical staff has been reinforced with two staff cardiologists, assigned as ward chiefs, instead of one. A second senior fellow has been assigned to the unit. Residents with more experience are now being used there and staff cardiologists are carrying out evening rounds in addition to the regular daily rounds of the past.

In these circumstances, which have been in place for some time now, this most recent death has been devastating for them and they have asked me to see whether there is anyone who can suggest what other steps they might or could take. We are now in the process of appointing one or more persons with a high level of hospital and medical experience to bring a new, detached perspective to the procedures and operations in place or planned at the Hospital for Sick Children.

At the request of the hospital, we will mandate that person or persons to review the current procedures in the hospital and to review the implementation of changes needed to reinforce once again the capacity for patient care and safety by working with the board, administration and staff. In the meantime, the hospital has implemented a number of very specific physical and medical security procedures in the cardiac wards and these will continue in place.

I am sorry I cannot share the terms of reference and timetable with the House because these will depend to some extent on who we are able to appoint. In spite of what has happened and the events in the cardiac ward, it is important to keep sight of the fact that hundreds of children continue to be treated and restored to health every day in the Hospital for Sick Children. It is, to repeat Mr. Justice Dubin, an indispensable part of our health care system and deserves public confidence.

I have confidence in that hospital. I am sure most honourable members share that confidence and I know it is shared by the hundreds of families who daily place their trust in the skill, dedication and care which have always been the cornerstones of the Hospital for Sick Children.

VISITORS

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, prior to my statement but clearly related to it, I would like to introduce to you and ask members to join me in welcoming to Ontario three distinguished guests who are seated in your gallery this afternoon: the Honourable Henry Williams, Commissioner of Environmental Conservation for the state of New York; Mr. Anthony Taverni, acid rain co-ordinator for the state of New York, and Mr. John Spagnoli, regional director of the Department of Environmental Conservation in the state of New York.

Mr. Kerrio: Are they going to help the minister clean up his act?

Hon. Mr. Norton: They are very co-operative people.

ACID RAIN

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, later today the Minister of Environmental—Intergovernmental Affairs (Mr. Wells)—

An hon. member: Only on Malvern.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Since he has done such a fine job on Malvern, I thought I would give him credit. I am sure he would be quite willing to leave that responsibility with me.

The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and I will be meeting with Mr. Henry Williams, Commissioner of Environmental Conservation for New York state. Our purpose in meeting is to sign a memorandum of understanding between the province of Ontario and the state of New York on a co-operative program to combat the present and future effects of transboundary air pollution and, in particular, acid rain.

2:30 p.m.

Both Ontario and New York state have common interests in the battle against acid precipitation. Many of their recreational lakes, like ours, have been seriously affected by the long-range transport of atmospheric pollutants. Our mutual concern is to apply the best possible science to study this very serious global phenomenon and to ensure that effective action is taken to eliminate its effects on our waters.

The memorandum will lead to standardization of methods and procedures used in sampling and laboratory analysis, the free exchange of scientific information and the opportunity for joint scientific research. Also, it will eliminate duplication of cost and effort for both jurisdictions and increase our mutual effectiveness.

Perhaps of equal importance is the fact that one of the most powerful and influential states in the union recognizes with us the seriousness of acid precipitation and is willing to co-operate with a foreign jurisdiction on this problem. Ontario has gained an important ally, in my opinion, in its struggle against acid rain.

I am confident that the memorandum will be noted and carefully considered by the US federal authorities in Washington and by various other American states which so far have shown less concern and sympathy for the need to reduce emissions that cause this problem. It will contribute to the increase and awareness of acid precipitation as a serious pollution problem throughout the United States and Canada and thereby lend more weight, I believe, to our argument for increased control of emissions by federal US authorities.

I have met and talked with a number of state legislators and officials throughout the United States, and it is my hope that this Ontario-New York agreement will be one of a series of others to follow.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the statement is missing a page. Did I miss the page where the minister invited the two opposition critics to be present at this meeting?

Hon. Mr. Norton: No, Mr. Speaker. I invite the honourable member to be present, if he so wishes, for the signing of the agreement, which will be occurring at the conclusion of question period.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It's good news. You don't want to be there, Jim.

Mr. Kerrio: You've got them this far. We are willing to help you, you know.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kerrio: It is in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No.

DEVELOPMENTALLY HANDICAPPED PEOPLE

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House of the progress by my ministry on the five-year plan for the expansion of community services and the consolidation of facilities for developmentally handicapped people in this province.

As I stated on October 28, when I announced the details of the plan, the first phase involves the closing of the St. Lawrence Regional Centre in Brockville. I am delighted to report that this phase is almost complete and we are extremely pleased with what has been accomplished to date.

When the institution closes, 74 of the 100 residents will be living in group homes and family homes in the community, and another six residents will be ready to move back to the community within two to three years, after they receive the additional training they require.

This means our earlier prediction regarding the number of residents who would be capable of community living was overcautious. The great majority will now enjoy a fuller life outside an institution. This shows what can be achieved when carefully planned community alternatives are provided.

I might add that the average age of these residents is 36. There are no children at this institution and, if our program of providing these community alternatives were not in effect, they would probably have spent the remainder of their lives in institutions.

The success of the first phase of the implementation of our five-year plan, combined with the successes my ministry achieved during the first seven years of its program of providing community alternatives to institutional living for developmentally handicapped people, reaffirms the wisdom and humanity of this policy direction.

As the Premier (Mr. Davis) indicated last week, there will be no moratorium on the five-year plan. To delay the plan would be to deny residents their right to live with dignity and a sense of self-worth in a setting that is most appropriate to their needs and abilities. It would simply deny them the opportunity for a fuller and more satisfying life.

I should point out that the Premier is one of the pioneers of community-based living for developmentally handicapped people. In addition to his personal conviction that at all times they should be afforded the greatest possible degree of participation in life, it was his commitment on May 16, 1974, to the annual conference of the Ontario Association for the Mentally Retarded in Peterborough that provided the long-term policy direction and financial resources for our program of community-based services.

It is because of the excellent co-operation my ministry has received from parents, from the local association for the mentally retarded and from the dedicated and committed staff at St. Lawrence Regional Centre that the first phase of our five-year plan has progressed so well in such a short period of time.

I would also like to acknowledge the invaluable contribution of the member for Leeds (Mr. Runciman) towards the successful implementation of this first phase. He has been of great assistance to me, my staff, the residents, their parents and the community at large.

Individual plans have been formulated for all 100 residents at the St. Lawrence Regional Centre. Already, 55 residents have been placed in new settings as follows:

Eleven are now living in existing community residences in Cornwall, Bancroft, Kemptville, Seeley's Bay, Alexandria and Rockland.

Nine are in new community group homes in Mallorytown and Oxford Mills.

Nine are living with families in family home programs in Prescott, Perth, Portland and Vankleek Hill.

Twelve are at Rideau Regional Centre because of the francophone program there and their medical needs.

Three have been relocated in their home communities, at Oaklands in Oakville, Prince Edward Heights in Picton and Muskoka Centre in Gravenhurst.

Six are at the Adult Occupation Centre in Edgar, where they will receive the additional training they need for community placement.

One is at the Ongwanada facility in Kingston.

One, who requires a specialized program, is at Southwestern Regional Centre in Cedar Springs.

Three who require short-term psychiatric care are at Brockville Psychiatric Hospital.

Forty-one residents have been assigned places and will move over the course of the next several weeks.

Thirty-one residents will be accommodated in community group homes operated by the Brockville, North Grenville, Lanark, Almonte, Kingston and Dundas associations for the mentally retarded. My ministry is working closely with these associations to carry out these placements.

Eight will be in new community group homes developed by my ministry in Oxford Mills and Mallorytown.

Two will go to family home settings in Perth and Prescott.

Places are now being developed for the last four residents in the Brockville area.

I am also pleased to report that of the 77 civil servants at the St. Lawrence Regional Centre, 50, who were individually interviewed, have accepted new positions with my ministry. Another seven are negotiating for positions with the Ministry of Health at Brockville Psychiatric Hospital.

Forty-one of the staff who have accepted new jobs with my ministry are going to the Rideau Regional Centre in Smiths Falls, five are going to Prince Edward Heights in Picton, three to other facilities and one to the ministry's regional office.

Most of the remaining 20 civil servants are waiting for openings in community services units or in other community operations being developed in the Brockville area.

In keeping with my commitment that no resident will move from any institution until a properly supervised residential setting is ready, I have instructed that the necessary complement of staff remain at the St. Lawrence centre until June 30, when the carefully planned relocation of every resident will be complete.

As I announced in October, rather than operating all 17 institutions at 62 per cent capacity, my ministry is consolidating its facility services. Bluewater Centre in Goderich is the second phase of this program.

I told the parents of residents at the Bluewater Centre that we would not proceed to the second phase of our program until I was satisfied with the progress in Brockville. In the light of our success there, we will be developing closure plans for Bluewater in the very near future.

Between now and the spring of 1986, my ministry will also be closing the St. Thomas Adult Rehabilitation and Training Centre, Pine Ridge in Aurora, D'Arcy Place in Cobourg and Durham Centre in Whitby. The number of residents at Oxford Regional Centre in Woodstock will be reduced from 657 to 484.

The closures will be implemented over a five-year period to ensure a gradual and orderly progression of residents to the community. This will also allow more than ample time for ministry staff to consult fully with parents and guardians of each resident to be moved, with the staff at the institutions to be closed and with the local associations for the mentally retarded which are working with us to carry out this plan. This time frame will ensure that no decision is made in haste or on an ad hoc basis.

As I have already stressed, no resident of any institution for the developmentally handicapped will move to the community without a properly supervised residential setting and, where applicable, a work, training or activity program. Furthermore, the parents of every resident will be individually consulted before any decision regarding relocation or community placement is made. As I have also emphasized, every civil servant in the six institutions to be closed will be given preference for jobs in the remaining facilities or in other areas within the public service where they may qualify. Some may elect, however, to obtain employment on their own in new community-based alternatives.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services has been providing community alternatives to institutional living for developmentally handicapped people since 1975. During the first seven years of the program, the ministry increased its budget for community services for developmentally handicapped people from $10 million in 1975 to $118 million in 1982. Between 1975 and 1982 the ministry also created 2,800 new community living places for developmentally handicapped children and adults and more than doubled the capacity of the workshop and employment training system to 7,600 places from 3,600 places. The development of these and other resources allowed some 3,800 residents of institutions for the developmentally handicapped in Ontario to move back to the community, and it reduced the overall population of these institutions by 1,400.

The number of residents at Rideau Regional Centre in Smiths Falls was reduced to 1,000 from 1,500, the population of Huronia Regional Centre in Orillia was cut to 967 from 1,500 and the population of Southwestern Regional Centre in Cedar Springs was pared to 654 from 894.

The success the ministry had between 1975 and 1982 with its program of promoting community living for developmentally handicapped people led us to plan an expansion of these services over the next five years. As members will recall, the five-year plan calls for the establishment of a network of new community-based services to be used by hundreds of developmentally handicapped people already living in the community and about 1,000 residents of the ministry's 17 institutions who will be moving to the community during the next five years.

The specifics of this plan are worth repeating in view of the questions raised in the past six months in this House and by members of the public. As I announced in October, we are now creating 750 new supervised community living places, 1,000 new spaces in the family support program, 244 new group home places, 1,381 new training and employment places for higher-functioning adults, 500 new training and employment places for lower-functioning adults, 200 new beds for severely handicapped children and 250 new places for severely handicapped adults.

The transfer of residents from our 17 institutions for the developmentally handicapped back to the community will reduce the number of beds needed in these institutions by another 989. Of the $33.7 million in 1982 dollars that my ministry will spend to expand community services for the developmentally handicapped during the next five years, $23.7 million will come from the closing of these institutions.

During the past six months, my ministry has written to every employee in the six institutions to be closed, to the parents or guardians of all residents and to the local associations for the mentally retarded, outlining the major elements of the five-year plan. Senior staff of my ministry have also attended numerous meetings and met privately on many occasions with parents, staff, union representatives, municipal officials and members of the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded, the Ontario Association for the Mentally Retarded and their local affiliates to discuss details of the plan. This communication will continue throughout the implementation of the closures.

I might add here that both the Canadian and the Ontario associations for the mentally retarded have endorsed my ministry's plan to expand community-based services for the developmentally handicapped. Many local associations for the mentally retarded have also expressed support for the plan and have offered to work with us to develop these local services.

As a result of these meetings and individual consultations, which will continue as specific plans for each institution and each resident are made, many parents who initially expressed concern about the five-year plan now actively support it.

I reiterate that we are delighted with the progress to date in the implementation of our five-year plan for expanding community living opportunities for the developmentally handicapped residents of this province. We are convinced that as support for this policy direction continues to grow within the community at large and among those directly affected by it, we not only will have many more success stories to relate but also will have provided a richer life for hundreds of developmentally handicapped people.

NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES LTD.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter from the chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission, dated April 26, 1983, which I would like to table in the Legislature.

This letter concerns the OSC's handling of the Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. investigation and was prepared by the chairman with the direct involvement of the seven other members of the commission who participated in the review of the commission staff report concerning the investigation. The letter addresses a number of issues.

However, at the outset I would like to make it clear that in making certain of the statements in the letter the commission is departing from its normal practice concerning confidential investigations. It is apparent from the letter that the commission feels that in this case the departure is required to correct some fundamental misunderstandings of commission procedures.

The commission advises that it will not release the staff investigation report, but the letter does contain a succinct statement of reasons for the commission's conclusions upon the review of that staff investigation. The commission has also hesitated to provide reasons for its conclusions, because it has been concerned about prejudicing the ongoing police investigation.

However, the commission has assumed that the Attorney General's opinion is that the police investigation will not be prejudiced by a statement on the basis of the Attorney General's comments to the effect that it would be in the public interest and in the interest of the commission for the commission to make a statement.

I would like to read excerpts from the commission's letter to me.

"Upon reviewing the evidence set out in the staff report, the commission inferred that senior officers of Norcen, on behalf of Norcen, pursued the establishment of a possible relationship with Hanna over an extended period of time from January 1979 to July 1982.

"In the course of this pursuit, the officers had under active consideration a number of fundamentally different alternative courses of action, including: (1) making limited open-market purchases to provide a basis for negotiation or to accumulate securities to be disposed of; (2) making a public tender offer to acquire 20 per cent of the outstanding Hanna shares; (3) making a public tender offer to purchase 51 per cent of the outstanding Hanna shares; and (4) negotiating an agreement with Hanna similar to the agreement announced July 7, 1982.

"In the commission's view, there was not a 'material change' in the affairs of Norcen or a 'material fact' in relation to securities of Norcen within the meaning of the Securities Act until the board of directors of Norcen or the senior officers, in the belief that their decision would be confirmed by the board of directors, decided to implement a specific course of action

"In reaching its conclusion, the commission was particularly mindful of one of the basic principles of the Securities Act, and that is to require disclosure of material changes upon their occurrence—no sooner, no later.

"The commission has administered its laws so as to counsel equally strongly against premature disclosure as against late disclosure. Late disclosure, of course, results in uninformed trading in the market. Premature disclosure can be equally destabilizing and can create confusion and result in expensive and disappointed investment expectations on the part of the investing public"

The commission, in that letter, also addresses the importance of the confidentiality of its investigations in the following words:

"Confidentiality is essential in order to facilitate the investigation and in order to avoid either prejudicing a person's rights to fair process in the event that findings of the investigation justify proceedings or damaging a person's reputation when the results of the investigation do not support further proceedings. The effective functioning of the commission depends heavily upon the reliance which parties affected by its operations can place upon the confidentiality of the commission's administrative proceedings."

2:50 p.m.

On the issue of why I, as Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, must consent to a prosecution under the Securities Act, the commission states:

"We are strongly of the view that the confidence that the financial community has in the commission would be eroded in a fundamental way if one of the basic tools for administering the act, the decision to initiate prosecutions under the act, was removed from the commission or shared with another agency."

The House may recall the report of the Attorney General's committee on securities legislation in Ontario, more commonly known as the Kimber report, after its chairman, which noted the shift in securities regulation from the time it was first introduced and was primarily directed to the prevention of fraud in the sale of securities to the position today where securities legislation is directed both at criminal and quasi-criminal law enforcement and at the enhancement of the position of the securities industry and the economic life of the province. An extract from the Kimber report is quoted in the letter.

Finally, the letter addresses the issue of the chairman's participation in the commission's review of the report of its investigators and spells out in some detail the steps he took to carry out what he believed to be the responsible course of action, which was to discharge his responsibilities as chairman if legally and practically possible.

In this connection, the letter has attached to it a letter from the seven commissioners, other than the chairman, who participated in the review of the investigation report, stating that they urged the chairman to participate in the matter because of the importance of the issues raised and emphasizing the exemplary manner in which the chairman conducted the discussion.

There are four schedules to the letter. The first schedule is a letter from the chairman, dated April 12, 1983, describing the commission's response to the Attorney General's request of me to have the commission reconsider its conclusion on the matter. The second schedule is a letter, dated April 14, 1983, from the chairman to me, concerning possible perceptions of a conflict of interest. The third schedule is a letter, also dated April 14, 1983, from the seven other commissioners which I described above. The fourth schedule is a legal opinion which the chairman obtained prior to involving himself in the matter.

I commend this material to those members of the Legislature who have been raising questions about the commission's handling of this matter and to other interested members of the Legislature. I point out, for the interested members, that the chairman, Mr. Peter Dey, is sitting in the Speaker's gallery today.

GOVERNMENT AND THE ARTS

Hon. Mr. McCaffrey: Mr. Speaker, today I want to inform members of the House of an important ministry initiative that may well have a significant impact on the form and direction of the relationship of the arts and government in the next decade.

Today I wish to announce the formation, under the authority of the ministry act, of a special committee to study the relationship of government and the arts in our province. The need for such a committee quite simply is that culture and the arts in our province have enjoyed a period of unprecedented growth both in quantity and in quality over the past two decades. Much of this growth has been fuelled by the funding policies of this government and in particular of my ministry.

In 1963, the province undertook a review of the relationship between the arts and government. One of the recommendations of that review was the formation of the Ontario Arts Council. In 1963, the Ontario Arts Council had a budget of $300,000, and the government's total funding of the arts was less than $350,000 that year.

Ten years later, in 1973, a further review was carried out which resulted in the Guidelines for Cultural Policy Development being approved by cabinet. Government support for the arts had then grown to $33 million per year.

In the fiscal year just ended, this government has allocated $89 million to the arts through my ministry. Since the ministry was created in 1975, this government has allocated more than $715 million to the cultural activities and facilities supported by this ministry. It would be difficult to point to another area of Ontario society that has enjoyed such explosive growth and so continuous a commitment of government support.

To maintain in the next decade the accelerating patterns of growth charted in the past two decades could place demands on the taxpayers of this province which may exceed their capacity or their desire to fill. Thus, I think it is entirely appropriate that at the beginning of a significant new decade for the arts, this government assess the directions and policies that will shape its commitment to the arts.

The special committee has the single objective of setting goals for the development of the arts in Ontario. Specifically, I have asked it to make recommendations concerning:

1. Appropriate areas for government involvement in the development of the arts in the 1980s;
2. The relationship between the ministry and its agencies and the appropriate roles for each in the development of the arts;
3. The role of the province in arts development compared to other political jurisdictions;
4. The most appropriate development and use of arts facilities;
5. The appropriate balance between government support, self-generated income and corporate and other private sponsorship; and
6. Methods of fostering greater self-sufficiency among arts organizations.

We may from time to time add other questions that are of relevance to the ministry and to the committee's work.

Committee members have been chosen for the independence of their opinions and the range of their experience. All share a considerable understanding of the arts and culture in Ontario. To facilitate both the speed and the effectiveness of the committee's work, it will consist of only three members and will keep its inquiries as informal and open as possible.

The committee will hold public hearings with artists and arts organizations across the province and then prepare a draft report for distribution to the arts community for comment. Following an open conference to guarantee the broadest possible input of public opinion, the committee will prepare its report and final recommendations. I have asked that this report be completed within the next nine months.

In closing, the committee will be chaired by Mr. Robert Macaulay, QC. Its members are Mr. Peter Day and Mrs. Geraldine Sherman. Secretary to the committee will be Mr. J. Douglas McCullough, assistant deputy minister of my ministry.

The formation of the special committee is another step in the orderly growth of the arts in Ontario. I am confident that with the assistance of the entire arts community, Ontario will continue to maintain a level of artistic activity second to none.

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Hon. Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Transportation and Communications (Mr. Snow), today I would like to table the Ministry of Transportation and Communications and the Ministry of Northern Affairs highway construction program for the fiscal year 1983-84.

My colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs (Mr. Bernier) has released this report this afternoon in Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay.

In all, an estimated $336 million will be spent for construction on the King's highway system in northern and southern Ontario. In addition, we will be subsidizing municipal road construction for another $246 million, which will generate about $460 million in total expenditures when the municipalities' share is included.

In total, some $796 million will be spent on projects considered essential to preserve the present quality of the existing system, a system that ensures the efficient transport of goods and people in Ontario.

3 p.m.

Briefly then, we are proposing new work on a total of 868 kilometres of the provincial system, primarily on two-lane highways, including scheduled construction of 129 bridges.

As part of the government's proposed expansion program under the direction of the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development, $25 million is included for major highway projects in the Golden Horseshoe area.

MTC will continue to carry out the planning, design and construction of some 348 kilometres of provincial highways in northern Ontario, a system, as I am sure all members know, that is funded by the Ministry of Northern Affairs, which also sets the priorities for capital highway construction in the north.

Again, the majority of the work is primarily on two-lane highways, although the construction of passing lanes, truck climbing lanes and remote airports is also included. Details of all these projects and others are contained in the program I am now tabling, copies of which will go to all members via the legislative post office.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding, I would ask the co-operation of all members in limiting their private conversations to some place other than the chamber.

ORAL QUESTIONS

DEATHS AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, if the Premier (Mr. Davis) has a statement on Minaki Lodge I will gladly hold down question period.

Mr. Speaker: Was that your question?

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is his first question. I have no statement; next question.

Mr. Peterson: The Premier would not recognize it, but that was high-quality humour he just heard.

I have a question for the Solicitor General with respect to his statement today. Can the Solicitor General be specific about the levels of digoxin that were found in the investigation? Obviously, there is a great deal of confusion between his statement and a variety of statements that have come out, statements of various ministry officials as well as what has been reported in the press. I do not see any clearing up of that confusion as a result of the minister's statement or that of the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) today. Can he be specific about the levels of digoxin that have been found up to this point?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, other than saying they are elevated levels I cannot enlighten the honourable member with any more information than that.

Mr. Peterson: Can he tell us if he has evidence that these were not homicides? Is that what he is saying or is he saying they were homicides? What is he saying to this House?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: I have not indicated at all that they are homicides nor have the police indicated that there is a homicide here. The statement indicates the levels of digoxin are elevated enough to cause the coroner concern so that he has called in the police to investigate the matter further. Further forensic laboratory tests are being conducted on the matter.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I take it from the minister's statement today the levels that were found were higher than the therapeutic level which might have been expected, given the fact that we understand the child was receiving digoxin as part of his therapeutic treatment. Is the minister in a position to tell us whether the levels that were found were anywhere near as high as those in the instances which have been described by the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, in the seven which they have said in their view could only have been caused by purposeful overdoses of digoxin? Can the minister enlighten us a little with respect to the situation?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to inform the honourable member that they are above the normal levels that one would find for therapeutic purposes and they are sufficient to cause the coroner concern to investigate the matter. As to where they are on the latter part of the scale that he has asked to fit them into, some particular scale that would allow him more preciseness, I am not able to give that information at this time, as the tests are still being conducted.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the minister is saying the digoxin levels were above the therapeutic level. In his statement he says Jack Ackroyd cannot indicate this death is a homicide. The Minister of Health in his statement quotes the Atlanta Centers for Disease Control, which state: "For the future it is important to recognize that no hospital is immune to the possibility of intentional harm to patients by hospital employees or others in the hospital." A spokesman for the Attorney General's office yesterday said this particular incident seemed to bear very little or, in fact, no relationship to the previous deaths that are under investigation.

Obviously there seems to be a great deal of confusion from all sources on the government side, and I wonder if the minister might take this time to clarify just what the situation is.

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the honourable member has accurately quoted the spokesman for the Attorney General's office or put into the statement by the Minister of Health what is intended from the statements put forward today.

I cannot enlighten the House any more at this time, because we are still undertaking these very elaborate tests. They are not simple tests; they are very complicated. They are tests such that when you find a negative result, you proceed to another sort of positive result. The matter cannot be simplistically arrived at by saying, "Here is a scale, and here is the exact answer."

I would like to enlighten the House further on it but I cannot, because it is a very complicated forensic scientific procedure that is being conducted by the Centre of Forensic Sciences to resolve the further information on the matter.

NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES LTD.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations with respect to his statement today, which again sheds very little light on a subject that has become extremely complicated because of conflicting reports from a variety of sources.

Would the minister not agree with me that the statement he has given us does not give us any facts? In fact, he has prevented the public from making its own judgements on the basis of the reports of the investigators, and all we get is a gloss here off the top and have no further insight into this matter.

Given the gravity of the situation, given the aroma that this entire matter has had, why would he not use his discretion? He has gone a little bit of the way here: he has broken the principle of secrecy now. Why would he not go the entire way and lay before the public and this House a copy of the report of the investigators?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, let me speak quite honestly. I think there are some very important and substantive issues at stake here. First of all I think there is the integrity and respect that I have, the government has and, I trust, all members have for the individuals and the members who make up the commission that regulates the financial markets of this province.

My own view—and I have absolute and firm confidence in the ability and the competence and the capability of those people—is that they have fulfilled their functions and their activities in a way that is beyond reproach.

What the honourable member is really saying is that, contrary to public policy in respect to individuals or corporations that undergo investigation, investigations in which a determination is made that no charges should be laid, those investigations should be public without regard to the effect on the individual or the corporation, or indeed on society and on the justice system as a whole. That is a philosophy I honestly cannot accept.

I know there are exceptional circumstances in this case, because it has been well publicized and because there were hearings in Cleveland and there has been a leak of the document. But that should not alter the fundamental obligation that we all feel is imposed upon and should be part of the confidentiality under which that commission operates with respect to investigative reports like this.

The commission has given this House, and therefore the public, a comprehensive review of the principles on which it reached its decision and has indicated what its decision was on the basis of the application of those principles. I feel and they feel that that is sufficient justification for the public. Remember that it is the unanimous decision of a commission which I feel is totally above reproach.

3:10 p.m.

Mr. Peterson: So the minister believes in semi-confidentiality. Would he not agree with me that that could lead to the conclusion that he is being self-serving in what he chooses to share with the public?

Given the myriad of other questions involved in this matter from different sides;

Given, apparently, the different point of view the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) has from the minister on this matter and the fact that we still have not had an explanation for the dismissal of Mr. Johnston, that we still have no explanation for the different points of view of the various police forces, the investigative staff, with respect to the commission;

Given the fact there is a potential conflict of interest here—of course, I read the documents quickly and I noted the rationalization, the legal opinion, for the conflict of interest at the securities commission was dated yesterday, April 27, so it was a letter after the fact to cover the events preceding;

Given the fact that various people's reputations had been very lightly bandied about, including some by the minister and various members of his government;

Given the switch of position of the Attorney General in this whole matter over the last few months;

Given all those questions and many more, I would ask him whether it would not be fair to have an independent probe that would look at all the facts involved to make sure justice was being well served, and also to look into some of the subsequent matters with respect to the Securities Act, conflict of interest rules and a variety of other things, to make sure the minister does not again taint his own reputation and that of some of his regulatory bodies.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: First, I have never bandied anybody's name about, nor have I heard anybody question the integrity of any single member or group of members of that commission. With all respect, what we are talking about is the integrity of a system and the preservation of the individual's or corporation's right not to be unduly exposed.

I understand what the member is talking about in terms of the undue publicity this case has had and the amount of information that has been given to the public through the trials in other countries and through a leaked document, but to suggest a fundamental principle should be breached with respect to the release of information, when opposition members in this House have acknowledged there was apparently a thorough investigation, is beyond my comprehension.

I am thoroughly satisfied as to the process, and to suggest the fact that the letter from counsel was dated at some recent date really means—I am not criticizing, because I know the documents are lengthy, but if the member would read the documents, they say, "In confirmation of previous oral advice I gave you." This is not something pulled out of a hat. We are talking about solid, competent, capable, responsible citizens serving a role in this province of which we should be immensely proud.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would allow me to say that his opinion of the members of the commission and mine are identical. That is not the matter at issue at present. Will the minister please consider in his capacity as minister his obligation to release the whole report of the investigation? If he does not release that report, he will continue the damage that is being done to people's reputations in connection with that investigation by the inappropriate and improper way the action of the commission was carried out.

I have read what I believe to be the report. I consider myself relatively well informed in this matter. I also consider there is nothing in that report which, in the words of the minister's statement and in the quotation to him from the letter of the Ontario Securities Commission, will damage "a person's reputation when the results of the investigation do not support further proceedings." That is the question that was decided by the commission, that there would be no further proceedings under section 118. The report does not damage the reputation of those persons, because the evidence of those persons was accepted by the commission.

Will the minister now, in the light of the concern which is created and because of the inappropriateness of the procedures of the committee in deciding this matter, determine as minister to release that report?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I could not disagree more totally with the member's concept as to any inappropriateness. Let me make it very clear that what he is really asking for is that this commission, and therefore other investigative bodies in this province, be they police or be they quasi-judicial, have a precedent set for them to release investigative documents on people where decisions have been made not to proceed with any charges. I find that such a fundamental principle that to breach it would, I think, raise a disrespect for that commission and for this Legislature and I do not intend to do it.

Mr. Peterson: I would implore the minister not to be intellectually dishonest in his answers of creating straw men, such as attacking the reputations of people on the—

Interjection.

Mr. Peterson: He is suggesting we are attacking the reputation of people on the Ontario Securities Commission, or he is suggesting that we are attacking some fundamental principles. He has quasi-broken the principle now and he cannot stand on it.

The issue is the regulatory capacity of his government. This is the issue of the trust companies, where he stands up and says, "I have looked into it, we are having an internal review and everything is fine." He knows damned well that for two years there was complete incompetence right under his nose.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Peterson: We do not take his word for it. He has lost credibility with us in this House.

I am asking the minister, on the basis of the confusion that surrounded this case—the various noises that have come from the Attorney General, the police and a variety of others—would he not feel he was serving the system better to make this information public so we can form our own judgement? Surely that is fair in the circumstances, given the support of that position from the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick).

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I suggest that the Premier (Mr. Davis) may want to dig out the horoscope on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson). I do not know what he is taking these days, but he is showing a degree of irresponsibility that I think behooves him not very well and which his party should be very distressed about. He can talk all the lovely talk he wants, but there is a very fundamental principle here. For him to suggest it should be breached, should be shocking to individual citizens and to the public in this province.

SECURITY AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. It concerns the statement he made today and the one made by the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman).

Can the Solicitor General tell us whether or not there were physical security measures in effect after March 1981 at the Hospital for Sick Children? Can he tell us whether there has been any change with respect to physical security at the hospital since that time? In particular, can he tell us whether there have been any changes as a result of the decision of the government to stop the criminal investigation and to move towards the establishment of the Grange commission?

I am sure the Solicitor General will understand the importance of that question in the light of many other questions which are being asked about the events which took place on Saturday. Can he tell us whether there have been any material changes in the nature of the physical security at the hospital from March 1981 until today?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am not apprised of the exact information the member is desiring, thus I cannot give him an answer to that precisely. It is a question he had better put to the Minister of Health, who is more familiar with the exact information on that question.

Mr. Rae: Could I ask the Solicitor General to redirect that question to the Minister of Health?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I outlined in my statement some of the steps that had been taken. I would assure the honourable member that other steps have been taken by the hospital which I think it would be inappropriate to disclose, because obviously if the hospital made public the security measures that have been taken it would make them virtually ineffective.

3:20 p.m.

Mr. Rae: I think the minister has slightly misunderstood the question I was asking. I was asking the minister whether he was aware of precisely what physical security steps were taken by the hospital from the time Susan Nelles was charged in March 1981. Can the minister tell us whether there have been any changes since that time?

I think that information is relevant in terms of what has happened over the last while. Can he tell us whether there have been any changes as a result of the decision of the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) not to proceed with a criminal investigation and to shift over to the broader-range inquiry?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I have understood the question and I would refer the honourable member to pages 5 and 6 of my statement wherein several changes, but not all the changes, are listed. Again, to repeat, there are other changes that have been implemented to ensure patient safety, patient care and security, but it is not in the public interest to disclose those because it would make them ineffective.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, it seems in the statement the minister tabled in the House today, if he would refer to recommendation 96, there is a fairly lengthy discussion of security measures that should have been taken as a result of the Dubin inquiry. The recommendations specifically state, "Identification of all hospital personnel and visitors should be required as an additional security measure."

I note the response of the hospital to date has been that it is accepted in principle and is being studied. I ask the minister why is it being studied? Why has it not been implemented, when adequate time certainly has transpired over the last few months for these changes to have taken place?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The Centers for Disease Control recommendation, dealing in the same area, expressed some concern about the particulars of the Dubin recommendations with regard to that. The hospital felt it was in the best interest of patients and families to go cautiously in that area from the standpoint of wanting to keep the hospital accessible while providing appropriate security.

Because of some other steps they have taken, which again we are not prepared to disclose, it is the hospital's opinion that just about an equivalent level of security has been maintained without needing to go to that sort of system which would undoubtedly change the atmosphere and feeling of care and openness that is available and most important to the patients in that particular area.

Mr. Rae: Perhaps I can phrase the question even more directly. Can the Minister of Health tell us whether, to his knowledge, any physical security measures that had previously been in place were relaxed at any time between March 1981 and Saturday? Can he tell us whether the physical measures that certainly would have been in place in March 1981 were relaxed? Can he tell us under what circumstances they were relaxed?

I am speaking specifically of physical security measures, and not in relation to many of the recommendations made by Mr. Justice Dubin and implemented by the hospital with respect to medical security.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If I have followed that phrasing carefully, I would report to the honourable member that all the measures in place as of last week, before this recent incident, were substantially better and more secure than they were in March 1981. In other words, there was no relaxation from March 1981 until last Friday.

Subsequent to the events of last Saturday, as a precautionary measure, some further rather extraordinary measures have been taken to increase the level of security once again.

CLOSURE OF CONSOLIDATED-BATHURST PLANT

Mr. Rae: My new question is to the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker) who, along with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay), now has disappeared.

Mr. Speaker: He is not in his seat.

Mr. Rae: It would appear they are ready to stay here for extraordinarily lengthy statements by ministers, but not ready to stay for—

Hon. Mr. Elgie: He can hear you.

Mr. Rae: He is not here so it does not matter whether the honourable member can hear me or not, does it?

Interjection.

Mr. Rae: There he is. Fine.

Mr. Speaker: Put your question, please.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I understand the minister was present, as were a number of other individuals, at a meeting that took place this morning between officials of Consolidated-Bathurst and the Minister of Labour and himself.

I would like to ask the minister, given the fact he is aware the company refused even to meet with its own employees to make any adjustments with respect to its plans to close the plant in Hamilton, it refused to respond to the request by the employees that it consider an offer to sell, it would not "countenance any competition," as it put it—and how ironic in the light of the minister's halcyon statements to the free market system that he gives to the Empire Club from time to time; given these facts, does the minister not think it is time the government stopped meeting on its knees with these companies and that it simply pass legislation that would require companies, first, to make an offer to purchase to employees any time they are considering plant closure, and second, to justify their plant closures to a committee of this Legislature? Does he not think it is time we had that kind of legislation in place?

Hon. Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Rae: The minister is nothing more nor less than a pathetic apologist for the corporate barons of this province.

As a shareholder or as a trustee for shareholders in Massey-Ferguson, how does the minister feel about a statement made yesterday in response to a question from another shareholder at the Massey-Ferguson annual meeting? How does he feel about the statement by Mr. Rice that there is a plan that the company be closed in Toronto, probably within the next two years?

Does the minister not think it is high time the companies told the workers their plans before they dropped them casually in conversations to shareholders? What steps does he intend to take, as somebody who is acting as a trustee for the people of this province with respect to their shares in Massey-Ferguson, to make sure that jobs are protected in this province?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I think something should be kept in mind here in respect to jobs in Ontario. Brantford is still in the province, and it was indicated that the jobs and the plant in essence would be moved to Brantford, Ontario, where, of course, there is equal need.

If we are talking about the plant itself, it is considered to be, and is, a very old, somewhat antique plant. It is a turn-of-the-century plant and, in the essence of efficiency, the company is presumably making some decision to change. There has been a rationalization by this company that has been substantial worldwide, with a whole host of companies closed all over the world in this particular firm.

Relative to the question of notifying people in advance, I think it was probably somewhat cavalier on the part of the individual not to have mentioned it first of all to the employees directly involved. On the other hand, to quote Mr. Barry Million, the acting vice-president of the United Auto Workers local: "I suppose we have more or less been expecting something like this, but it still comes as a surprise."

I admit a certain expectation has been going on here. I think the company was somewhat cavalier in not going to the employees first and explaining to them, rather than having it come out in the newspaper in the way it has. I think that is a mistake on the part of that corporation.

Ms. Coppins: Mr. Speaker, the minister was at the meeting this morning along with the rest of us, and I am sure he was just as shocked and surprised at the intransigence of Consolidated-Bathurst. Does he not agree that legislation should be brought in to make sure that when a company closes a plant, as is happening in the city of Hamilton, at the absolute least that company should give the workers first right of refusal at jobs in Consolidated-Bathurst plants in other areas—even that small concession that we were not able to wring from this company?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would say that I too was somewhat shocked, and I think somewhat surprised, at the intransigence of the company. I thought it would be a company somewhat more co-operative. As a matter of fact, the member will recall I stressed the view that I thought perhaps there was a major gap the company had failed to fill when shocking everybody with the announcement, because apparently at Christmas it was a plant that was going to continue and suddenly on March 1 there was the announcement it would close.

I do think, frankly, they should be offering some first right in terms of succession or of transfer of employment in other parts of the province, and that it is a mistake on their part not to do that. They have shown some intransigence through all of this, indeed a great deal of intransigence throughout, and I think they have paid the price, as the member referred to it when he spoke at the meeting. They have suffered the price of corporate citizenship in this process.

3:30 p.m.

As to whether there should be a law to force them to sell to the employees, in a case like this I would have to disagree with that. I do not feel that would be the appropriate thing. It would be wrong under the circumstances to force a company to sell to the employees.

It is in the essence of that company's best interest and, therefore, that of the employees of that company on a province-wide basis. There are three other plants in the province, in St. Thomas, Etobicoke and Belleville. I am sure it is in the essence of maintaining those three plants as strong, viable components that they ultimately rationalize.

At one point they offered to open the books to be looked at. At another point, after I had to leave the meeting, they indicated they were not too anxious to have anyone look at the books. That is something I would be prepared to pursue with them to determine whether there are the losses they are maintaining there are. I think such information could be supplied to employees and, therefore, there might be some understanding on their part.

The mistake that company is making is in not getting the message across to people that there may be a problem. They claim poor sales and they claim the company has been losing money for more than five years. The mistake they are making is not getting that message out. I think the member would agree with me.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, the minister will be aware that the recovery we seem to be talking about in our economy appears to be a profit recovery and not a recovery as far as workers are concerned.

The minister is aware that at that same meeting the company officials not only refused to give any preference to the workers in terms of transfers to other operations of Consolidated-Bathurst but when they were asked if they would intervene in terms of Reed, the company they are selling it to, as to whether they would attempt to get some preference for the workers in that plant, the company's answer was it would not interfere, it would not make that recommendation, and that company would get its labour on the market just as they did.

Are we now considering the workers in an operation like this are nothing but a market commodity? Is that exactly what we are down to in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, there is no question this company has made a botch-up of its public relations, of its employee relations and of its labour relations. There is no question that has happened.

Mr. Cooke: They just follow your philosophy.

Mr. Rae: They are just doing what you tell them to.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, would you invite the noisy one in the second row to desist for a moment until I finish the answer? I think it is sincere concern.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the minister proceed with his answer?

Hon. Mr. Walker: I feel there should be some preference extended to the employees in terms of other operations. I do not think that extends to dislocating people who are already working there, but in terms of any potential employment elsewhere, perhaps because of increased work load in the other centres, that should be extended to them. I feel they are making a mistake in that regard.

I do feel there was some positive aspect to this in respect of Reed, the neighbour, as a possibility. I would like to see that explored. I will put the services of my ministry fully at the disposal of trying to help that situation.

EDUCATION LEGISLATION

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Education (Miss Stephenson) and the Premier (Mr. Davis), to whom I might have put this question, I would like to direct this question to the Provincial Secretary for Social Development, who was kind enough to stay.

On many occasions, members of the Legislature have expressed their frustration with the lack of adequate opportunity to deal in a detailed way with the very complex issues that confront education. When Bill 127 came forward and when other legislation such as Bill 19 came forward, we noted that people used those occasions to bring all their frustrations about the educational system to the attention of the members of the Legislature.

Would the Provincial Secretary for Social Development be prepared to endorse the suggestion that a select committee on education be struck to deal with the many issues, such as the implementation of Bill 82, the implementation and recommendations of the secondary education review project report, the pooling of assessment of a commercial and industrial nature and the entire funding issue as it relates to education? Would she be prepared to support that to members of the cabinet?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member will know, of course, that this government has always attempted to provide a great deal of opportunity for consultation, regardless of the programs or the legislation that was being introduced. He will also know that I am not in a position today to make any such endorsement, but I will certainly pass it along to my colleague.

Mr. Bradley: Would the minister, as the policy minister in that entire area, not agree with me that a select committee on education, which the member for Oakwood (Mr. Grande) and I have advocated on many occasions as a reasonable vehicle to deal with educational issues, would be a good forum for the public to have the kind of input it deserves on education issues?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: As I have indicated, I will pass that suggestion along to my colleague.

Mr. Grande: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the intent of that question was, but ever since 1978 this party has been calling for a select all-party committee on education. The government has bucked that and does not want to do it.

What fears do the government have about the way the education system is in this province that lead them to the conclusion that they do not want parental involvement in the educational process in this province?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, I think if the honourable member will recall the hours and the days that were spent in consultation before that legislation was implemented, he will appreciate that we have nothing to fear. We welcome as much consultation as possible.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. Given the fact that as recently as last Sunday No. 2 gas was selling for 21.9 cents a litre in Thunder Bay, 53 cents a litre in Schreiber and $1.40 a litre in Fort Severn, all in Ontario, will the minister and his colleagues consider establishing a commission of inquiry to investigate the ridiculous pricing of gasoline, an essential product, in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the member knows, as all of us do, that there are certainly pricing differences, usually based on competition and the presence of—

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: No, competition within a large centre. You know that. Go to Sudbury from a smaller community and you know there are gas wars going on and they bring about lower prices. If you are opposed to that, then stand up and say so. You want all the prices to be high. I mean, state your position. Or would you just nationalize everything and solve the whole world's problems and have everybody out of work?

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Seriously, I would suggest to the honourable member that the federal government already has a commission of inquiry into petroleum marketing and pricing at the present time and I have no doubt that they will address those matters in their report.

Mr. Stokes: Given the fact that the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations, more than any other of the 27-odd ministries in this government, has the responsibility for consumer protection and for making sure there is some semblance of order in the marketplace, does the minister not feel it is part of his responsibility to the consumers of this province, when he gets wide discrepancies such as I noted in my original question, to bring about some semblance of order with regard to the price of gasoline in this province?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I can only reiterate what I have said in the past when this question has been asked. If there are those in this Legislature who feel that in our constitutional makeup in this country we should duplicate activities, nevertheless disregarding the obligations we have to taxpayers, then so be it. This government's position is very clear. With the federal government's commission of inquiry into the marketing of petroleum products taking place, we see no reason to duplicate that process.

3:40 p.m.

SUDBURY ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY

Mr. Elston: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Today we had an announcement dealing with acid rain. A couple of statements made in that announcement indicated that the mutual concern of New York and Ontario is "to apply the best possible science to study," and then it goes on, "to ensure that effective action is taken." Is the minister prepared to make a statement now that he will be following some of the recommendations or observations that followed from the Sudbury study on Inco and Falconbridge, which will require the reduction of emissions by the use of the most up-to-date technology available to eliminate those emissions?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member knows that from the outset the objectives of this province have been very clear both in general terms and with respect to the situation in Sudbury. Surely he is also aware that we have been awaiting the detailed review of the consultants' work or the task force's work on the most appropriate technology to carry the smelter operations to the next step in terms of reductions. As of this year they will have been reduced by 70 per cent from their peak emission periods. Obviously the next phase is becoming much more complex and costly, perhaps requiring some very substantial rebuilding of the plants. I can tell the member that I have now begun to receive the analyses of the companies involved.

Mr. Elston: How costly?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I can assure the member they are very substantial. In fact, the companies have put several millions of dollars into detailed consultants' work on appropriate technologies as well.

That is going to take a little further time to review, but I hope in the relatively near future I will be in a position to discuss the whole issue more broadly with my federal colleague the Honourable John Roberts and with my other provincial colleagues. Obviously we have been engaged for some time now in developing an overall Canadian strategy of which we are a significant part. This information will be critical in determining the allocation of reductions on a broader basis in Canada so that we can live up to our already stated commitment of a 50 per cent reduction in sulphur emissions in this country.

Mr. Elston: I realize there is a great deal of restudying and rehashing of the material that went into that study. So that we know what the minister is up to, is he prepared to set a time frame for its implementation or at least for the making of recommendations with respect to this study? It seems to me that for years on end we have been getting nothing but study after study and no time frame. As a result, no action is being taken.

Hon. Mr. Norton: That is a very self-serving question on the part of the member. He fails to recognize that this jurisdiction has taken some very decisive action on this issue. If he only did his homework a little more thoroughly he would have a better grasp on the complexity of the issue as far as the next step is concerned.

Could the member name any other jurisdiction in which there is in law, by way of regulation, a requirement that the major utility must reduce by 43 per cent over the next seven years? No, he could not. Could the member cite other jurisdictions that have already achieved the kinds of reductions we have? No, he could not.

I think it is important that he recognize at least the commitment that exists in this province and, furthermore, take the time to look at the report in some detail so that at least he can understand, or I hope have somebody explain to him, that it really is a very complex issue that involves not only specific measures with respect to Inco and Falconbridge but, on a much broader base, other corporations in this country. Therefore, it has to be part of our broader strategy for achieving the further 50 per cent reduction.

Mr. Elston: Since the minister has asked me, I can provide him with some answers if he requires my help.

Mr. Speaker: As a matter of fact, I think not.

Mr. Elston: I am willing to give that to him.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, I shall try not to offend the sensitivities of the Minister of the Environment.

Having read the report very carefully and, on behalf of my colleague the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) and our Environment critic the member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Charlton), having presented our options to the minister—since he has had our position since January—can the minister tell us why he will not seriously consider our option, which was to have Inco reduce its acceptable levels from the present 1,950 tons a day to 43 tons a day, and because of the cash-flow problems of both Inco and Falconbridge that there be upfront money provided now on the part of this government in the form of either loan guarantees, loans or equity participation?

First, why has the minister not responded to our position? Second, will he tell us what his position is in regard to those options which we presented to him?

Mr. Speaker: The question is, why have you not responded to their position?

Mr. Laughren: No, no. That is not the question.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, it was inviting a little more complete response to that, even though the honourable member perhaps failed to express it as articulately as he might. One can surely extrapolate a little from that question.

Mr. Speaker: Not really.

Mr. Elston: Keith, do you want somebody else to answer it for you?

Hon. Mr. Norton: No, I know the answer precisely. The fact of the matter is that the member's proposal, which even if he were being candid he would have to admit was not really based upon any in-depth analysis but really quite a superficial knee-jerk reaction to the report, although I do give him credit for having read the report; I am not sure that anyone in this party over here has—

Mr. Elston: Wrong again.

Hon. Mr. Norton: We will give the member a chance to recite the critical passages.

Obviously his input will be taken into consideration in the overall deliberations. In terms of the specific strategy for dealing with the next major step, which I am sure he, if he has read the report, understands may cost up to $1 billion, that strategy is something which will be an integral part of the ongoing meetings that I am having with my other provincial colleagues and my federal colleague in order to try to develop a comprehensive strategy across the country.

NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES LTD.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations.

In the statement he made today, when he got to the bottom of the page and said they wanted to depart from their tradition in order to correct some fundamental misunderstandings of the Ontario Securities Commission's procedures, I thought they were going to own up to the fact that they had goofed in their process, but apparently that was not so.

When the commission has stated, as it has throughout, that its decision was not to prosecute Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., Conrad M. Black and Edward G. Battle on certain counts under section 118 of the Ontario Securities Act—offences which if committed would result in jail sentences or fines or both—in his capacity as minister and as a lawyer I want to ask the minister if he calls that an administrative decision of the commission or a judicial, or as we lawyers like to say, quasi-judicial decision? Which of those two alternatives does the minister call a decision with respect to the prosecution of a citizen?

3:50 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, it may be a subject that the honourable member wishes to debate somewhere at some time, but I think the answer is very clearly put before him in the documents I have tabled in the House today, where it is clearly viewed by the commission under its statutory obligations for due administration of the act as an administrative process at that stage.

Mr. Renwick: The minister in his responses in this House on two or three occasions constantly refers to it as an administrative decision, but I noticed in the report in the Globe and Mail yesterday morning by correspondent Sylvia Stead that he referred to it as a quasi-judicial decision. He knows it is a judicial decision; he knows it is not an administrative decision.

My supplementary question to the minister is—

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: I do not know that, and the documentation I have put before the House from the securities commission supports the position I have taken. So the member cannot say that I know that is not so.

Mr. Speaker: Will the member for Riverdale place a supplementary, please.

Mr. Renwick: I was curious to hear the minister's colleague the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) on the Metro Morning program indicate the other day, in his delightfully facile, ad lib way when he is dealing with intricate legal problems, that the commission has a prosecutorial discretion as to whether or not it will make a decision with respect to prosecution.

Does the minister know of any prosecutorial discretion in the Ontario Securities Commission with respect to whether charges, when evidence is available, will or will not be laid? If so, would he point out to me where that prosecutorial discretion is conferred on the commission?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I think the act, as the member will know, really speaks for itself. A determination is made by the commission, who are advisers to me with respect to matters before them, when it is necessary to consult me as a result of the statutory obligation they have. Therefore, the act clearly states that if a decision is made to commence such a prosecution, they must have the consent of the minister. So I do not understand what the member is saying. It is clearly laid down in the legislation.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the exchange of the minister with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson) and the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) and I understand the minister's concern about establishing what he considers a bad precedent, that when an investigation is made and no charges are laid one does not usually release a report. I understand that; I think most of us understand that.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Your leader doesn't.

Mr. Roy: My leader understands that perfectly.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please.

Mr. Roy: What my leader does not understand is that you change your position. That is what he does not understand.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the member please place his supplementary?

Mr. Roy: I was provoked. You noticed that.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, how can the minister be afraid of establishing a precedent when he himself has bandied about certain names and some of the individuals involved here feel they have not been properly and judicially treated by the ministry by having their names bandied about?

Second, how can the minister fear establishing a precedent when we have a situation in which a commission is challenged by the police force and challenged by the law officers of the crown and, in fact, the minister has refused to allow the Attorney General to proceed with a prosecution? That is not an ordinary case.

Why is the minister afraid of establishing a precedent and why is he afraid of giving us the evidence? He wants us to accept his word. We want the evidence that the decision not to prosecute was justified.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Once again, Mr. Speaker, and I realize it is Friday tomorrow and we may all be planning to leave very shortly, there seems to be a fundamental—well, I have got to get my pen out if I am going to copy. There seems to be a fundamental misunderstanding. I want to say this to the member straight out and with full force.

Let me just clear the record with respect to some of the issues raised. I have got to get my pen out again, or can I get along without that?

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I do not need the pen.

I have not bandied names about, and if the member reads that statement and reads those letters, there have been principles discussed. No names have been bandied about. I think to say so is inappropriate. With respect, to suggest I have refused to allow the Attorney General to proceed shows a total lack of understanding of the process and shows the member has not read anything; not a thing.

Mr. Roy: You refused through the commission.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: The Attorney General clearly wrote to me, as I have said and he has said, asking that the commission review and reconsider its decision, acknowledging as he does and as I do that the legislation in this province creates a securities commission to perform a quasi-judicial and judicial role, and that it is the adviser to the minister who reports on behalf of its administration of that statute to this Legislature.

There has been no refusal to the Attorney General with respect to the laying of charges. Let us have that clear. The member has raised that before and he does not understand the issue.

With respect to the challenge by the police, there is no such evidence I know of. Clearly there are members of the Attorney General's staff who have a view with respect to the inferences that may be drawn from investigative documents. In the view of the commission, it is its obligation, with the knowledge it has and with the guidelines and understanding it has of the industry, to apply that knowledge to the information available and the inferences that can be drawn from it. It has done that and reached its conclusion.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: I think it is important at this point, given this discussion, to make the record clear.

I quote from information filed today, a letter from Mr. Dey to the minister, which says on page 3: "The commission's unanimous decision was not to recommend a prosecution under the act and was not varied following the special meeting earlier this evening. The commission also decided that, although it would not actively oppose your consenting to any request for a prosecution made by the Attorney General, it would inform you of its clear decision following the special meeting."

I think that sheds some light.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: I think it is entirely inappropriate. I appreciate there has not been much time to read all the documents, but a full and complete reading of the documents would make it clear to the Leader of the Opposition that the commission sees its role as one of advising this minister. Any role for the Attorney General with respect to requesting that a charge be laid by me is not within the scope of that legislation, nor their view of how the act should function.

What they have said is they would not contemplate any vigorous public objection if such a request were made, but they clearly see it would have been an improper request.

Mr. Peterson: On the point of privilege, it is just being patently silly—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the Leader of the Opposition please resume his seat?

Mr. Peterson: Clearly he has an authority to do so. That is what the letter says. He has no right to stand up and misrepresent—

Mr. Speaker: New question.

EDUCATION FOR MENTALLY HANDICAPPED

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Community and Social Services. As he is aware from the question asked of the Minister of Education (Miss Stephenson) last Friday by my colleague the member for St. Catharines (Mr. Bradley), parents of profoundly and severely mentally retarded children are extremely concerned about the implementation of Bill 82 and its effect upon their education.

Would the minister give consideration to attempting to persuade the Minister of Education to amend the necessary regulations or legislation necessary to permit these children to continue to be educated in the developmental centres operated by associations for the mentally retarded and funded by the Ministry of Community and Social Services?

Mr. Riddell: Frank Drea wants to close them down.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, before I answer that, I will handle the aside.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the aside, please.

Hon. Mr. Drea: He and his leader got run out of Bluewater the other night after they abandoned the parents. They should not forget it.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Drea: They abandoned them. They walked out on them.

Mr. Riddell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no privilege. The member for Huron-Middlesex—

Mr. Riddell: That is a misrepresentation of what went on. There is no way we abandoned the parents. We stayed there until the bitter end. Now tell the truth.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Interjections.

4 p.m.

Mr. Eakins: You sneak your information, like Larry.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind. The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Eakins: Larry must have told you how to get the information.

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjection, please.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I will ignore the interjection seeing it is from the calibre of person it came from.

Mr. Speaker: Now to the question, please.

Hon. Mr. Drea: And where he spent his day before he came here.

Quite honestly, I do not think there is the problem the member raises and, I believe, the member for St. Catharines raised last week. As far as my ministry is concerned, we do not think Bill 82 will make any difference in the funding arrangements or in the ability of the particular children to receive the education they have received. There is already the commitment, which I believe was given last Thursday or Friday by the Minister of Education, that if there is a problem, she will move to remedy it.

While I do appreciate the concern of the member, any fears that have been raised are unwarranted.

Mr. Bradley: What the minister is saying is that the situation for those children as it exists will not change. They will still go out to the developmental centres, they will still be educated in the developmental centres and nothing will change, despite the implementation of Bill 82. Is that what he is saying to us? Because if it is, they will be quite pleased with it. If it is not, is the minister prepared to persuade the Minister of Education to amend Bill 82 to permit it?

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Drea: I do not agree with the phraseology used by the member. However, in terms of the principle, as I said just a moment ago, neither the Minister of Education nor I sees the difficulty that is perceived by the group in Niagara concerning this matter. However, as she has already stated, if there is that problem, she will move to remedy it. In essence, as to who pays for the education and how it is arranged and provided, there will be no change.

DIGITAL CLOCK IN CHAMBER

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. Not only am I offended as a member of this House, but I think the people of Ontario will be offended. When they come to this chamber, they expect to see a chamber that has some history and some tradition to it. When I look at those digital obscenities across the way, I can only come to one conclusion: the only thing that did not happen a few minutes ago was for a siren to go off.

Whoever is responsible for them should take them out. Nobody on our side asked for them that I am aware of. I did not hear any member of my caucus stand up and say, "I want a clock." I notice the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk (Mr. Nixon), the former Leader of the Opposition, is not here today. I am sure if he were here, he would be up saying something about those digital obscenities.

Mr. Speaker: The member for St. Catharines, on the same point?

Mr. Bradley: Yes. The same point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: It is not really a point of privilege.

Mr. Bradley: Whatever you consider it to be a point of, I am prepared to comment.

Mr. Speaker: It is not even a point of interest.

Mr. Bradley: On a point of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The member is totally wrong in his assumptions, and it is just not correct.

Mr. Roy: He usually is.

Mr. Gordon: Nobody consulted me.

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to argue. Order.
[Later]

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: It would be useful for all members, because I have an entirely different understanding from that of the member for Sudbury (Mr. Gordon), for you to explain to us how it came about that we have this timing device in here. I think I fully understand why it is here and what prompted its installation in the chamber. But perhaps you could explain for the member for Sudbury just how this came about, because there is a very logical explanation. I think it would be very useful.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say on the point of order that it is interesting the member for Sudbury has revealed the basic attitude of his party towards technology, change and progress in the province as a whole. Now that we have digital time recorders in the House, we might even dare to have real television in the House in order that the people of the province would know what was happening in this place.

Mr. Speaker: All these decisions, of course, will be made by the members.

Mr. Gordon: How about a cuckoo clock?

Mr. Riddell: All we need to do is hang you on the wall.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Barlow: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: I would like to point out to you, sir, and to the House, that I notice what is probably an error in the sheet headed Business for Thursday. The standing committee on resources development, it says, was to have met this morning at 10. However, the Orders and Notices is correct when it says eight o'clock this evening. I would like to point out to members of the House that we did not meet this morning; we are going to meet this evening.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you. I am sure we are all better informed.

TRUST COMPANIES

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege with respect to my statement of April 19 regarding the trust companies. I would not want members of this House to think I had misled them with respect to the—

Mr. Kerrio: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I would like a point of order to his point of order to his point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we could just calm down. I ask the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) to resume his seat, please.

Mr. Kerrio: You haven't heard my point of order.

Mr. Stokes: Sit down, Vince.

Mr. Speaker: Come on, sit down. Resume your seat.

The minister rose on a point of privilege, which takes precedence over a point of order. I will hear the minister, and then I will hear anybody else who wishes to rise on something.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I would not want the members of this House to think I had misled them in my statement of April 19 with respect to the net amounts of money that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. had been required to advance to date with respect to the three trust companies.

The amounts I gave with respect to Seaway Trust and Greymac Trust were reversed. They should be Seaway Trust $7.5 million and Greymac Trust $33.5 million, instead of the reverse. The amount for Crown Trust is as stated.

PETITION

GAS PRICES

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, I have a petition directed to the Honourable John Black Aird, Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, and I would like it directed to the attention of the Minister of Energy (Mr. Welch). It is signed by 375 petitioners from my area, and it reads as follows:

"The undersigned wish to"—

Mr. Martel: The member for Sudbury (Mr. Gordon) should stay and hear where it came from.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, do I have to listen to that interjection? This is a pretty important petition.

Mr. Speaker: Of course it is, and I ask all the honourable members to give the member for Niagara Falls their undivided attention while he presents this petition on behalf of his constituents. Will the member for Niagara Falls please address the chair?

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, this petition is signed by 375 constituents from the great riding of Niagara who wish to signify their dissatisfaction with and strong disapproval of the grossly escalating gas rates. Many of these people are on fixed incomes. I concur with their feeling about the gas rates and support their position. I hope the government will take the necessary steps to reduce those costs.

MOTION

CITY OF TORONTO BILL

Hon. Mr. Gregory: Mr. Speaker, I move that in its consideration of Bill Pr3, An Act respecting the City of Toronto, previously before the House in the second session of this parliament as Bill Pr13, the standing committee on regulations and other statutory instruments may consider the proceedings taken before the standing committee on administration of justice on Bill Pr13 in the second session.

Motion agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

MINISTRY OF GOVERNMENT SERVICES AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Wiseman moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gregory, first reading of Bill 23, An Act to amend the Ministry of Government Services Act.

Motion agreed to.

EDUCATION AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Cooke moved, seconded by Mr. Grande, first reading of Bill 24, An Act to amend the Education Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooke: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, among other things, is to give parents and interested citizens the right to appeal school closings to the Ontario Municipal Board.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. Kolyn: Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to participate in this afternoon's debate and a timely opportunity to qualify my strong support for the throne speech. I recognize that the members opposite will disagree with the brief comments I shall make this afternoon, but I understand that their role is to be negative.

Today I would like to be positive—positive about one particular industry that is of special interest to my Lakeshore constituents and positive about the role this government would like to see the industry take. I am referring, of course, to the province's automobile industry, the nucleus of Ontario's manufacturing sector.

As all members know, automobiles account directly or indirectly for one out of every six jobs in the province. An estimated 20 per cent of Ontario's economy depends on the industry. Moreover, 95 per cent of the country's auto manufacturing is concentrated here in Ontario, a testament to Canada's dependence on the vitality of our province's auto sector.

These statistics underscore the significant contribution that automobiles make to the provincial economy and, indeed, to the national economy. But it is no secret that the industry throughout North America has fallen on hard times. Beset by a slumping economy, high interest rates, rising energy costs and changing consumer preferences, North American auto makers have also had to contend with intense competition from low-cost imports.

Currently, imported cars account for approximately one third of the market, with Japan alone enjoying 22 per cent of the market share. In fact, Japanese penetration into automobile markets is a world wide phenomenon: auto production throughout western Europe has fallen dramatically as a result of increased Japanese competition.

From 1980 to 1981, French output was down by 11 per cent, British production fell by 12 per cent and Italian output decreased by nine per cent. By comparison, North American production in the same period was down by only 1.8 per cent. Clearly, the problems affecting the province's auto industry are prevalent in a global context.

What is of interest to this government is the timing and structure of a recovery strategy. To this end, our government has taken an active role in the rebuilding process of the auto industry, outlining in precise terms the policy that we as a country should be following to get the industry back on its feet. Sadly, leadership has been lacking from Ottawa; and make no mistake about it, we are dearly paying the consequences.

On page 10 of the throne speech, presented last week by the Lieutenant Governor, our government reaffirmed its commitment towards a more just policy on automobile trade. The two brief sentences read as follows:

"In this regard, as a short-term measure, we continue to advocate, in the strongest possible terms, restriction in the number of imported cars to allow domestic industry time to adjust to the new circumstances and, more important, to permit time to obtain agreement from foreign manufacturers to increase significantly Canadian content in their products. Since we are not satisfied that federal officials are acting vigorously enough on this matter, we intend to increase our own efforts."

Our government's resolve to improve the deal that Canada gets from the world's major auto makers is both a sound and sensible policy. Foreign automobile exporters oppose import and content restrictions because of the added trouble it causes. None the less, manufacturing countries the world over have in place tough, broad trade measures which protect their domestic industries and their national interests.

For example, Italy has a one-for-one trade agreement with Japan, up to 2,000 cars each. France allows only three per cent of the market to be taken by the Japanese, while the Austrians, who require 85 per cent local content, restrict imports to 20 per cent of the market by levying duties of 58 per cent.

Last year, the Japanese agreed to hold exports to the United States to 1.68 million units, the same level as 1981. At the same time, the Americans were promised $300 million annually in parts purchases. Moreover, two Japanese auto firms, Honda and Datsun, have undertaken construction of vehicle assembly plants in the United States. The Japanese volunteered concessions because impending legislation was already in Congress. It is the old American logo of a little bit of arm-twisting.

There are two elements to these trade measures which are worth emphasizing. First, Canada should not be hesitant in its negotiations with Japanese car manufacturers. This country is the seventh largest market for motor vehicles in the free world. It is our responsibility as a country to ensure that the Japanese return a portion of their earnings to Canada in the form of investments and jobs for Canadians.

If we are not going to stand up as an equal partner in this trade relationship, as every other industrialized country already has, we should not expect the Japanese to volunteer benefits to Canada. I believe in fair trade, not free trade.

Second, the misguided notion that Canada is not in a strong trade position with Japan is just that: misguided. Like Australia, Canada by and large exchanges raw and semi-processed resources with Japan in return for processed and manufactured goods. But whereas the Australian government has successfully negotiated an intelligent, effective agreement with the Japanese, the Liberal government here in Canada appears to be ready to act only when it is too late. If Australia can do it, why can we not?

I have spoken at length about this particular facet of the automobile trade, because I feel very strongly that Canada is simply not getting a fair deal. Our government has tabled several proposals in regard to the auto trade which would improve the country's trade position so as to give Ottawa much-needed direction and purpose. However, it should also be evident that until the federal government of this country comes to grips with the gravity of the situation in the auto sector, little can be accomplished and negligible progress can be made.

This is not to say that responsibility for the current difficulties being experienced by the auto industry is solely in the domain of the federal government. Even the current federal government and its Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, deserve fair treatment. In fact, the hard times that have befallen Canada's automobile makers are also the responsibility of the unions and the industry itself.

To illustrate my point, I would like to recall briefly the events of a strike at one of the major auto makers in 1979. At that time, the issue was money to the unions and automation to the company. The unions believed that higher wages were appropriate because, among other things, the small car being built at the plant was popular in the United States and the Canadian dollar had been dramatically discounted as a result of the exchange rate. The company was adamant that a new production process incorporating significant robotics technology was necessary for the plant's long-term viability.

When the smoke had cleared, the unions and management could not co-operate on a strategy mutually beneficial to each; the unions won higher wages, although they were later outstripped by rampaging inflation in 1980, 1981 and 1982, and the company decided against a $100-million investment plan for the Ontario plant. Today, every unit of that same popular car is being made in Wisconsin.

The reason for this shift is simple: the workers and management in Kenosha, Wisconsin, realized that Japanese penetration into the North American car markets was a long-term threat to their job security. As a result, the unions negotiated for job security instead of wages, and management went ahead with the necessary automation. Thus, while American plants are correcting productivity problems to compete with the Japanese, Canadians are failing to realize that parity in productivity is the key to international competition.

In the early 1970s, when the Japanese wanted to know more about robotics, where did they go? They came to the National Research Council in Ottawa, which at that time was among the world leaders in basic robotics. All this knowledge was free for the asking, but Canadian industry did not seize the ideas and build them into practical, money-making enterprises. As a result, 10 years later, we are in a position of catching up with the nations that have been using our own expertise to capture world markets.

The moral of the story is quite brief. In today's world, unions and management will be made obsolete if they compete against each other. The real competition is outside our borders.

Moreover, technology is here and here to stay. Robotics technology is one of the big reasons Japanese imports are so competitive. A recent study conducted in Canada found the hourly wage of an assembly-line employee is three to four times as high as the combined capital and maintenance of a robot.

Furthermore, the adaptation towards robotics improves production flexibility and quality control. This fact is particularly evident given the prevalence of small cars in today's market. Because tolerances are much more precise, the need for robotics has become even more crucial.

With the competitive realities of robots and automated production systems a matter of record, our government is increasing its commitment to research and development in the field. The $40-million centres for robotics and computer-assisted design will accelerate the pace of research into these most powerful of productive processes.

Moreover, the $25-million auto parts technology centre in St. Catharines will promote technological development in the industry and integrate the increasing contributions from computers, new materials and design procedures with current production expertise.

Robotics represents the future, but we need to preserve our auto industry to make it relevant.

I would like to conclude my remarks by summarizing the key determinants of Ontario's strategy for long-term stability in the auto sector.

1. Protecting Canada's interests: Our government is on record as favouring temporary import restrictions to enable negotiations between foreign auto makers and Canada on the subject of content requirements. It is imperative that Ottawa act now on behalf of all Canadians to protect jobs and incomes here in Canada.

I also want to add that I am personally in favour of an investigation by the federal Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce into questionable trade practices by the Japanese government. In fact, I have recently forwarded a letter in this regard to the minister, the Honourable Ed Lumley, and I want briefly to relay its significant passages to the House.

"It is incumbent upon the government of Canada to ascertain whether our faltering position in the international automobile market is related to unfair trade practices from abroad. I can suggest two areas where inquiries should be made.

"Currency manipulation: Between the years 1978 and 1982, the Japanese yen depreciated by more than 50 per cent in the US despite modest inflation and high rates of growth in Japan. This result has favoured Japan because their exports have become cheaper in American and Canadian markets.

"Conventional economic analysis suggests that the yen should have strengthened rather than weakened under the circumstances. Accordingly, it is entirely possible that the Japanese government has purposefully manipulated exchange markets to enhance the competitiveness of Japanese products, particularly automobiles. If this is the case, would you not agree that offsetting measures are called for from the government of Canada?"

"Structural protectionism: Once again, consider the Japanese experience. In that country (and increasingly several others), key industries with high export potential enjoy preferential domestic treatment until they are strong enough to compete overseas. Regulations prohibiting foreign competition in the home market are largely bureaucratic to discourage interested exporters abroad. Moreover, domestic enterprises ready to enter foreign markets enjoy advantages unheard of in our country. These include accelerated depreciation and special reserves for tax purposes, exemption from anti-trust laws, subsidized low-interest loans and government-funded research.

4:30 p.m.

"That governments should provide essential support and protective services to industry is beyond question. But if government intervention constitutes a breach of fair trade between nations, would you not agree that counterbalancing policies should be developed to protect the interests of Canada?

"I pose these important questions to you on behalf of my Lakeshore constituents, who are justly concerned about the ongoing viability of Canada's automobile industry. We do not ask for extraordinary intervention from any government, nor should we expect to receive it. But consider our dilemma: If Canadian products are unable to compete worldwide because of unfair trade practices from abroad, or if Canadian jobs are lost because foreign competitors sell us products with no commitment to having them produced locally, who speaks for Canada?"

This letter was sent to the Honourable Ed Lumley one week ago. If any member opposite would like a copy of the complete text, I would happy to forward it to him.

2. The importance of technology: Our government has continued to support the development of technological research, particularly in the vital automobile field. Increasingly the competitive edge in the automobile industry will be a function of technological efficiency on the assembly line. For Canada to compete, the domestic auto makers must welcome innovation by investing in Canadian plants and Canadian equipment.

Before I move on to a third and most critical strategic requirement for Ontario's economic recovery I would like to mention again that an excellent series on technological integration appeared in the March and April editions of the Atlantic Monthly. In a two-part exposition of the subject by Harvard professor Robert Reich, the complex issue of technological restructuring, job training for post-industrial tasks and the liabilities of ignoring foreign competition are dealt with in a convincing and informative manner. I heartily recommend that all members endeavour to read it. I was pleased to hear my colleague the member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. J. A. Taylor) discuss it in detail a few days ago. It is an excellent presentation of a very complex issue.

Co-operation between management and labour: The automobile industry can no longer afford the confrontational system of decision-making that characterizes labour-management relations. New techniques of management and new processes of assembly line production have been exported to North America with very low-cost Japanese automobiles.

Now is the time for the industry and organized labour to map out a broad strategic plan covering the next decade. With their co-operation the province's automobile sector will not only survive the current challenges that it faces but will come out smarter, more efficient and better prepared to meet the changing market preferences of Canada's car market in the 21st century.

In conclusion, I would like to remind members that the Canadian-Japanese trade talks will resume in May. They should join us by letting their federal colleagues know where they stand on this very important issue. They should also send Mr. Lumley a letter supporting some restrictions on foreign imports into Canada.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be speaking today on the throne speech and after the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Kolyn). I found his talk very interesting, especially as it pertained to the areas of procurement policy, foreign exchange and matters like that. I intend to address those in my remarks today.

First, I would like to speak a little bit about the great constituency of Prescott-Russell, which I have the honour and the pleasure to represent in this Legislature.

Mr. Piché: I hope the member for Prescott-Russell has noticed there are only two members of his party listening to his speech.

Mr. Boudria: As I was saying before I was so rudely interrupted, in March 1981 I was given the honour and privilege to represent the people of the great constituency of Prescott-Russell in this Legislature. It has indeed been a very interesting time. However, our constituency has suffered from very serious economic problems during the past two years and for a number of years before that. Of late, with the downturn in the economy and all the other situations we have had facing us, the life of the people of Prescott-Russell has not been as good as it was before. It is our hope that the economy will pick up and we will finally be able to restore a good economic condition for the people of my constituency.

There are 19 municipalities in the riding of Prescott-Russell, and the riding is roughly 70 miles long and 30 miles wide. It is bordered on two sides by the province of Quebec and on the remainder by other constituencies in Ontario represented by the member for Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry (Mr. Villeneuve) and the member for Carleton East (Mr. MacQuarrie). One small area is bordered by the constituency of Carleton-Grenville as well.

Mr. Piché: How about Cochrane North? Where does that fit in?

Mr. Boudria: The riding of Cochrane North is not too close to my area, but I want the member for Cochrane North (Mr. Piché) to note that we do share many things. The member for Cochrane North was educated only a few miles away from my constituency, I understand, at the Collège Bourget in Rigaud, Quebec, which is just the other side of the Ontario-Quebec border to the east of my riding.

He also has many relatives in my constituency, but they are all Liberals. I am told all Pichés are Liberals as a matter of fact, with the exception of the member for Cochrane North. I suppose there is a black sheep in every family and we will forgive him, because sooner or later he is bound to see the light and see that his party does not represent his views, much less the views of his francophone constituents.

I would like to speak briefly of some of the goings on in the past two years in my constituency. We will all recall there was some dispute as to who was to be the Conservative candidate in Prescott-Russell in the last election. The incumbent member was challenged by another person who felt he was very qualified. He was going to be an instant cabinet minister and all those other things. This individual, whose name is Roland Saumure, ran for the Tory nomination and was defeated, but a fair number of Tories did vote for him.

Since then, he has been very involved in the local Conservative association and in all sorts of other things in my constituency. We will all remember last year he began to make trouble in the community of Bourget and when he did so at that time, of course, the Minister of Education (Miss Stephenson) promptly said to all of us that he, as past chairman of our school board, was responsible for the fact that the school in that area was not in the condition it should have been. So that put an end to that gentleman's political aspirations for a little while.

He came back, however, and wanted to organize a meeting between the local school boards and the member for Ottawa South (Mr. Bennett). The member for Ottawa South organized a little day in our area and it was called, as I remember it, Accountability Day. This, I suggest, means that at other times the local Tory cabinet ministers are not accountable. Anyway, on that particular day, they were accountable, which is always nice to know.

4:40 p.m.

Mr. Saumure organized this meeting in my area between the school board of my riding and the Tory representatives from our area. Here is the letter he sent to Mr. Saumure. I would like to read a few lines from it.

It says, "Mr. Roland Saumure, Case Postale 68, Bourget, Quebec." We all know that the people of Prescott-Russell and all the people of eastern Ontario, for that matter, have felt for some time that we were treated as though we did not belong in Ontario, but to have the gall to send a letter to one of my constituents—after all, Mr. Saumure is one of my constituents—and to address it Bourget, Quebec. That letter was sent by a Susan Goodman, special assistant to a cabinet minister responsible for eastern Ontario. We can see here the concern this government and this cabinet minister have when they do not even know that my constituency is in this province.

I would like to speak about some of the things we need in Prescott-Russell in order to improve economic conditions. The town of Hawkesbury has been the hardest hit of all areas of my constituency by the present economic downturn. Obviously, there are many things we need in order to re-establish employment in that area.

For a moment I would like to thank very sincerely the effort made by the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker). He has been most co-operative in trying to find new industries for Hawkesbury and has greatly assisted me and my constituents. He has not been partisan. He has been very open about sharing information with me and the town council. It is important for me to state that now because he has been very co-operative.

We have not yet found all the solutions; we have found some. Some industries are returning. Of course, for the major industry, the Canadian International Paper plant, we have not yet found a solution, a replacement for that employer. Hopefully that will come if we can continue having that kind of co-operation. Undoubtedly it will assist in that process. I hope and believe the minister will continue co-operating that way, and I want to thank him again.

One of the things Hawkesbury needs in order to regain its place in our province as a good, industrial community is an airport. We have a problem there, for the nearest airport is some 50 miles away, but there is an airport 50 miles away in every direction. There is one to the east, one to the northeast and one to the west, all about 50 miles away. There is difficulty in getting a local airport because of those factors but it is my hope that the Ministry of Transportation and Communications will provide for the needs of Hawkesbury so we can have a proper study done and get the grants to establish a small municipal airport for that community so that the people in industry could make use of such a facility. The town council has already written to the Ministry of Transportation and Communications to that effect.

On the throne speech, it is important to remember what some journalists have said about its content. I would like to make members aware of the editorial in the Ottawa Citizen. I am sure the member for Carleton East (Mr. MacQuarrie) has read it very attentively. I will repeat it in case he has missed a few lines. This was written by Don Butler on April 20.

"Anyone trying to make a case that throne speeches are a pointless ritual need to look no further than this week's Ontario speech from the throne for persuasive evidence.

"For 24 excruciating pages"—pardon my emphasis on the wrong syllable—"the Conservative government bobbed and weaved in an unsuccessful attempt to disguise the fact that it had nothing to say."

"The speech was so devoid of content that Premier William Davis was called upon to explain why it was necessary to inflict it on the populace at all. The best he could muster was that it was traditional to start a session with a throne speech and he is not one to mess around with tradition."

"In place of real information, the throne speech offers platitudes and empty phrases."

That is what we heard from the Ottawa Citizen.

I would like to speak about another newspaper in eastern Ontario that is not known to be quite so liberal. This one is called the Brockville Recorder and Times. Listen to this from its April 20 edition. It says, and I will recite it only in part:

"The opening of the Third Session of the 32nd Parliament of the province of Ontario was not the stuff of which history is made, but it could have been a splendid opportunity for a government long in office to reflect on its record and to outline its plans.

"Those 24 wordy pages could, for example, have explained the failures in the previous program related to last year's speech. Why had it not been possible, as announced at that time, to provide improved protection for severance pay in the case of failed companies; to strengthen equal pay provisions in law; to create new homemaker services for the independent elderly; to provide capital for young beginning farmers? Did the government change its mind?"

"Provincial issues of absorbing public interest have been the trust companies fiasco; the controversy over doctors' fees; the dilemma of rent control; public sector wage restraint. Why didn't the speech refer to these matters? Does the government not intend to take action with respect to them?"

Those are some of the comments of newspapers in eastern Ontario.

Mr. Conway: They are not very impressed, I take it.

Mr. Boudria: I think it would be fair to say that the people of eastern Ontario are not very impressed with the throne speech.

Mr. Conway: What does the Vankleek Hill Review say?

Mr. Boudria: I have not had the opportunity to look at the editorial page of the Vankleek Hill Review, but I will make the House aware as soon as I find out.

Let us talk about the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development document. It has been referred to as other things in this House. This was supposed to be the blueprint of the government. Well, it has been a blueprint for failure. BILD is simply not endorsed by the private sector and the other levels of government to the degree that had been anticipated.

Let me give members a few examples of how this document has failed. Let us talk a little bit about agriculture. The member for Carleton East (Mr. MacQuarrie) will relate to this, being an eastern Ontario person familiar with agricultural issues and having sat on municipal council.

Mr. Conway: They say he knew more when he was a Liberal.

Mr. Boudria: Oh, I'm sure that's true.

We will all remember, Mr. Speaker—you being from eastern Ontario as well—

Mr. Conway: That is stretching it.

Mr. Boudria: Well, okay. We will all remember that the BILD document stated that one million acres of land in eastern and northern Ontario were going to be tile drained. Wasn't it beautiful to hear that?

Let me tell members how that has worked. Right after the election in which we were promised all of those fine things, the government on two occasions raised the interest on tile drain loans. I know this morning they lowered it once. But at the time when interest was this low—the interest rate was six per cent on tile drain loans; now the government have lowered it to eight, so they are still two percentage points behind—as well, 75 per cent of the cost of tile drainage projects could formerly be lent by the provincial government; now the amount is only 60 per cent. When they made the new announcement today, they did not choose to raise it to the former figure of 75 per cent.

How is the government ever going to achieve the draining of one million acres of land in eastern and northern Ontario unless it improves the drainage? They never will so long as they have that kind of attitude.

At the time they were draining other parts of the province, the grants and the loans were favourable. The technology at that time could not accommodate the drainage of eastern Ontario, because the pipes would break up. Now that they have the proper technology we can drain eastern Ontario, but now they have withdrawn the favourable grants and loans that we used to have. That means we will always be behind so long as we have this government and this kind of philosophy towards improving the conditions of eastern and northern Ontario.

I want to talk a little bit about agriculture in eastern Ontario. I have spoken about this in the past, but I think it is important to restate it because it is very important.

4:50 p.m.

The area of farm land is decreasing all across the province at the present time. Of course, we all know that. It has decreased from 1971 to 1981 by some 6.5 per cent. However, at the same time that has happened, Russell county which I represent has had a decrease in productive farm land of 13.9 per cent, and Prescott county by 11.5 per cent. The government can see its programs for improving agriculture in eastern and northern Ontario are just not working.

Let us talk a little about the number of farms by county. Across the province, the number of farms has been reduced by some 12.9 per cent over the last 10 years. In eastern Ontario, there has been a decrease of 16.2 per cent. Again, we see eastern Ontario is faring worse than other areas of the province and this government is not acting.

Let us talk a bit about the provincial agriculture budget. Agriculture is an important issue in my riding, especially when the farmers of my area are not doing so well. We must remember that right on the other side of the Ontario-Quebec border there is a different situation in so far as encouraging farmers is concerned. We all recognize that all is not well in Quebec, but maybe enough is said of that. Let us concentrate on what is offered to agriculture in the two provinces.

The expenditure per farmer in this province is $3,057 per year; the expenditure per farmer in Quebec is $9,170. When the products go to market they get exactly the same price. How are the farmers from my area supposed to compete? They cannot because the economic conditions and the opportunities afforded by this government make it such they will never be able to compete.

Let us talk a bit about young farmers. We have had a recycled expression in this Legislature which is so old now, it is starting to grow grey hair. Last year's throne speech had a program for young farmers and last year's budget had a program for young farmers, but the program has never existed. One would think we would already have two programs for young farmers, but no, we still have none.

Guess what this year's throne speech had in it? It had a program for young farmers. Can the members believe it? But again we have no program for young farmers. Guess what? On May 10, I bet we are going to have a program for young farmers announced in the budget. That is going to be great. That will be four announcements for one program which still does not exist. The government has to do better than that. Never mind the rhetoric, just help out the young farmers in my area.

Mr. Andrewes: Beginning farmers.

Mr. Boudria: They are beginning. They have been beginning for 40 years. If this is the beginning, it is time it came to its end.

Mr. Andrewes: Beginning farmers; you missed the point.

Mr. Boudria: I want to talk about housing problems. The Ontario home renewal program has been fairly successful in my part of the province. It is one of the few programs this government has ever implemented that actually worked. In my constituency, municipalities have received considerable benefit from this program. I will name one or two examples, but will not read them all.

For instance, the town of Rockland has received $344,000 since the inception of this program. The money was recycled and brought in to help out the less fortunate people of that town.

Other municipalities have had considerable benefits as well. For Hawkesbury, $515,000 has been lent through the OHRP program. This year, when Hawkesbury is suffering the worst economic situation it has probably ever had, guess what the government did through the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett), the same guy who came to be accountable to the people of my area the other day? He cancelled the program. Can the members believe it? He cancelled the program during the worst hardship the population of my constituency has had.

I call upon this government to reinstitute the Ontario home renewal program or something like it because we need something to assist people to keep their homes in my area.

I want to talk a bit about another issue which has been a thorn in the side of many people. It is unfortunate the member for Algoma (Mr. Wildman) is not here because he has raised it on several occasions as well. It is the whole issue of how this government treats residents of mobile homes.

The treatment that has been inflicted on those people by the neglect of the government is almost beyond description. This government has chosen to ignore even the existence of all the residents of mobile homes of this province. The only thing I have ever seen them do is publish this three- or four-page information kit that is filled with almost useless information. It should be telling them instead, "Warning: this government does not wish to help out anyone who chooses to reside in a mobile home park."

I tried to introduce a bill in this Legislature to assist residents of mobile home parks last year, a private member's bill, and the government chose one of its members to speak against my bill. Guess which member they chose: the member for Lakeshore. How many mobile homes, Mr. Speaker, do you think there are in Lakeshore? Maybe the member for Lakeshore does not even remember speaking on the bill. The document was just handed to him, and it was said, "Here, member for Lakeshore, read this in the House this afternoon." Has he ever seen a mobile home? Oh yes, he visited his aunt when he was a kid, she used to live in a mobile home. That is probably the only time the honourable member even got close to a mobile home.

I represent thousands of people who live in mobile homes. I have been in them many times. I have assisted the people of the Bellevue mobile home park in Orleans, when the former Tory candidate in the 1977 election in the riding of Ottawa Centre cut their water off last year. That was the government's candidate in the 1977 election, Mr. Brian Cameron. We will read up on his name for the 1977 election and see what he did to those people and how they suffered, weekends without water, Christmas Day without water, New Year's Day, because he could not get the rent increase that he wanted from the rent review commission.

That is what he did, and that is a former Tory candidate. Another Tory, a member, of course, blocked my bill to try to protect those people in my riding. Shame on them.

One of the things that has not been addressed very seriously by the government is assistance to small business. This government should really increase its commitment towards assisting the small business sector in this province. As we know, a great percentage of the employment is created by the small business area and it is fine to help out the large companies when they are in a difficult situation, the Chryslers and so forth of this world, but we have to remember that small business is what it is all about.

Undoubtedly some of us have come from small towns in Ontario and rural areas. We know what is going on, we know what it is to drive through one of our small villages and see that half of the stores are boarded up and shut down and the people are now purchasing in larger cities. Our small businesses are just disappearing and it is high time that all of us started to realize the importance of that sector and what it has contributed to our society in the past and what it could contribute to in the future if we all gave it assistance.

Mr. Stokes: The province of opportunity.

Mr. Boudria: The member for Lake Nipigon says it well: the province of opportunity. It used to be written on our licence plates, but they do not write it on the licence plates any more, and it is small wonder, because the opportunity is gone under the leadership of the government that we have here.

Mr. Kolyn: Where would you rather be?

Mr. Boudria: In a Liberal Ontario, that is where I would rather be.

Mr. Treleaven: That is a fantasy land.

Mr. Boudria: Time will tell.

I would like to speak briefly about our youth in this province, the most precious resource that we all have. After our youth nothing else is important. The future exists only because of them, but it sure does not look that way when we look at the situation they have right now. It is very serious, and I want all members to pay very close attention to this. There are 233,000 young people in this province who do not have jobs.

I started working some years ago, and I did not have a very good job when I started, I acknowledge that, but at least I had a job. I am sure that all honourable members of this Legislature, when we tried to, had a job. How many young people today are afforded that same opportunity?

5 p.m.

Many people come to see me here in my office at Queen's Park, people from downtown Toronto and many other areas. They cannot find a job. They are people who are well educated and highly qualified. They are people who could be making large salaries and a decent living. They cannot find jobs. It is especially serious for our young people when one out of every four under the age of 25 is not working. It is not only a shame, as the member for Renfrew North (Mr. Conway) said: it is a disaster. I think this government has abandoned its youth.

I would like to speak briefly on environmental issues. One environmental issue in my constituency that is very controversial at this time is the toxic dump site that was to have been established in the municipality of South Plantagenet. Now we hear the dump site will not be located there. I, of course, am rejoicing at that thought, simply because toxic waste is not produced in eastern Ontario.

I know you are probably thinking this is another one of the "not in my backyard" type of situations, Mr. Speaker, but I assure you that is not the case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): I appreciate that you thought I was thinking at all.

Mr. Boudria: If the government wants to bring us the jobs that create that toxic waste, we will gladly accept our share of it. But so long as we do not have the economic benefits I fail to see why Prescott-Russell has to accept the burden. The people of our area do not intend to, and I am glad to see the government has finally changed its mind and seemingly will place that dump someplace else in Ontario where at least they get the benefit from it.

Maybe we should speak for a moment on government waste, which is a topic all members are familiar with because it has been raised on some occasions in the past.

We should talk a bit about the fact that this government has spent very large amounts of money on advertising to tell us such great things as "Good Things Grow in Ontario," with strawberries on large bulletin boards in the middle of February, which just happened to be prior to the last election. It is a mere coincidence, I am sure. Of course, it said at the bottom, "Honourable Lorne Henderson, Minister."

It was just to remind us that all these good strawberries are grown in February in Ontario because we have a Tory government. I think we will need a lot more than a Tory government to make strawberries grow here in February.

Mr. Barlow: Every speech the member gives he says the same thing.

The Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Andrewes: What about the other things we grow in Ontario? Do we not have any beef producers?

The Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for keeping the honourable members on the other side in line. I am glad to see you are doing that.

Maybe we should talk a little bit about Minaki Lodge. We have heard about it on several occasions.

Mr. Ruston: All $50 million worth.

Mr. Andrewes: On opening day the member will be there will bells on.

Mr. Boudria: Let us recall that the original Minaki Lodge was acquired by the government in trying to protect its $550,000 loan. The government loan was $550,000, the party defaulted and then the government seized the property.

Then it spent $4.8 million in 1974 to 1976. Then it had a restraint program and it could not do that again because that was too much money being spent. A short while later it decided it was going to revive Minaki, after spending $4.8 million to save a $550,000 facility. In so doing, it spent $28.4 million renovating the lodge. Remember, this is a $550,000 lodge it was renovating.

There was $15.9 million spent on the road leading to Minaki. After all, the government could not have a $28.4-million renovation without having a $15.9-million road leading to it. That would be totally illogical. So the government has done all this. Of course, it also spent $850,000 improving an airstrip nearby so one could land to go inside the $45-million lodge.

5:10 p.m.

All in all, it spent $45 million on the facility. Do the members know who that is going to serve? It is going to serve the rich and only the rich. The member's constituents will never use it, and he knows it.

Mr. Piché: Why are you against Minaki? Is it because it is in northern Ontario?

Mr. Boudria: As I was saying, it is going to cost $135 a day to live in Minaki Lodge. I would like to know how many constituents from Cochrane North have $135 a day to live in that kind of a wasteful facility.

Mr. Piché: What about the millions being spent in the south? Any time there is something in the north this is what we hear from the opposition.

Mr. Boudria: Something in the north? I am sure the people of the north would have preferred jobs.

The Acting Speaker: I would ask the member for Cochrane North to please respect the time of the member for Prescott-Russell who has the floor.

Mr. Piché: He is not respecting any of us in the north when he talks against Minaki.

The Acting Speaker: I would ask the member for Prescott-Russell to try to be not quite so provocative.

Mr. Boudria: I will try not to be provocative, but the member for Cochrane North should know that his constituents do not want that kind of wasteful expenditure any more than we do.

Let us talk about the land assembly deal that the government has got into. They spent $508 million buying land all across the province because a former Treasurer had a dream. He called it a vision.

Mr. Ruston: Yes.

Mr. Boudria: Yes, the member for Essex North tells me it was a vision that the Treasurer of the time had; a $508-million vision.

Some of that land was bought in my area; $13.8 million worth was bought in an area known as Carlsbad Springs, just on the edge of my riding. As the member for Carleton East (Mr. MacQuarrie), who has now left the chamber, would know, because he too represents a part of Carlsbad Springs, one can hardly walk in the fields of Carlsbad Springs without sinking, let alone try to build any kind of housing structure in that area:

As we know, there are cartoons displayed downstairs. One of those cartoons is of the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett) driving a horse and buggy and it says, "Carlsbad Springs." With his horse and buggy he is sinking right up to the neck in the area. It really explains the folly of the government in buying land for such a venture. I guess that cartoon came from the Ottawa Citizen, but it really described the situation quite well.

Mr. Conway: Claude said some of those land purchases were "evidence that the ministry was off its nut."

Mr. Boudria: Yes, I heard that as well. The member for Ottawa South (Mr. Bennett) did describe it that way.

Maybe we could speak a bit about social issues. I do not want to take too much time doing that because I will have the opportunity of doing so when we start the estimates process. But we have to state a few things. First, the record of this government as it pertains to women's issues, and the record is not very good.

M. le Président, je crois qu'il serait important maintenant de parler de la pauvreté dans la province de l'Ontario, et plus spécialement de la pauvreté chez les femmes. J'ai devant moi l'éditorial du quotidien d'Ottawa, Le Droit, du jeudi 10 février 1983, qui s'intitule "La pauvreté a le visage d'une femme." Je n'ai pas l'intention d'en citer de longs extraits, mais je voudrais dire qu'il présente une situation intolérable: celle des femmes dont le salaire moyen n'est qu'un peu supérieur à 50 pour cent de celui d'un homme.

Cette situation est tout à fait inacceptable. Je suis moi-même père de famille. J'ai une fille, petite encore, mais qui deviendra grande. Je refuse — et refuserai toujours — d'accepter le fait que ma fille vaut 50 pour cent du fils d'un autre. Cette situation est vraiment intolérable que ce gouvernement se doit de rectifier, afin d'assurer l'égalité des femmes et des hommes dans cette province.

Le gouvernement a annoncé dans le discours du trône qu'il y aura dorénavant un ministre responsable de la condition féminine. J'espère que cela va réussir, car nous avons déjà eu un ministre dont les fonctions étaient un peu semblables, mais qui n'a absolument rien fait.

It is important to state that the government's record on women's issues is not all that great. For a number of years we have had a minister who was supposed to be responsible for the status of women, and look where it got us. The average salary of a woman is a little bit more than 50 per cent of the average salary of a man.

5:10 p.m.

There was a report stating that one out of every 10 women is a battered wife. You for one will recall, Mr. Speaker, having been a member who sat on that committee, that not much has been done since our report was prepared to improve that situation. I know the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea) said he would have an answer and a reply to our report on or before the end of April.

Mr. Kolyin: It is the 28th.

Mr. Boudria: This is April 28. That leaves him only a couple of days in which to reply to that report.

I certainly hope the government takes seriously the very constructive report we made in order to improve that area of women's issues, which can be addressed right away because the report has been done. The work has been done by the social development committee of this Legislature.

Another area of social issues we should be concerned with—and there are several, of course—is the whole area of the visually impaired. I have brought this situation to the attention of the Legislature in the past. Some 14,000 people in this province are legally blind, but about 80 per cent of them still have some sight left. As a society, we have not concentrated on helping those people to see. Instead, we have spent our resources on getting them used to the fact that they are blind.

The whole focus of that issue is totally wrong. Most of them can be helped. I really think the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman), the Minister of Community and Social Services and their boss the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch) could do something to improve that situation.

The Minister of Community and Social Services was the subject of an article called, "An Informative Interview with the Honourable Frank Drea, MPP for Scarborough Centre," in his constituency mailout. I guess that constituency is not far from yours, Mr. Speaker, so perhaps you have had the benefit of seeing this questionnaire.

In it, someone was interviewing the minister, who was asked the following, "Compared to other provinces, are you generally satisfied with the level of social services in Ontario?" The minister replied: "I suppose the current annual expense of our provincial budget for community and social services, in the amount of $2 billion, is a pretty good indicator of Ontario's leadership in the field. Most importantly, the quality of our services is second to none in any other country."

Maybe the minister is satisfied with what is being done in the area of social services in this province, but I for one am not. When a recipient of general welfare assistance in this province has to live on $230 a month, plus a housing supplement if he or she qualifies, that is totally unsatisfactory.

I am very disappointed in the minister making that kind of statement, that he was satisfied with the present situation. It is the only thing he could have said as he has not yet convinced the cabinet to give more money, but at least he could have indicated to us that he is personally concerned. He has not even chosen to do that.

We could speak briefly on the francophone issue. We all remember that recently the provincial government issued a white paper entitled, A Proposal in Response to the Report of the Joint Committee on the Governance of French-Language Elementary and Secondary Schools. I am sure all honourable members will recall that this report was released a few weeks ago, only a few days before the throne speech, which refers to the issue again.

When we started to discuss the throne speech in this House, the mover of the response for the government was the member for Sarnia (Mr. Brandt) and the seconder was the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Eves). The member for Parry Sound represents a town known as Mattawa. We all know the very serious school conflict that has occurred in that community and how important the issue of francophone education is in Mattawa.

Not one word in the response from the member for Parry Sound was directed towards francophone education, not even after I and other members of this Legislature reminded him of that issue and urged him to speak about it in his reply to the address of His Honour. He never chose to say a word.

That is very unfortunate and it goes to explain—how should I say it? I guess we cannot accuse any member of being hypocritical—I think it indicates the hypocrisy of the government in this area. Let me give an example of how different members have conflicting views that they voice privately to their own constituents on the issue of francophone education.

Members know, of course, the government prides itself in my constituency in telling everyone what a fantastic job it does in providing francophone services. Let us see what some members of the government say.

Members will recall the 1979 by-election in the riding of Carleton, a time when the government published a little flyer in the riding stating: "If you don't want bilingualism à la Trudeau," or something like that, "vote for us." That was the same Tory government. But perhaps we should not go back that far in history, because maybe they are more enlightened since that time.

Here we have a copy of a newspaper from the constituency of Hastings-Peterborough. In an interview, the member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. Pollock) says the following when they start discussing francophone services:

"However, there is one program not easily acceptable to Pollock," that, of course, is the member for Hastings-Peterborough, "a white paper on the province's French-on-demand plan that would permit francophones to request education in their mother tongue." Those are comments made by the member for Hastings-Peterborough to that newspaper from his own constituency.

It does not exactly say the same thing as the Minister of Education (Miss Stephenson) says or what some other honourable ministers from that government say. We can see the concept of this government most of the time, practically all of the time, telling francophones they are giving them everything and telling the anglophones they are giving nothing to the French.

The amount of work and energy spent in doing that, had it been put towards productive areas of this province instead of trying to hide one side from the other, would have been far better spent. The whole issue of francophone education is not solved merely by the fact that this response has come up. First, we are not sure whether the government will ever implement it.

Mr. Bradley: It was not announced during the Carleton by-election.

Mr. Boudria: No, it was not announced during the Carleton by-election. That is a very interesting point. I am sure it is a mere coincidence that it was announced at approximately the same time as the Premier (Mr. Davis) was toying with the idea of running federally and trying to get Quebec delegates' support.

However, some people have dared to question whether the Premier was trying to get Quebec delegates' support by releasing that report. Is that not something? I am sure it has crossed the minds of a few of us upon occasion.

Last year I did a study on the whole issue of francophone education in northern Ontario and released the report that is here. This is entitled, A Right or a Privilege: The Federal Inquiry into Francophone Minority Education in Ontario.

I suggest the response to the white paper released by the government does not even address some of the issues or problems that will exist in the area of francophone education, especially as it refers to the powers of the Languages of Instruction Commission of Ontario. I think the government must address itself to the powers of that commission, otherwise there will always be conflicts.

Let us remember that the statement of October 5, 1979, by the Minister of Education made it quite clear the government wanted to provide better education for francophones, but it never established the proper structure to do it.

5:20 p.m.

In other areas that concern the francophone population, I want to speak very briefly to the issue of health care services for our French-speaking population.

Les services de santé offerts aux francophones de l'Ontario sont tout à fait inadéquats, M. le Président. Il est important de souligner, par exemple, qu'il n'y a pas même, à l'hal de Hawkesbury, un psychiatre à temps plein capable de communiquer en français avec les francophones de la région. Nous n'avons qu'un psychiatre à temps partiel. C'est donc une grave pénurie.

J'ai parlé l'an dernier de cette situation à l'honorable ministre de la Santé. En réponse à une question que je lui avais posée, il m'a dit ne faire aucun effort pour mettre des annonces dans les journaux des autres provinces, par exemple au Québec, pour recruter médecins et cadres des services de santé pouvant servir la population francophone de l'Ontario.

Je me demande si le gouvernement prend vraiment au sérieux le fait d'offrir des services de santé en français aux francophones. Pourquoi n'est-il pas possible de mettre des annonces dans les journaux de Montréal ou ailleurs au Québec, indiquant le besoin de médecins francophones dans Prescott-Russell, dans le Nord ou dans d'autres régions et expliquant les avantages fiscaux et autres que trouverait un médecin québécois à venir s'installer dans notre région? Mais non, le gouvernement n'a jamais rien fait.

Quelques essais timides ont été tentés pour encourager les jeunes à intégrer le système universitaire dans les services de la santé. Mais c'est tout. Alors je pense que si l'on veut offrir un meilleur service, on se doit de faire une campagne sérieuse ailleurs, pour recruter des cadres dans le domaine de la santé.

I would like to talk a little bit about consumer protection. We all recall the trust company incident of some months ago, and again the issues are being raised in this Legislature right now in the whole area of consumer and commercial relations.

One area the government should address itself to is the protection of consumers buying automobiles. It is interesting that the subject of automobiles was brought up earlier on. This government should have the kind of legislation that exists, for instance, in Connecticut and California—in effect, a lemon bill, as it is referred to in those jurisdictions. I intend, shortly, to introduce a private member's bill, a bill that would be entitled that way, a lemon act, to protect consumers in this province against purchasing new automobiles that may be so defective as to be inoperative, that are just no good. I believe a government should take legislative measures to ensure the consumers are given their money back when such a thing happens.

The Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Elgie), when he became quite unpopular last year after the trust company controversy, decided to do something to be the saviour of the world. What he chose to do, of course, was to ban kickboxing. What banning kickboxing has to do with increasing the minister's popularity, I still have not quite figured out.

However, the minister came into this House one day and made an announcement that from then on kickboxing was going to be banned. Is that not interesting? He said it was a very dangerous sport. We asked him if anybody had ever been hurt. He said: "Well, I don't know. Probably not." We asked if anybody had ever been hospitalized overnight for an accident involving kickboxing. He said: "No. We have no such record." We asked if there were any complaints about the sport. He said: "No. But I banned it anyway."

If the logic of that somewhat escapes you, Mr. Speaker, you are not the only one. He did say the power of a foot was 20 times that of a fist. Imagine. Jean-Yves Theriault, the world champion kickboxer, stated, "If my foot were 20 times the power of my fist, I would kick right through somebody and my foot would come out the other side." That shows just how ridiculous was that kind of statement, made by the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, which indicated a total lack of understanding of that sport. He only did it to try to take the focus off other issues he was unpopular for.

Very briefly, I would like to talk about 1984, which is the year we will be celebrating the supposed 200th anniversary of this province. I for one do not intend to celebrate 1984. I do not believe it reflects the accuracy of the 200th anniversary of this province. We should celebrate that in 1991. The Constitutional Act was signed in 1791; and 200 years after 1971, according to my calculator, equals 1991, not 1984. I challenge anybody to rig the mathematics to tell me otherwise. That is blatantly political. All they are doing is using that year as a springboard for their election.

Let me give an example of how they are doing that. I talked about Roland Saumure, the fellow who organizes the connections between the Tory party and people in my area, that fellow who was sent a letter stating, "Bourget, Quebec." Who was chosen to co-ordinate the bicentennial celebrations in my riding? Roland Saumure, the defeated Tory candidate for the nomination. Again a mere coincidence, but this is not a political event.

"We are not trying to bring Her Majesty here for political purposes," says the government. "Absolutely not. We just chose defeated Tory candidates to run this in various ridings as a coincidence." I suppose it is because Mr. Saumure happens to be very qualified in matters pertaining to the bicentennial of the province. I am sure that will not do him much good either.

In concluding, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not take some time to talk about the procurement policy of the government. Members will remember last year, after being provoked by the member for Cambridge (Mr. Barlow), I rose in my place and talked about the fact that this government was not doing too well in its procurement policy. I would like to report progress today.

I have here a pen from the Ministry of Intergovernmental Affairs. This is a Bic pen. This Bic pen, in addition to "Renseignement Ontario, service en français" and all that—they give them out in my riding, although not too much in Hastings-Peterborough—is marked "Made in USA."

I just came back from the lobby and picked up this tray we use to put dishes on. It says, "Camborough Manufacturing, Huntington Beach, California." Is that not progress? A year later, that is how much we have progressed.

We have another item here made by Camborough in California. Again, here is a cardboard box made in Franklin Park, Illinois. This is a government of Ontario diary that we use. It is made by the Sheaffer Eaton division of Tetrion Inc. and is marked "Printed in USA." We are doing really well. This is a paper product, and trees are very scarce in this country.

Here we have a paper moistener made in Carlstadt, New Jersey. We are doing very well. Two years later, we are progressing.

Here is something members will be interested in. The Minister of Government Services (Mr. Wiseman) comes from the riding of Lanark. In that riding is a little town called Perth. Perth prides itself in its scissors factory. It produces scissors, just beautiful scissors. There are two pairs here, both government issue. This one is made in Taiwan and this one in England. That is producing a lot of jobs in the constituency of the Minister of Government Services.

Here we have little yellow scratch pads. They come from the Ministry of Government Services catalogue. These are 3M scratch pads from St. Paul, Minnesota.

We have my favourite item here, the Royal Doulton fine hotel ware used in our dining room downstairs. Again, much progress has been made over the last year in its procurement policy. I challenge this government to do something about that policy, to update it, to give a break to Canadian industry.

5:30 p.m.

We heard from the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker) last week that nobody makes a stapler in this province. We know that because this government stapler says, "Swingline Inc., Long Island County, New York."

Mr. Conway: The stapler must have come along with the member for St. George (Ms. Fish).

Mr. Boudria: That is possible. Here we have gummed labels, paper labels. These gummed labels, glue government issue, are made by the Dennison Manufacturing Co. in Framingham, Massachusetts, USA. We are doing very well in our buy Canadian policy.

We have a glue stick and it is made in West Germany. Glue is very scarce in Ontario. We have a highlighter pencil. Where is this one made? It is made in the United States. We have here a staple remover made in Hong Kong. We have a letter opener made in Korea. We have a brand-new paper punch made in England. All in all, we have a very good record here in Ontario for our procurement policy.

There is one area of progress. We still use Paper Mate pens with the government of Ontario logo on them, but I am glad to say the government has finally told the supplier, "Please do not write 'Made in USA' on them any more." It is probably the same pen, but at least it does not say "Made in USA" on the government of Ontario pen.

We have achieved enormous progress over the past year. I am glad to say part of the clock we bought for this Legislature was manufactured in Burlington; but the dials, which the member for Sudbury (Mr. Gordon) was complaining about, are made in England. That is the progress we have achieved in this Legislature over the past few years.

I would like to thank the honourable members for their attention, and I again want to stress that this government has not lived up to its promise of 1981. It has not kept the promise. It has done everything but keep the promise.

Mr. Conway: Do they make bow ties in Canada?

Mr. Boudria: Maybe they do. We are going to find out some day whether they make bow ties. I sure hope we begin to do something so we improve the economy of this province. A good, strong Canadian procurement policy by this government can go a long way towards achieving that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): I would like to thank the honourable member from the Mel Swart school of show and tell. Does any other honourable member wish to participate?

Mr. Stokes: I think that is very inappropriate.

The Acting Speaker: I withdraw the remark.

Mr. Stokes: I think that is very inappropriate for somebody who is occupying the Speaker's chair, an unseemly remark like that.

The Acting Speaker: I withdrew the remark. Does any other honourable member wish to participate in the debate?

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, my reluctance to stand was based on the understanding that the Conservative Party was about to have a speaker rise in his place but, given that is not the case, I will gladly proceed.

Let me begin by reflecting on the comments made by one of our well-known columnists who, a day or two prior to the throne speech being introduced, reflected on this theme:

"Lieutenant Governor John Black Aird would do us all a favour if he opened the Ontario Legislature on Monday with an apology for his government's failure to live up to expectations. It wouldn't be difficult, something like, 'In a moment the throne speech, but first I want to say that I'm really sorry I made some promises last year that my government couldn't keep.' Then he could call the Premier before him and ask him to explain why certain promises were not kept, threatening to throw him into the federal leadership contest if he had no satisfactory answer."

We all enjoy a little bit of humour from time to time and that, of course, was the intent of the columnist, Mr. French. Beyond that, he was drawing to our attention something that is overlooked from time to time by us in the Legislature and certainly by the people of Ontario, and that is the promises of earlier throne speeches or earlier statements by the government.

To give the members some evidence of that, I want to go back through a few of these comments from the past 10 or 12 years and point out that many of the promises made were not kept.

Here is a statement from March 1971. The government said: "The current unconscionable levels of unemployment which have been forced upon the Canadian people will be combated with every means at the disposal of this provincial government. The budget will be presented on April 26. Its purpose will be to restore the inherent vitality of our economy so far as this is within provincial competence."

In February 1978, the government said: "Relieving the current state of unemployment is, in many respects, beyond the control of a provincial jurisdiction. Ontario believes, therefore, that we must seek national answers to national problems and that we strengthen Canadian responses to larger economic challenge only throughout co-ordinated initiatives." Of course, it went on for the following four or five years to bash the federal government.

Here is another statement from Ontario, going back to 1971: "Summer employment for students will also require increased government assistance. Programs have been created to enable students to demonstrate their personal initiative, respond to their concern about the environment and acquire funds which will permit their education to be continued."

Here is another government statement, from 1972: "My government will continue in the summer months the employment for youth program and will increase the scope of this program by providing additional funds for its activities."

Again from 1971: "My government has also been most concerned to ensure that young people are not disadvantaged in the search for work."

From 1981: "A community counselling program will be developed to tap the resources of our young people and guide them towards worthwhile and productive jobs."

About job training, it said in 1978: "Despite the numbers of unemployed and underemployed, a shortage of skilled tradesmen has been recurring in the manufacturing sector. This paradox can only be resolved by a training program especially geared to satisfy the manpower needs of industry. Development of such a program will be given the highest priority during the year."

I have referred to only four pages of 16 pages of such quotes that I have; and, given the opportunity to speak for two or three hours, I could go on and repeat most of what I have just said in those few comments.

The point is that this particular speech from the throne leaves much to be desired. Our leader put it quite succinctly when he said in reaction to the speech that the Conservative government's response to this province's current economic ills is to await a recovery led by the private sector, increased consumer confidence and events in the United States.

On the basis of this year's speech from the throne, the Conservatives feel no compulsion to take the lead in promoting an economic recovery; nor is there any indication that it is positioning itself to deal with the challenges of the technological changes which are already besetting Ontario's industries.

My leader went on to say: "There is no indication of any new job creation program. In particular, the government has abdicated its responsibilities for the hundreds of thousands of unemployed youth in this province by ignoring any new programs aimed at this most distressing of all our current economic problems."

I am a little confused when I read through this speech to read statements such as we find on the very opening page in which the government indicates that it feels the restoration of confidence has begun, and yet it goes on in the next breath to say that the personal economic outlook for many Ontarians will remain challenging. It then goes on to spell out doom and gloom.

It is difficult too for me, beyond those words, to accept that the restoration process is really under way when I consider problems presented to me day by day in my constituency office.

I have the authority of the writer of this particular letter to use it as a reference point in this debate today. This is a letter from a constituent of mine, Mrs. Judy Foell of Kipp's Lane in London. She gives me some background in this letter, dated March 1983, and followed it up with conversations by phone in the past few days. She indicates:

"Today I have applied for general welfare assistance. The following is a list of my monthly expenses: rent $284, food $140, phone $12, dry cleaning $3, cable $8, household insurance $7, bills of $20, $6.80, $6.50, etc.; total $487.30.

"Welfare is going to pay me approximately $313 per month. Can someone please tell me how I am going to live on $7.25 a week for food? With this kind of assistance I can understand why so many people steal. After I pay my rent and food I can't afford cable, household insurance, etc. Something has to be done and has to be done soon. And this wonderful government can pay various members of commissions, etc. many hundreds of dollars a day just to find out what is wrong with the economy."

5:40 p.m.

The letter goes on in some detail about the plight in which this particular person finds herself, with no light at the end of the tunnel. As the leader of the third party said the other day, this might better be called, "the light at the end of the gangplank, as opposed to the light at the end of the tunnel."

There is another constituent of mine whose picture appears in today's London Free Press, with somewhat the same problem. I am referring to Mrs. Sharon Stiles whose concern about the economy is one she has to struggle and fight with every day as a single parent, leading a single parent family.

The Ontario Liberal Party has prepared a paper dealing with jobs for youth. We have had a task force headed up by the member for Kitchener-Wilmot (Mr. Sweeney), and in his report there are certain recommendations made. I want to make reference to the recommendations of our youth task force employment report. It is worth reviewing these recommendations and summarizing the progress made towards their implementation.

The first recommendation made in that report was to provide more training opportunities for those who are currently unemployed in order to meet skilled manpower demands, particularly in new technologies when the economy improves. No action has been taken to date.

2. Encourage through incentives and/or require through legislation on-the-job training by Ontario industry with a view to meeting our own skilled workers' needs. There has been no action to date.

3. Restructure the apprenticeship program to permit easier access and reduce the current high drop-out rate. Again, there has been no action from the government.

4. Make a realistic and conservative attempt to change the public's conception of the value and importance of skilled trades, with a view to removing the stigma still attached to blue collar work. Again, there has been no action.

5. Improve upon the present counsellor-to-student ratio of one to four hundred and improve in-service opportunities for counsellors to keep abreast of changes in business and industry. No action has been taken.

6. Introduce career counselling at the elementary school level. We acknowledge a wee bit of progress in that area.

7. Re-evaluate the present secondary school curriculum and make mandatory such core subjects as English, mathematics and science, to ensure young people are equipped to be flexible and adaptable in today's changing labour market. Implemented, and is that not wonderful?

8. In this connection, particularly stress the importance of female students continuing to study maths and sciences, enabling them to qualify for the new technologies. In that area, some progress has been made.

9. Introduce into schools a mandatory credit course in career guidance, job readiness and development of marketable skills. There has been no action.

10. Strongly support and provide effective ministerial guidelines as well as mandatory standards for co-op education and work experience programs in secondary schools which provide a more realistic bridge from the school to the work environment. There has been no action.

11. Encourage greater liaison between industries, business and education. There has been very limited progress.

12. The last recommendation is to improve manpower forecasting by government and business to assist counsellors and students to make appropriate career decisions. There has been limited progress in this area; notably some progress with the federal government.

Now that is not a very happy record, nor is it a very happy record to consider when one looks back at the promises made by our government in its earlier throne speeches.

Moving on through the throne speech, the next topic that it addresses, on page 3, is the significant slowdown in inflation, and then the trend in wage and salary settlements which are contributing to a growth in confidence in our ability to deal with inflation. There is an indirect reference there to the wage restraint bill that the government brought in last year after the theme of six and five was introduced by the federal government. There is no reference, no credit given to any federal government initiative in this area.

I think the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel), did a commendable job yesterday in dealing with the concerns of his party and, for that matter, members outside of his party in this Legislature, members from our party and, hopefully, from the Conservative Party insofar as occupational health and safety is concerned.

He went on at considerable length about that theme. I think he should be commended. However, when we get into the throne speech and look at the area of labour, the reference to labour is almost conspicuous by its absence. I would point out that the government missed a golden opportunity in its speech to deal with that theme of occupational health and safety and, for that matter, other themes such as severance pay. There is no reference that I can see in here on that particular theme.

Carrying on to another aspect of this throne speech—I am not going to hit on all of them given that there are only 12 minutes left before we recess—I do want to point out again that page 7 of the throne speech says:

"While the recently established federal Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada was a welcome initiative, we cannot rely solely on this longer-term process to spur lasting economic recovery. Enhanced federal-provincial co-operation is required now."

There is no indication of how that enhanced federal-provincial co-operation is going to be fostered, but I would hope that we have reached a point in history, and a point in our Ontario Legislature, where we are going to put this constant fed-bashing theme aside and seriously, and honestly, attempt to work in a co-operative way to see that the economic union and development prospects for Canada does become a fact.

I am interested too, and very curious about the reference made in the latter part of page 7 of the throne speech about strengthening "the management of the province's affairs." What a large, sweeping, half-dozen words that is. What does it mean? How are we going to strengthen the management of the province's affairs? What magic wand is the Premier (Mr. Davis) going to wave, or is the cabinet going to wave, to strengthen the management of the province's affairs?

It may well be that the government is going to reflect on the error of its ways. It may reflect on such things as some of the thoughts brought here in private members' hour. I want to go back and recall May 1979, a time at which this House considered a private member's bill called "Program Cost Disclosure Act."

This bill was debated on a Thursday afternoon. It was defeated because, I suppose, it was a bill from a member of the opposition. One of the main speakers who spoke against this particular bill—I must admit with a degree of delight it was I who sponsored it—was the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. McCague). He said that we did not need a bill such as the Program Cost Disclosure Act because the government, in a very routine manner, currently assesses all the factors concerning past and new programs that this bill sought to have included in the compendium of information.

5:50 p.m.

Later that same year there was another private member's bill presented and that was the Fiscal Plan Act. The member for Oriole (Mr. Williams) did the hatchet job on that particular bill. The member for Oriole said: "Lest there be any doubt that this cannot be substantiated—and I think this is something that the sponsors clearly and perhaps intentionally overlooked today—the fact is that it is spelled out quite clearly in recent budgets that long-term planning was an integral part of the budgetary process."

Given the government is already doing those things, one wonders how they might improve on it. We look forward to some elaboration on that particular little sentence that was put in on page seven of the throne speech that the Ontario government will bring in measures "to strengthen the management of the province's affairs."

I am curious as to whether they might be going to go back to the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker) and revive his sunset theme and a few of the refinements on it and try to bring that back to us in this Legislature.

Moving on, the government says on the next page of its throne speech: "In the coming year, the government will continue to set priorities and co-ordinate economic initiatives to ensure that our province is able to take full advantage of the many resource and technological opportunities that will be available in the future."

The resource opportunities in northern Ontario are there in such abundance we would hope this particular reference would address itself to northern Ontario. But when one considers the north in this throne speech, one has to look through three or four times to find anything much more significant than the implication there, and the statement in the later paragraph that it will provide "assistance to single-industry communities in northern Ontario."

If the member for Lake Nipigon (Mr. Stokes), who has been here longer than I and who has a much closer connection with the north, had a dollar for every time he has heard a promise such as that he could walk out of here a rather rich man. What we are hoping for and, more importantly, what the people of northern Ontario are hoping for is some substance to these promises. These things could be considered as hollow statements, because we have found in throne speeches, as I referred to in my very opening comment, for the last 10 or 12 years, hollow promises and promises unfulfilled.

I want to move on to the middle part of this particular speech and get into pages 12 and 13 where there is some reference made to the farm community. The member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. Riddell) has alluded to the statements here that address themselves to the farm community. But the government cannot forget, again the member for Huron-Middlesex made a point of this today, that insofar as agriculture and the farming community is concerned the Liberal Party over the years, even though we have not been the government, has played an extremely viable role. The suggestions made by our critics over the years have, I am sure, immeasurably helped many of the government programs.

I want to commend our member for Huron-Middlesex for the work he has done and remind the government that no matter what it is thinking or planning in the agricultural community, it had better be cognizant of the contribution that can be made by members from the opposition.

Given the time press we have here, I would like to address myself to one or two themes that have been ignored in this throne speech, rather than reviewing in the last few pages other themes such as French language, etc.

When I turned on the radio this morning I was interested to hear the comments made by our Solicitor General (Mr. G. W. Taylor), who expressed some concern and considerable surprise in a radio interview that a video tape he had picked up on the weekend and taken home for his family contained language that was rather abrasive and I assume it contained things other than language that could be visually offensive particularly to young people.

I note with some concern that the government's throne speech does not address itself to anything that could be described in general terms as a moral issue. I am sorry to say this, because on occasion we have had at least committee discussions—no great discussions in chamber, but at least committee discussions—about such things as the censorship process and the censorship board here in Ontario.

Given the climate and given the concern that a considerable number of people have about such things as video tapes, movies that are available on cable, and pornography, whose availability in our variety stores is expanding, the government is missing a golden opportunity if it does not address itself to what I consider to be a very serious moral issue. They have not done that. They are choosing to ignore and I would submit, to ignore with impunity this real problem that we have in our province.

Beyond that there are other things that have cropped up from time to time in the past year that could have been addressed in this throne speech, but, for whatever reasons, the government has chosen to present a rather brief, rather vague blueprint of its plan for the coming year.

One of our judges suggested, for example, regarding some of the problems that appear in our courts dealing with family breakup, that marriage as a theme could be presented in the school system. There are some people who have disagreed with that editorially and otherwise, and yet there are some who agree with it. The government again has missed the opportunity at least to put the subject on the table for some discussion.

Why would the government shy away from addressing itself to things that are of serious concern to the people of this province? The government, in my view, has a mandate to address itself to something more than putting pavement on roads and dollars into school boards to run their schools. I think it needs to play a greater leadership role in areas such as I have described: the concern over pornography, broken homes, marriage courses, etc.

Another theme that has appeared in the pages of our press and in radio and television reports over the last month or two—and I was surprised that no reference was made to this in the throne speech—is the condition of the jails in Ontario. Take a look through the Ontario Public Service Employees Union press release of February 15, which talks about the explosive situation in provincial jails. Why have we not addressed ourselves to that theme in this throne speech?

Going back to education, the Minister of Education (Miss Stephenson) indicated at one point that she wanted to study the impact of metric on the school system. Why was no mention made of that?

I could go on with literally hundreds of themes that were missed, but I will conclude my remarks, given the time, by submitting that the throne speech is very shallow. We hope that when we see the budget we will find more evidence of this government's concern about the economy and about the citizens of Ontario.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Wells, the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate the business of the House for the remainder of this week and next.

Tonight and tomorrow we will continue with the throne speech debate. Next Monday afternoon and Tuesday afternoon and evening, May 2 and 3, we will also continue with the throne speech debate. On Wednesday morning the usual three committees may meet. On Thursday, May 5, we will have the windup of the throne speech debate in the afternoon with the vote at 5:45 p.m. and the time will be divided amongst the three windup speakers.

Next Thursday evening we will deal with the following legislation: Committee of the whole on Bill 7, the Toronto Futures Exchange Act, and then second reading of Bills 3, 4, 5, 13 and 2. Consideration of that legislation will continue on the morning of Friday, May 6.

The House recessed at 6 p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Thursday, April 28, 1983

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Resuming the debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the throne speech debate tonight because I think this session and this speech from the throne will be looked upon historically as a very important event. We are now in a period when we are witnessing a turnaround in events. A restoration of confidence in the economy and in the life of this country has begun.

After a period of time historians will probably say was the worst, or at least equal to that experienced by this country in the 1930s, I think we are now on the verge of a recovery period.

As the speech from the throne said, and as I would say on every occasion, the restoration of confidence has begun. People are beginning to feel things are starting to happen. The positive signs are out there and those positive signs were indicated in the speech from the throne at this third session of this Legislature and Parliament.

What are those positive signs? They are signs such as the fact that we are now in a period when the consumer price index has declined in a year from somewhere around 12 per cent to between six and seven per cent. Inflation is being brought under control.

We are seeing a decrease in interest rates and because of this we are seeing greatly increased activity in the housing market. Houses are beginning to sell. Houses are beginning to be built.

I am always amazed when I hear people talk about there not being any houses built, that there are no housing starts going on. Then I look around my riding of Scarborough North and all I see are sewers being laid, roads being built, houses going up and condominiums and apartments being built in a whole variety of price ranges; and that activity has accelerated in the last three or four months because interest rates are lower, people are now buying and confidence is beginning to be felt again in this province, in this country and in our economy.

There is no question that unemployment is still too high; we all accept that. This speech from the throne accepts the fact that the emphasis today as we enter this period of confidence must be on the creation of jobs. As I read the federal budget presented by Mr. Lalonde, this is what he emphasizes: that this country must create jobs, that we must help the unemployed; and the measures that will do that are there. I think that will be the kind of direction our budget will take when the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) presents it on May 10.

Mr. Stokes: Watch those leaks now.

Hon. Mr. Wells: No, I am not going to say any more about the budget, of course; the budget will speak for itself. As the speech from the throne said, one of the major thrusts because of this period we are in now will be the budget, but coupled with the budget will be the initiatives this government takes in a number of other areas, and one of the areas I am most impressed with is that of the creation of increased markets in international trade.

The initiatives being taken by the Ministry of Industry and Trade today are exemplary. They have set for themselves, for this province and on behalf of this government as policy of this government, goals to stimulate business investment over the next two years, to double our foreign trade over the next five years, to increase the domestic market so it will expand and to increase the productivity and entrepreneurship of small and medium-sized businesses so they can build in this province and add to the economic growth and life of this province. These kinds of initiatives are the things that are going to be necessary to bring about the stimulation that will create jobs in this province.

I have always been impressed when people want to talk about what is the philosophy and role of a government such as ours in this province. We have debated many times various actions of this government. Our friends across the way have been critical of our involvement in Suncor, they have been critical of the things we have done in relation to trust companies and they have been critical of some other initiatives we have taken from time to time.

But like my friend the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) and others in this House, I am one who believes that we have to learn from history, and in order to chart the course we want to go in the future we also look at what has happened in the past. Usually the historic routes of a political party and the history of its actions provide a pretty good guideline for the kind of actions one should take in the future.

In this regard I was very interested to read in the Toronto Star on the weekend an article by Peter Oliver, who is a history professor at York University. I want to quote a couple of paragraphs from this article because—

Mr. Stokes: Is that the one on the interventionist Tories?

Hon. Mr. Wells: That is right. I do not know whether everyone believes this article, but for me this represents the kind of policy that has built this province and it also represents the kind of policy that has allowed a Progressive Conservative government to be the government of this province for 64 years in this century.

Mr. Kerrio: Your record is nearly as good as Franco's in Spain.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Think of that. For 64 of the 82 years of this century the people of this province have put their faith in Conservative government, and if you read back in—

Mr. Ruston: They were not all Conservative.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Oh yes, that is where my friend is wrong. They are really Conservative governments. If one reads some of the writings of Disraeli, one will find that a Conservative government preserves the good that is in the past and takes those good new ideas that are needed and brings those into play too.

8:10 p.m.

A Conservative government believes that the initiative of the individual and the initiative of the private market sector can bring about real economic growth in a country and in a province, but it also believes that where government initiative and support is needed, government initiative and support should be available. That is the kind of philosophy we have always believed in.

I was just reading on the weekend some of the battles of Sir James Whitney when he won the election in 1905. When he won that election, he promised that one of the main platforms would be to create the Hydroelectric Power Commission of Ontario so that Ontario could have cheap power, because he knew that would be the way this province could grow and develop. Sir James Whitney faced the united attack of a lot of big businessmen and he wrapped himself in the Union Jack and he rode right over their heads to the people of urban Ontario. He won the elections and he laid the groundwork for this party's future successes in this province.

I am certainly not an expert on Hydro, as the former member for York South, Mr. MacDonald, and others in this House are, but when one thinks of what Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck did in creating Hydro, and when one looks at the history of Hydro throughout the 84 years in this province, I think it shows a bit why this government has been able to remain the government and others have not, because some of the big issues and big political divisions occurred around Hydro. The first one was when the interests tried to stop Sir Adam Beck and Sir James Whitney in the development of Ontario Hydro.

Then we come up to the years of the 1930s and the early 1940s, when Mitchell Hepburn said, "Oh, we don't need any more power in this province." He cut off contracts and interfered with things concerning Hydro, and George Drew was re-elected to get those Hydro contracts going again and to get power into this province. Then he won an election on the conversion from 25 to 60 cycles. The affairs of Hydro have been woven through the political life of this province and this government has always believed we should be forward-sighted, we should know cheap power is the one thing that can build the economic life of this province and can also guarantee the quality of life for the people of this province.

Perhaps we are seeing a rerun of that again. We are in the position today where Ontario Hydro at the present time is being criticized because it had the foresight to realize that (a) this province had to have at least some nuclear power development, and (b) it had to have lots of power, so that when the growth period begins power will be here and we will have our own energy source. We do not have oil, we do not have natural gas, as do other provinces, but we have a great natural resource in the kind of electric power that can be produced in this province.

It may be that historians will look back and say we are again at another watershed when those opposite continually want to attack Hydro. They want to attack the fact that we have nuclear power in this province, they want to attack the men who were not completely infallible but who looked ahead and said we had to prepare for the future and we had to have lots of power in this province.

We may have overbuilt a little, but I would rather be a little overbuilt than have to go back to those periods after Mitchell Hepburn when I never knew whether the lights were going to stay on in my house or not.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure you are all going to get a chance to make your views known at the appropriate time.

Mr. Stokes: No, we are not. It is over next Thursday.

Mr. Speaker: If I may make an observation, you are sure making up for it now. Having said that, the member for Scarborough North has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Wells: I just again recalled one of the statements my friend and former chairman of Hydro Hugh Macaulay made when people talked about the installation of scrubbers at various coal-fired plants, something which Hydro is moving ahead with and which takes a lot of time and costs a lot of money. He always said, "You know, the best scrubbers we have got in this province are our nuclear power plants."

I think there is some concern about nuclear power development in this province; sure there is. We have to be concerned about accidents and about where the nuclear waste can be put. If there is anyone in this House who is concerned and worried about where nuclear waste can be put it is myself. I still have some soil in my riding that we will be glad to put in the riding of anybody who would like to have it.

I have to believe that in this day and age we have (a) the scientific expertise and brains that will be able to solve the danger problems that may occur at nuclear power stations and in nuclear developments, and (b) the power and the will to be able to dispose properly of nuclear waste so that all the people of this province will be able to benefit from this power development. I really think historians will look on the history of this province and what goes on now as one of those watersheds where the development of nuclear power and the development of this resource for the ongoing economic life of this province is crucial.

I just used Hydro as an example because it comes up time and time again, from Sir Adam Beck's time right up until now, as one of those issues that has been woven into the economic life and development of this province and the philosophies of political parties. I am proud to say I am a member of a party that I think has always been on the right side of that issue.

Mr. Stokes: You told me you were going to speak for only five minutes.

Hon. Mr. Wells: I have two more things I want to say, though. I think this article expresses so well my philosophy as a Conservative, as someone who joined the Conservative Party at age 15 and who has never belonged to any other party. This represents my philosophy and that of this party.

Peter Oliver said—and I am not going to read the whole article because I would not presume to. I am not even sure that all my colleagues here will agree with this article, but—

Mr. Stokes: Come on, read it all.

Hon. Mr. Wells: He said: "Given the reality of the Suncor purchase and the raw exercise of provincial power and cavalier interference with private property demonstrated by the trust company affair, the concerns of businessmen and neo-conservatives alike is understandable. Yet the actions of the Davis government, while undeniably bold and forceful, did not really represent a significant departure from economic policies followed by previous administrations.

"Indeed, Davis and his colleagues, whether consciously or not, were drawing on deeply rooted Ontario traditions and values which have existed since the province's earliest origins and have shaped the economic policies of every Ontario government"—get this—"every Ontario government whatever its political complexion. Throughout the province's history, governments have never hesitated to assert the absolute priority in economic life of public rights over private privileges, and at times those governments have been none too tender in their attitude to the claims of private property and business."

Then he goes on to say: "Examples of the province's powerful statist tradition could easily be multiplied. Seen in this light, the activities of the Davis government in the Suncor and trust company affairs are neither extreme nor unusual, although only time will determine whether the Suncor purchase was economically astute."

8:20 p.m.

I digress here. This is not Peter Oliver speaking. I am now saying I happen to believe the future will show the Suncor purchase was both economical and very astute. It will serve the people of Ontario well.

I am now back to quoting Peter Oliver: "Most assuredly, neither of these initiatives"—that is Suncor or our trust company bills that were recently brought in—"would have surprised, much less shocked, such great Tories of yesteryear as John Beverley Robinson, Adam Beck, James Whitney or even Leslie Frost. In Ontario, governments, whether Conservative or Liberal, have seldom shied away from strong interventions in the provincial economy. In doing so, they have drawn on statist traditions and practices dating back to the province's Loyalist origins and sustained and reinforced throughout the 19th and early 20th centuries.

"When private and public interests have come into conflict, this statist ideology has determined that private interests frequently suffer. To date the Ontario electorate has never expressed disapproval of governments which embody and express the traditions of the positive state."

To me, that has been the whole tradition of this party, a party which has believed in the people of Ontario, in their innate freedom and individuality and in the enterprise of the people and of business in this province. It has given them full scope to develop, both the people and business, but we have never shied away from intervening, helping, assisting or doing something when the collective interests of the private sector could not do that.

Having said that, I think the important thing today is to look at that background so that it can help us map out what should be done in the future. Looking at what has to be done in the future, and remembering that we are now in this period of the beginning of confidence, the restoration of confidence as we again begin to pick up economically, it is clear that at the present time the responsibility of governments all over, Canadian and Ontario, is to create the proper climate at this time for the private sector to foster growth.

It is for us to complement the efforts of business and industry through appropriate plans and programs. We have to look at the kind of intervention we have done in the past and we have to be sure we do those things that will now allow the private sector, the individual and the small businessman to move ahead, to capture this period now and develop jobs.

Mr. Stokes: It is called the mixed economy.

Hon. Mr. Wells: It is called a mixed economy; that is right. We have always had a mixed economy in this province.

Let me conclude by referring to one other thing that was in the speech from the throne, something which I think is very important. That is the announcement of the bicentennial in this province. Next year, 1984, we will be celebrating 200 years since those first Loyalist settlements were established in 1784 along the St. Lawrence River. While there were certainly other people in the province to a very limited degree before that and, of course, the native peoples had been here for many years before, one has to pick some time to say, "When did all this begin in this province?"

Next year we begin by celebrating the event that occurred in 1784. In 1784, a group of United Empire Loyalists came and they joined with a number of traders, francophone people from Lower Canada who had established settlements here, and the native peoples; together, they began to build this province.

The theme of the bicentennial is "Celebrating together." That means we are not celebrating that one event that occurred in 1784, we are celebrating 200 years of history. We are celebrating those people who came and all the people who have come to this province since then.

We all know there have been a myriad of people from many lands, people who have seen this as the one land in the world where they wanted to come. It was the place where they knew they could have freedom, they could come, establish a home and grow, and that it would be a great place for their children and their children's children.

That is what the bicentennial is all about. It is about celebrating together the fact that all of us have built this province in these last 200 years.

Mr. Riddell: Has an invitation been sent to the Queen yet?

Hon. Mr. Wells: Oh, yes, I would presume so. We do not send the invitations, the federal government does. We hope that the Queen will come.

We all know the many people who came here. My father came to Ontario about 1912. Many of our parents came here, many of our friends came from all different countries.

What I wanted to draw to the House's attention tonight, as I close, is the fact that we have a special group of people in the galleries tonight. These are people who will be celebrating next year with us. They have just recently come to make a life in this province. They are already making a tremendous contribution.

This is April 28. Two days from now these people will be looking at what was a very horrendous event for them. It was April 30, 1975, the day of the fall of South Vietnam.

These people remember well that force was used by the North Vietnamese to invade their country, to break a peace accord that was signed in Paris that was supposed to bring an end to a very tragic war. They saw that the real victor in that was the communist government of North Vietnam. They saw that government and those troops march into their country. The victory of the communists in the Vietnam war is not only a great tragedy, they believe, for the 25 million people in South Vietnam, but also for the full 50 million people in their country.

I talked to a number of these people. A number of them live in many different members' ridings. I talked to one who lives in my riding. He told me that the great tragedy for the Vietnamese people was that after the communists took over in 1975 that thousands and thousands of people, officers, civil servants, former government people, were all put in prison or in places called re-education camps.

I draw this to the House's attention because we hear a lot about different celebrations where events that we all know so well are recorded. I do not think enough has been said about some of the tragedies of the invasion of South Vietnam. We all talk about the tragedy of the war and some of the occurrences that took place and all the things connected with that very unfortunate war.

But we forget the fact that when the North Vietnamese marched into South Vietnam they imprisoned a number of people, they put them in re-education camps, and my friend tells me that there are still 60,000 there in jail for political reasons. The living conditions in these camps are very poor. They have no medicine. They do not have enough food. They have to work very hard, prisoners are dying of malnutrition and those who are in jail are not in very good health.

The reason I was so keen to want to invite these people here to see our Legislative Assembly was that they want us to remember what happened there. They want us to support requests to the Vietnamese government, the communist government of Vietnam, that it will respect the human rights of those people in prison for political reasons, and that they will release these people.

It is a great tragedy for the Vietnamese people, because under the present regime in Vietnam these people have no freedom, they have no freedom of speech, they have no freedom of religion, they have no freedom of trade. They are living under a regime that they do not respect and that they do not want and which has denied them all these freedoms.

We all know that because of this lack of freedom, these terrible conditions and the imprisonment, hundreds of thousands of people risked their lives by getting into boats and taking to the high seas where many of them died in their attempt to reach freedom. Luckily, those who did not die made it to the refugee camps. Many of them have come to this country because of our federal government's policy to accept these refugees and because of the activities of many private agencies.

8:30 p.m.

It is one of the marvels of our time that churches and groups have adopted Vietnamese boat people and really helped them to establish themselves in this country. It is one of the marvellous indications of nongovernmental involvement in a very serious problem.

There were two reasons these people left their country and went through terrible hardship to get here. First was the political reason. They just did not want to be under the communist regime; they did not believe in it. They wanted to live in a democracy. They wanted the freedom of democracy.

The second reason was that they had a real concern for the future of their children. They felt their children had absolutely no hope if they were brought up under a communist regime. The standard of living is low. They were being educated in a Marxist doctrine, and they would have no chance to develop as they believed their children should develop.

They went through great deprivation and hardship, and they are now living in this province and in many other areas of the world. I understand there are approximately 22,000 Vietnamese refugees in Ontario, about 19,000 of them here in Toronto. They are hard-working. They want to integrate into our way of life. They want to make a real contribution.

From what I have seen, they are making a real contribution. They are working in the factories and in the offices. Their children are going to our schools. They are learning English quickly. They are making a contribution, and they are enjoying the freedom, democracy and the kindness of all the people they meet here in this province.

It is for this reason, on this night when we are debating the throne speech and talking about our bicentennial when we will be celebrating together, that I wanted to be sure a number of these people came down to join us to see where our democracy begins in this assembly and from which flows the freedom and kind of life we have in this province.

In closing, I would like to say how pleased I am that all the Vietnamese people of Toronto who were able to come tonight have come here, and I am sure all the members of this House would like to welcome them here.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, this is the throne debate but since the government House leader (Mr. Wells) has chosen to direct his remarks to special guests in the gallery, you might permit a representative of each of the two opposition parties to join with him in welcoming our visitors to the gallery this evening and to empathize with them in the very tragic and trying times they have experienced, not only prior to 1975 but also after 1975 with the communist takeover of South Vietnam.

We in Ontario and Canada know, and perhaps all too often take for granted, that we do have the liberties and freedoms so many people throughout the world community of nations are denied. In support of what the government House leader has said, I would just like to say to our visitors in the gallery—as part of the 20,000 people who have chosen Canada and Ontario as their home—that we are very pleased they have done so. I am sure every member of this Legislature would welcome them, wish them well and thank them very much for choosing to become Canadians.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me just briefly to make a few comments. I was one of the fortunate people in the late 1970s who had the opportunity, along with others, of sponsoring a family that came from Laos to our small community of Sarsfield. The process was arranged when I was the deputy reeve of the township of Cumberland.

At that time, together with a church volunteer group, we sponsored a family which arrived in the month of December. It was just a few days before Christmas when the family finally got off the bus in the city of Ottawa and came to us. At that time, I guess they had rehearsed a little sentence to say to us, and the only words they knew in English were: "Very pleased to meet you." All three of them, including the two-year-old child, knew how to say, "Very pleased to meet you."

One year later, the father and the mother knew the English language very well and it would be appropriate to say that the little child, who was then three, spoke Laotian, English and French at the age of three. I found it absolutely remarkable that after one year in our country, somebody had learned so much of our culture. It was really most rewarding, and I feel very fortunate to have had the opportunity to participate in that kind of thing. So I would also like to welcome our visitors.

Mr. Speaker: On behalf of all members of the Legislature, I would like to echo the sentiments and thoughts that have been expressed. We who have been fortunate enough to have lived all our lives here perhaps do not really understand the true meaning of freedom which you people have chosen to share in your life with us. Thank you very much.

Mr. McGuigan: Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the throne debate, I too would like to welcome the visitors in the gallery and join with all others who have spoken so eloquently about the contribution these people will make to Canada and how much we appreciate them here.

The closest I can come to a personal experience was when I travelled to Hong Kong and then to mainland China in 1975, just two years after relations were opened with mainland China and two years after President Nixon's visit. We were shown part of the crown colony called the New Territories. It looks across a river to a part of mainland China which is heavily fortified with machine-gun nests and various other fortifications. In spite of that, they told us people risked their lives daily to cross that river to get to Hong Kong where they would receive a different measure of freedom than existed under those conditions.

When we got out of the train to cross into mainland China, we had to give up our passports. I wish to share with others what an experience of apprehension and trepidation one feels when giving up that British passport. One feels one has given up one's rights, freedoms and perhaps the chance of coming home.

Having given up our passports, we got out of the train because the train did not cross the bridge into mainland China. We walked across the bridge. Of course, the bridge was heavily guarded by soldiers who were carrying rifles with bare bayonets. One does not often see bare bayonets on rifles, nevertheless it was a common sight there to see a bare bayonet on the rifle. I suppose it was a method of intimidating and casting fear into the hearts of all those people who see that.

I will not spend any time talking about China but, on leaving it, one of the observations we made there was that the airplanes in China apparently are flown by inexperienced pilots. It is much easier to land your plane at a high rate of speed; in other words, flying them into the ground. The planes we were travelling on were very modern planes in 1975—they were British Tridents, I think—but every tire on every plane had the rubber worn off to the point where there were two or three plies of the fabric showing. Anyone would know that was a rather dangerous situation. Certainly one would not find an aircraft flying in this part of the world with every tire on the plane showing two or three layers of fabric.

When I looked at those tires and then looked around at the prospects of staying in China, I decided that even if the plane had no tires at all, I would take my chances on that plane rather than spend the rest of my days in that country. In spite of the fact that we were treated very well by our hosts, it was a great feeling to get back and to get those British passports once more in our hands.

We are talking tonight about the throne speech. I want to begin with my complimentary remarks about the throne speech. I want to compliment the government on the fact that they did not spend about three quarters of an hour, as they did last year, lambasting the federal government. That is not to say the federal government is perfect in every respect. They have the faults of all governments that are in power, wherever they are.

Nevertheless, just as a personal matter, it is particularly offensive to me to find that the government escapes a good deal of the honest criticism that is levelled from this side of the throne of the Legislature, a duty which the people of Ontario elected us to carry out. They escape that criticism by attacking the federal government.

In the United States we find that elections there are fought by attacking the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Very seldom does the President of the United States really answer to the people of the United States, except to say there is a missile gap or there is a catch-up to be done and his party is going to catch up better than the other parties. The people in the USSR do not have elections, but they maintain themselves in office by verbally attacking the United States.

We in Canada worry about when that attack will become more than verbal and become an actuality, about the fate that we and the whole world would suffer because governments avoid their responsibilities in answering their honest critics and they attack a critic who cannot talk back to them.

Tonight I was beginning to think the government House leader (Mr. Wells) had decided to change his tactics and was going back to attacking a former leader of this party, Mitch Hepburn, who has been mouldering in his grave these many years. Perhaps he was just being philosophical rather than attacking that gentleman.

I can say from the two occasions when I heard Mitch Hepburn speak—I guess this would be back in the mid-1930s; I am not sure of the dates—and I think anyone who has read about him or heard him would know that he was one of the finest speakers this province has ever produced. One of the rather bold things he did, since the government House leader was talking about boldness, was to bring about pasteurization of milk. In those days something like 30 per cent of the population of Ontario were farmers and almost all of them had a few cows on the premises.

Mr. Stokes: I thought that was Louis Pasteur.

Mr. McGuigan: He invented the process, but it was Mitch Hepburn who brought it into effect.

However, that really ends my complimentary remarks when I compliment the government for not spending the time talking about the throne speech.

I would like to talk about a matter that has been thrust upon me, not by particular choice but by events in my riding which affect people there very severely. They also affect people, particularly the farm sector, throughout Ontario. I refer to the lack of financial protection for farmers when receivers of farm products go bankrupt.

My interest was first brought to this three years ago when the Tilbury Farmers' Co-operative, a grain handling co-op, declared bankruptcy, leaving a good many of the farmers in the area holding worthless cheques or unpaid for their produce. It is rather interesting that the event that triggered the passage of the Grain Elevator Storage Act, which supposedly was to protect farmers in situations like this, also was a Kent county event that happened some time in the 1960s when a private grain company went bankrupt, leaving a number of people high and dry.

The Grain Elevator Storage Act was passed, I believe in 1975, and after that a good many people wrongly assumed they had protection and were being guarded by this government, which is so famous for its good management. I think they shared some thoughts in common with the people who invested in trust companies.

They have learned, to their chagrin and very much to their financial ruin in some cases, that the act offers them very little protection. All the act really did was to say that for receipts that were issued for storage there must be grain in that particular elevator or in a similar terminal elevator operated by the federal government. It said nothing about what would happen in the case of an operator who misappropriated that grain and sold it to his own account. It did lay out a $1,000 fine for the first offence and a $5,000 fine for the second offence, but that is rather small comfort to the farmer whose grain has been lost.

I just want to go over the reasons a grain company goes bankrupt. Number one would be that it was probably a high-cost facility. It may not have had volume enough to justify an operation, and I suppose you could say it might have had poor management. But in the event of a company going broke under those circumstances it would be a gradual erosion of the equity of the company; certainly the bankers, the managers and the shareholders would have ample opportunity to see what was happening to their business, because it was going broke slowly over a period of time, and they could take corrective action either in closing down the business or in adding machinery and facilities to make it a viable enterprise.

Usually the companies that go bankrupt do so because of the financial pressures that are brought about by the situation I have described; but, unlike the case I have just cited, they decide then to try to make up for their shortcomings in the operation by going into the marketplace and gambling on the future market.

There is nothing very wrong with gambling on the future market if you are using your own money. I explained in another instance that it does serve a commercial purpose in providing liquidity to the grain marketing system. But there is something very wrong when an operator uses other people's money to gamble. About 70 per cent, I think, is the figure that is used: 70 per cent of the people who go into that market lose; only 30 per cent win.

I am not going to say very much about the reasons that the Tilbury Farmers' Co-operative went under, because I understand there is litigation going on; it will probably go on for some time. But I do say in a very general way that if you examine most of these farm elevator bankruptcies, you will find that they happen because they have really not followed the rules of the game and have gone into a situation where they were gambling either their money or the farmers' money, or at least money that they did not have and that was eventually required to pay off producers.

Just to go over the methods that are open to these people when they are engaged in the grain trade, I will use a hypothetical case in which an elevator operator decided there was a great future in some foreign market, a premium market, two or three months down the road; so he stepped out and bought grain from the farmers at a premium price. Not having that backed up with a firm contract, when the time period ran out when he expected to pick up his contract, he found he did not have one. He had paid a premium price, had given away free storage and generally had put the company in a very bad position.

If an operator did have such a sale, there is a method whereby he can cover that situation. He takes his contract, whether it is a buy or sell contract—that is, in the cash market—and he offsets that with a paper sale on the Chicago Board of Trade or the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

From that point on it really does not matter to his operation whether the price of grain goes up or down; his profit will be locked in in a handling charge. That handling charge would have been taken into consideration when he took his position in the market. It would not matter to him from that point on what happened in the fluctuation of the cash grain market, because whatever he lost in one transaction he would regain in the other, or whatever he gained in one transaction he would lose in the other.

What we really need in this province is a system of regulating small grain operators so they abide by the rules of the game. There are no official rules of the game as far as the province is concerned.

If one looks at the big grain companies, like Master Feeds, and the big co-operatives, like United Co-operatives of Ontario, one finds in their branch plants that they have a system whereby their auditors will go into a branch plant on a particular day and audit the position of that branch plant as far as its buying and selling is concerned.

The two positions must match one another very closely. They cannot come out to the last bushel, because grain contracts in most cases are handled in 5,000-bushel contracts. So there could be something less than 5,000 bushels in an exposed position. If there is any more than 5,000 bushels in an exposed position, the manager of that company would be in a very serious situation. It is not unlike the banking situation when bank inspectors come in unannounced. They inspect the books and find out whether a particular branch of the bank is following all the rules.

I suggest that this provincial government has not been bold. It has avoided these situations because there might be some political fallout from them, and it has allowed people to suffer.

I bring up this subject today because this past Tuesday I was at a meeting in Chatham of 15 farmers who have recently suffered through the receivership of Southland Canning Ltd. of Wheatley. This company is only two years old. It suffered unusually bad luck. It started operating in 1981, canning tomatoes. It began with a $350,000 Board of Industrial Leadership and Development grant to enable it to produce paste tomatoes. It had the fine objective of creating another 2,000 acres of process tomatoes, which normally are a valuable and profitable crop to the farmer.

However, in 1981 that part of Ontario suffered very bad weather and the company received only about 50 per cent of its pack, which meant all the costs of startup and operation had to be borne by half the pack. As the members can appreciate, it was an unprofitable year.

Then in 1982 there was a bumper crop. There was beautiful weather in Kent county. We did not have it so good in Elgin. They had a huge pack. The people who put up these whole-pack tomatoes—they are tomatoes that are peeled and put in a can in whole condition—packed 20 per cent of an overpack.

There is a provision in the contracts of all growers that they can only deliver 20 tons to the acre; in other words, a quota provision. Some of the bigger companies that were not concerned about whole-pack tomatoes released their growers from their contracts. I guess probably thousands of tons of those tomatoes ended up amongst a number of small companies that pack whole-pack tomatoes, each operating in what appeared to be the best interests of that individual company. Nevertheless, it contributed to a very bad oversupply on the market.

To add to the woes of the company, subsidized whole-pack tomatoes from the European Economic Community came in and further eroded the market, although we are told the greatest damage to the market came from the overproduction here in Ontario.

This has led to the company going into receivership. As one might expect, if one knows something about Ontario agriculture, the very last person in the chain of succession in that receivership is the producer who made the whole thing possible in the first place. Were it not for these producers, there would be no factory, there would be no canning company, there would be no workers in that factory and there would be no suppliers. The producer stands at the end of the list of receivers.

You would have shed a tear, Mr. Speaker, if you had been at that meeting. These were largely new producers, younger producers, who wanted to get into the area of producing canning crops. They could not get a contract at Heinz, Campbell Soup or some of the major canners where one would not expect a bankruptcy situation to appear; so they took a chance on this smaller company.

In a great many cases they were backed by their parents, and at this moment they are going to get only about 25 per cent of the money that is owing to them. That may not seem too bad if they are only going to lose 75 per cent but, when one looks at the figures that are involved, many of these young fellows will still be left with debts owing to them of $30,000, $40,000 and $50,000.

These are people who bought land in a high-priced market in the past two or three years. They were suffering already from the downturn in most commodity prices, and only by dint of the fact that probably the wife worked or they worked off the farm in their off-time, and because they had gone into canning crop production rather than grain, corn or beans, was there any chance of them succeeding in the first place. I do not wish to assume to know what is going to happen to those people, but I think it is fair to say some of them will have to cease their operations completely.

If they do continue operating as farmers, they will place their parents in an untenable situation, because they have already backed them in their initial enterprise in going into farming. They are going to have to back them further to cover the big losses that have been brought about by this case. If there is no turnaround in the agricultural economy of Ontario, it could be the straw that breaks the backs of these older people.

People often say to us, "Why cry for the young farmer? The young farmer can quit, he can go into another form of enterprise, he can take a job, he can start life anew." As hard as that is, there is a certain amount of truth in it. But when these young farmers drag down their parents, I can tell you there is not very much room for those parents to start life anew, to try and regain their position.

It was a rather sad meeting I attended. At this particular meeting, just as a matter of interest, the federal government, through the Agricultural Products Board was making an offer to purchase 540,000 cases of whole packed tomatoes and they were offering the premium price. The receiver has allowed the premium price to pass through the bankruptcy and go to the farmers.

This is really a situation that should exist in all of these bankruptcy situations. I wish to point out that it does exist in the United States, in the legislation they have in that country. For many years, the livestock people in the United States operated under their Packers and Stockyard Act which has two main provisions in it. One is that animals had to be paid for within 24 hours of being received. There was a very practical reason for that. Most animals shed their skin within 24 hours of reaching the gates of the packing plant. Of course, the identification is on the hide and it is because of that particular circumstance that it was written into the law that the producers had to be paid within 24 hours. That takes care of the day-to-day operations of a packing plant and guarantees that a farmer could not be any worse off than not being paid for the products he has delivered within 24 hours.

In the event of a bankruptcy, the producers there are further protected by the fact that all the moneys received for meat products from that packing plant or stockyard go into a trust fund and those funds can only go out of that trust to producers. They cannot go to anyone else. So when there is a bankruptcy in the United States—unless there are bankruptcies all along the line, going right back to the consumer—the producer would be paid.

I bring this up because at the present moment there is a movement in the United States under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, which is an act that governs the sale and terms of sale for fresh fruits and vegetables. Under that particular act, farmers must be paid within 10 days. The practical reason is that for many of the shipping areas in the United States the time involved really requires about 10 days for produce to arrive. Yet in Canada, if one looks in the present situation here in Ontario, one will find that most shippers of those commodities probably will be lucky if they are paid within 30 days and many times it stretches out to 60 days.

Also, in that country at the present moment, there is a great debate going on among members of the United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Growers. I guess this is the equivalent of our Canadian Horticultural Council or our Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers. They have put forward a proposal that a trust situation be enacted by an amendment to the PACA law that would create a trust situation in the event of a bankruptcy for a receiver of fresh fruits and vegetables.

This proposal brought a great deal of opposition when it was first brought upon the industry because people saw themselves setting up a set of books within their set of books which would cause a great deal of difficulty. However, they have examined this very closely and have determined that under the law they would not have to change their bookkeeping situation and that the trust provision would only come into effect if and when a bankruptcy occurred.

In the case of the Southland Canning, when they were forced into bankruptcy, the stock on hand, the inventory, the accounts that were owing to them would go into a trust that would go to the farmers.

Another event that happened in the last two or three years in my riding was the bankruptcy of a cattle yard that has cost producers upwards of $4 million. The figure really is not known because those matters are also before the courts and some lawsuits are being carried on, so I certainly do not wish to get into the details of it.

Mr. Stokes: Tell us how the Thompsons are doing in Blenheim.

Mr. McGuigan: I do not think those people are in any danger of going bankrupt, and I do not think I care to comment.

But there is a case of one family in my riding where a father and son are now trying to make that intergeneration change, passing down the farm from father to son. The father is perhaps 60 or 70 years old. This is a difficult enough situation as it is, trying to provide adequate funds for the parents to live their retirement days in comfort and at the same time not putting a burden on the son beyond his ability to carry.

Add to that a $60,000 dead loss—he did get a few thousand dollars, $13,000 out of it—or let us say with a $50,000 dead loss to add on to that situation, it really becomes a question of whether or not the proposal will fly.

I know from my own family operation, when one is hit by bad weather or circumstances, those losses are very difficult, if not impossible, to make up. For some time afterwards, we do not make that purchase that we should make in order to keep the farm modern, to keep up with the competition. We try to cut corners this way and that way, but really we cannot cut corners with Mother Nature. Eventually we pay for having cut those corners. This puts a terrible burden on those people who are making an intergenerational change.

This puts a burden on anybody, at any time, to suffer such losses. I would point out that one of the reasons this is so critical today, and why I keep bringing this point up, is to try to impress upon the government the fact that farmers do accept the risks of the marketplace. They try to offset those risks as best they can. Some of them use the futures market, they use forward contracting, they try to some extent to diversify their production so they do not have all their eggs in the proverbial basket.

Nevertheless, with specialization, which is the key to economical production, they find themselves limited to very few operations. They find themselves limited to just a few sales in the course of the year. In fact, it is not unknown for a grain farmer to sell his entire year's production in one sale. A cattle producer could maybe sell a quarter of his year's production in one transaction.

So it is not a case of a farmer losing half a dozen head of cattle on a particular sale and then having his chickens, sheep, milk cows, grain crops and his garden crop to fall back on. He has very little to fall back on. This government has been derelict in its duty and has not shown very much of the boldness that the House leader spoke about and Peter Oliver talked about in the article which the House leader referred to so many times.

They have not shown that boldness. They have waited until these events occur and then, spurred on by the trauma of the situation, they have moved in and brought about some changes.

9:10 p.m.

Following the bankruptcy of McIntyre cattle sales, they did move in and implemented the Farm Products Payments Act, which has been on the books for many years. They set up an insurance fund that from here on guarantees to pay producers for their cattle in such a situation.

That did nothing for the people who really triggered off that particular action, the people who really became the sacrificial lambs. They laid down their economic life in order, not voluntarily mind you, that others would benefit.

In spite of the fact the major farm organizations have endorsed the principle that these producers be paid retroactively when funds in the insurance build up to the point where payments could be made without borrowing, in spite of the fact that other farmers have supported them in their hour of need, the government stands by and says: "That is only a few. They are not going to affect us very much electorally."

It was their fault, too, in some instances. I do not think they have said that in the case of these people affected by the bankruptcies, but we do find in other instances that people who represent themselves in speaking for this government, although they are not elected to that position, try to divide and conquer the farmers by saying: "It is all your fault." That is a tactic that I deplore.

I am not going to get down in the gutter and use the kind of language the civil servant used to a group of farmers, at least as it was reported in the press. I do not know where people get the notion that when they come out to talk to farmers that somehow or other they have to use foul language.

Having attended farm meetings from the time when I was about 10 years old, nothing upset me more than when a speaker would come in and make the assumption he had a bunch of dumb farmers and had to start off the meeting by telling some dirty stories. I can tell the members that some of those stories I heard were filthy, dirty stories. They were usually to the degradation of somebody's mother. They always offended me. Even today they offend a lot of farm people. They make the farmers' wives absolutely furious.

I have seen it happen at farm meetings where a voice has been given to that offence and people have been made to apologize. I am telling you this from the bottom of my heart. Perhaps some of these farm people are in dire straits through their own fault, perhaps they made the wrong move, perhaps they were guilty of putting faith in this government, perhaps they answered the call that has been coming from our colleges, universities and from our farm advisers to specialize, to expand and to move out into that market and become a big operator, maybe that is all they are guilty of.

But they do not need to be talked down to, they do not need to be treated like dirt and they do not need to be hurt in their hour of real trauma.

One of the things I learned as a student in agriculture was from a chap called Dr. Raymond, who was our English professor and who turned out to be a psychologist.

One of the things he told us was about the love that a farmer has for his land. This really goes back to the fact that homo sapiens are territorial animals—the same as most animals of this world are territorial. We look upon Mother Earth as a suckling child would look at its mother's breast, as the source of all life. That is their contact with the good things of this world. When they are in danger of losing that land; whether it is through omissions they may have made themselves, or whether it is simply that they believed in government or whether it is just a matter of circumstances—they happened to start farming at the wrong time, they happened to move into it just at the wrong time—whatever the circumstances, I can tell you those people feel a terrible hurt.

But on top of that, they do not need a provincial civil servant using foul language at them. They do not need to be caught in bankruptcies that add to the other economic woes they have and the problems they are willing to face within the marketplace. They do not need those.

This government sits back and waits for these events to happen. Reluctantly and slowly, they move in. The Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Timbrell) has said in the throne speech that he is going to move on the Grain Elevator Storage Act and is going to bring about some measure which will ensure that grain placed in storage, given to the trust of that operator, remains his until it is actually paid for. We all want to see that. We applaud that, but we do wonder what particular measures he is going to bring about to accomplish that.

Because when that grain moves out of the elevator and goes to a breakfast food company or a feed company or a distillery, if that grain is misappropriated, if it were taken out of the elevator without the authority of the farmer, that receiver might find himself in the same position that you or I might find ourselves in when we buy a car that has a lien on it. We might have to pay for that grain twice.

Two of the ways of handling this situation I have already described are the ones used in the United States. If the minister has another alternative method, all fine and dandy. Of course there are a number of methods that are available to him. One is the insurance fund that he has already brought in for cattle producers.

The government has stood back in the past and said: "Well, you have your Farm Products Marketing Act. You have these things all within your control. It is up to you to look after yourself." There is some measure of truth in that. But when one examines the practical situation, one finds the people who are elected to these various marketing boards are usually the well-established people, the people who sell their goods, in the case of canning crops, to Heinz or Libby McNeill and Libby of Canada, or they will sell them to Campbell Soups and they will not be very much concerned about the possibility, as far as they are personally concerned, of that company going broke.

They are not concerned as directors—or at least they put into the background their duty as directors—to enter into this particular area of the contract because they go into Heinz or whatever company it may be to negotiate the very best possible price they can negotiate for those growers. So, they are reluctant to bring up the business of providing for a check-off that would provide for money to be set aside in an insurance fund to largely protect the producers who are growing for the competitors of these main companies. It is quite understandable that the mainline companies are not anxious to put themselves to extra bookkeeping trouble and to take off a fee which they probably fear, and perhaps rightly so, may become negotiated into the price another year so that it becomes an added cost to them.

The result of all these economic and psychological things as far as marketing is concerned is that not very much attention is paid to the matter of financial integrity for producers of farm crops. One may very well argue that, if some of these measures are brought in, especially the matter of putting funds into a trust fund, banks would be a little more cautious in lending money to processors. I think that is probably true. They would be more cautious, and well they might be more cautious. Under the present circumstances, they do not have to be cautious at all. They do not have to worry about putting money into a processing plant as far as the interest of the bank is concerned, because they simply know that, if they wait until the proper seasonal day when most of the produce of that season has been deposited with the company, there will be all kinds of money there for them to grab. Being the secured creditors that they are, they grab those products.

I personally suffered under one of these bankruptcies quite a number of years ago. There was a small canner to whom I was delivering peaches. My account was not a great one, although the account would have bought me a new car. At the time, I was driving an old clunker and for the next four or five years, every time I got into that old beast, I muttered under my breath at that canning company and that bank for doing me out of the price of a new car.

The interesting point about this case was that a neighbouring farmer who had about 10 times as much money involved as I did and who was getting concerned about the safety of delivering his product to the canner had written to the bank asking them for an opinion as to the safety of his delivery. He got a very nice letter back from the bank saying he had nothing to worry about, this company was in good financial shape, and he should continue to deliver his peaches. On the very day the contract ended—I suppose September 25 would be the last day of the contract; we will say for argument's sake it was September 25—the bank moved in and seized all the pack. They got paid off at four cents on the dollar. I got a cheque for $64. So one can imagine what happened to the chap who had delivered 10 times the amount of product I had to that company.

The point is that the banks under these circumstances can seize goods that may legally belong to them but certainly morally do not belong to them. That product we have delivered to our receiver is the product of our labour. It is just as much a product of labour as the people who work in that particular factory are labour. I am not an expert on labour law, but I do understand that labour comes quite high on the list of people who receive money in the case of bankruptcy. At least if there is any money there, they are certainly at the top level, whereas those of us who put our labour into these situations in the form of goods are at the very bottom of that list.

I think it is morally wrong and just plain bad business to have such a cushion under the banks that they really do not have to be very careful about the situation. One could argue that this would cut off some small people from starting in business.

I should tell members that under this United States legislation they do have provision that when a producer wants to take the chance or wants to sign a waiver saying that he will give up his right to the products he delivers and he knowingly goes in—and it cannot be a verbal contract; it has to be in writing—or he determines that he wants to take such a chance or is financially in a position to take such a chance, he can do it. It has to be known and it has to be up front. It has to be known by the regulatory bodies that govern the legislation, and it has to be in writing.

I submit that there are many ways in which this situation can be cleaned up. I accuse the government of lacking boldness and lacking a real commitment to this. They only act under duress. The last speaker was talking about the boldness of this government and why they have stayed in power these many years. One of the reasons, I would submit, is their lack of boldness. The boldness we have seen in this country, in the form of crop insurance, in the form of marketing legislation, in the form of most—something like 95 per cent—most of the stabilization, the good social legislation we have in Canada in medicare and unemployment insurance: those have been the result of Liberal governments, provincially and federally. It is a long time since we have had them provincially, but the marketing legislation we have in this province was brought about by a provincial Liberal government.

Interjections.

Mr. McGuigan: The member for Middlesex (Mr. Eaton) has pointed out that it is really the government system of gradualism, and it is that system of gradualism that has kept them in power; they have built on that very farm legislation.

But I give them full credit. I give credit especially to the member sitting beside him for the wise counsel he has given over the years in his position as assistant to a number of Ministers of Agriculture and Food. They have been building on that base, and gradually we have a good system; that question has never been under attack. But it does have the one weakness that I pointed out: the people who administer it, for very logical reasons that one can understand, have stayed away from that area of financial protection.

As the government House leader has said, it is government's duty to step in and do those things for people that they cannot do for themselves. The people who are suffering today are going to be affected for years and years to come, and it should not have happened. It was predictable; anybody who saw these downturns in the economy starting about 1979 would have known that we were going to be faced with bankruptcies. I am concerned because I know we are going to be faced with more bankruptcies, not just the three that have occurred.

Certainly I will speak about this time and time again until I see some movement on the part of this government. They have made some great promises in the throne speech. We stand here prepared to offer suggestions. We are going to give them positive criticisms of whatever they bring up, and we are going to be as shrill as an opposition can be that whatever legislation is brought in will be just, will be workable and will give some protection to the primary producers of this province.

There are a number of other items that I could talk about, but I wanted to limit myself to this one area because it has been so prevalent in my riding during the last three years. It is a personal concern.

9:30 p.m.

I see further farm bankruptcies coming down the line as we go about the major restructuring spoken about at the outlook conference the minister had a few days ago, when he had the discourtesy not to invite some of us who could at least have been observers if not active participants. I do not think we have been known for showing misbehaviour or discourtesy at such meetings. We could have been there. It could have been a service we could have rendered back to our constituents, the people who elected us, who have faith in us and who look to us for guidance.

At that very meeting, it was pointed out we are going through major restructuring and there are going to be a great many painful situations we will have to face in the future. Face these situations we will, but we want to face them with whatever civility, dignity and human compassion we can offer to people who find themselves caught in these terrible situations.

We are believers in the free enterprise system. The free enterprise system has winners and it has losers. At least we could give those losers the best legislation to ease the situation to let them go out with a bit of dignity, as is being attempted at the present moment by our federal colleague from Lambton-Middlesex.

I find it sad that the government opposite has taken exception to that act and is opposing it. It is knuckling down to the threats coming from the bankers. The bankers are saying: "If you pass this act, we are really going to get you guys. We are going to withdraw from agricultural financing." They say, "We withdrew following the passage of the act in 1934 and we will withdraw again."

If one goes back to the literature and reads the accounts of what happened, one will find the banks withdrew in 1931, three years before that act was passed. They have been withdrawing for at least a year in the present situation and since that act has been introduced they have been soft-peddalling their situation.

The farmers of Ontario should not be intimidated by such talk. Agriculture is still one of the safest places one can put money in a free enterprise system. It is recognized by the people of Europe. It is recognized by the people of North America. They are rushing to bring their money over here to put it in agriculture because they realize that while the returns may not be as great as they could get in other ventures nevertheless it is a safe place for their money. When all else fails the land will still be there, it will offer safe haven for them.

I feel sorry this government has not seen fit to act, that it is not showing a bit of humanity in these situations and is not supporting the Ontario farmer to the extent it should in his hour of need.

Mr. Cousens: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this throne speech debate. I think a tremendous amount has been said already in a number of areas. The member for Sarnia (Mr. Brandt) spoke about technology and the things that are happening there. The member for Lakeshore (Mr. Kolyn) talked about the needs of the auto pact. There is the heart shown by the member for Kent-Elgin (Mr. McGuigan). The concern he is showing for the farmers is concern we all have to be involved with.

If we look at what is happening in our economy, we see a sense of optimism developing out of the throne speech. There is a sense of movement, a sense the economy is going to improve and a sense of hope. We certainly know the past year has been a difficult one, but we also know the future is starting to augur well for many people.

Yet I do not think any of us wants to forget about the hardships many people have endured over the past year. It has been difficult for many: the unemployed, the very young, the disadvantaged, the handicapped, the infirm and the old. There are very many people in this province who have not had an easy time.

Tonight in my presentation I would like to speak on the subject of the concern that our government is showing towards people. As one who comes out of the field of industry, I feel many of those areas have already been addressed, but I would like also to give an emphasis that is present within this government, this House, for those people who are pulling through and can look forward to better times. I can look with pride at the kind of thing our government has done—

Interjections.

Mr. Cousens: All that member can do is talk. He has never been able to do anything except criticize. Why does he not listen the way we try to listen to him? Our government wants to do something and he does not even want to listen.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) is not even in his proper seat. Therefore, you should not pay any attention to his interjections.

Mr. Cousens: Within our government we have in place now for Ontarians the financial and social nets that were not there during the Depression years when things were very tough. There have been many things that our government has done over the last many years that have helped relieve some of the discomfort that would otherwise have been there, to help individuals and families during these difficult economic times of social stress.

At the beginning of a new session of the Legislature, at a time when there is increasing hope, I am proud the speech from the throne confirms our government's continued commitment to the wellbeing of the citizens of this province. During the Depression—I was born in the latter part of it—there was an absence of social programs. There was a lack of comprehensive family and social services. It meant that untold numbers of people suffered far more.

Today, what we have in Ontario is a depth of social services. You just have to look around the world, and where would you rather live? There is no other place I would rather be than in Ontario. Yet to hear some others talk, one would think they would rather be somewhere else. Maybe if they were, it would be comforting for some of us to see them move.

Approximately two thirds of Ontario's spending goes to support social programs. This amounts to some $13,929,000,000 in the fiscal year 1982-83. Those moneys are going to support the needs of people in this province. These are not recent innovations—

Interjection.

Mr. Cousens: The member does not know what he is talking about. Our province goes back over 20 years in developing social programs. It has developed them. It introduced medicare—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The honourable member for York Centre has the floor. The member for Ottawa Centre or any of his colleagues had the opportunity to have the floor prior to that. They chose not to, for whatever reason, and I would ask them please not to interject and allow the member for York Centre to continue.

Mr. Cousens: Thank you. It must be very difficult for certain members to control themselves. There is another point of view. The point of view I am trying to present is certainly one that stands on the evidence that people have across this province who know that this province has something that is worth while. That is, there are programs and services and there is a commitment.

Our government has shown that commitment to maintain these services, as we go to try to help those children who are disturbed, as we go into the communities and help those communities that have special needs, as we go and help the aged with their special programs. There are so many areas in which our government has gone to work to help these people. In 1973—

9:40 p.m.

Mr. Cooke: Don't be silly.

Mr. Cousens: The member is being silly when he does not acknowledge what we have.

The other thing that stands forward is that our government continues in the face of a tough economy to maintain its commitment to these genuine areas.

Mr. Cooke: Come to my home town.

Mr. Cousens: Those are not just words; we are talking significant dollars.

Mr. Speaker: Will the member for York Centre please address his remarks to the Speaker and not to the individual members?

Mr. Cousens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is very difficult when other honourable members do not fully appreciate—

Mr. Cassidy: On a point of order: I just want to say that with the magnanimity of experience around here, I am prepared to accept that some good things have occasionally come from the government; but in the face of the worst crisis this province has had for 40 years, this is the most abysmal throne speech in 40 years.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Having said that, I do not know what it has to do with order.

Mr. Cousens: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate your intervention at this point because, as one who is concerned about the future of this province, I know the future is based on the solid foundation that has been built over a number of years.

When we look at the kinds of things our government has done, we saw in 1973 the establishment of the Provincial Secretariat for Social Development. This was something that began to co-ordinate even more Ontario's social programs for social development. Since then, policies have been directed towards the consolidation and co-ordination of social services and towards reducing government bureaucracy in the delivery of these services. In fact, if one looks at the ratio of our cost of delivery to the services presented, it is the best of any province in this country.

In recent years, changing social conditions and changing population trends have had a profound effect on government social programs in that more emphasis has been directed towards helping families in such areas as provision of day care for both the young and the elderly, counselling services for young mothers and parents, and aid for the handicapped. Let me just touch this evening on some of the areas where our government has done something in support of children's services.

Interjections.

Mr. Cousens: At your request, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to ignore these interjections, which do not really assist anyone in understanding what is going on. Some people have to listen and learn, and I see they have trouble in doing that.

What I would like to touch on, first of all, is something of the services in support of children in this province. Substantial improvements have taken place over the last decade in programs for children, day care and community support services for the developmentally handicapped. Expenditures in the children's services program in 1982 and 1983 approximate $399 million. During the past year, additional funds were utilized to improve child abuse programs and foster care.

The government expects to expend in excess of $500 million in 1983-84 on children's services, and $354.5 million was allocated in 1982-83 for programs for developmentally handicapped children and individuals. This is a significant amount of care and concern our government has shown. Let us not take it for granted. Here in this country and in this province we have 17 government-operated facilities, 10 community-operated facilities and four diagnostic and treatment centres. These provide care and treatment and training for about 7,000 developmentally handicapped persons.

In the spring of this year, the standing committee on social development investigated the problems of child abuse in Ontario. The committee's recommendations urged more legislative and administrative support for abused children. They suggested certain changes in children's aid societies, in the courts, and discussed the need for more effort in the areas of education and research in child abuse.

Responding to the committee's concern, the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea) announced in March that the first child abuse treatment centre in Ontario will be established in Metro by the end of this year.

The minister also agreed with the committee that the definition of child abuse should be expanded to include emotional and social abuse, not just physical and sexual abuse. The minister has said that if the changes cannot be included in the new Children's Act he will amend the existing children's welfare legislation as soon as possible. In that regard, work is proceeding with the new Children's Act, a piece of legislation designed to consolidate and improve upon the present multitude of diverse and disparate laws relating to children.

When we look at the province we see a tremendous group of services to assist those in social need. We have general welfare assistance in this province for those who are unemployed and have a difficult time handling their own economy. There is also the family benefits assistance. Last year, special recession funds involving $52 million were provided for both those funds.

There is a work incentive program that was set up to assist recipients of the family benefits allowance who wanted to return to full-time or part-time work. Up to March 1981, 2,440 recipients were involved in this program. Other provincial social welfare support is provided through the property and sales tax credits and also through shelter allowances.

The Ontario government also extends assistance to the working poor. These are individuals and families who are primarily dependent on employment rather than social assistance and transfer payments, but whose earnings are inadequate. There are four major assistance programs for the working poor: the Ontario tax credit, Ontario health insurance plan premium assistance, rent-geared-to-income housing and subsidized day care. These are all important programs for those people who otherwise would have an even more difficult struggle.

But our government has shown the kind of concern it should in these fundamental areas and has made the commitment to retain and continue to support them. Not only is our government interested in youth, social and welfare programs, but there is a genuine and sincere commitment by the government to the needs of the elderly.

The whole area of the elderly, with their needs, is a matter of great significance. Seniors have made vast contributions to our communities throughout their lives; they have made a great contribution to the economy of this province and to our country. Therefore, it is essential we recognize their effort and the problems they are having now in coping with these uncertain times.

Universal assistance to our seniors is largely a federal responsibility, but, as we are already witnessing, universal social programs are easy targets for the federal government in its drive slowly to recapture its funds and control of its budget by removing the expenditure of those funds in this needy area.

Already the federal government has taken steps in this direction by cutting back on its share of transfer payments to the province. Such cutbacks affect provincial social service capabilities, but of all people, the elderly should be the last to be the victims of squabbles between two levels of government. Even though the basic responsibility for helping seniors lies with the federal government, Ontario has stepped in where Ottawa has hesitated.

The support offered by the Ontario government to its seniors includes the property tax credit, temporary assistance to reduce home heating costs and the sales tax rebate program. Pensioners are eligible for the guaranteed annual income system, which is a payment to supplement their income. They are entitled to free OHIP. They are covered by free prescriptions, the Ontario dental/drug benefit plan. Elderly persons in need of income support for themselves or their dependants, and who are not eligible for old age security and guaranteed income supplements, can receive provincial assistance through the family benefits program or the general assistance program.

Ontario also tries to help seniors through cost-share programs with the municipalities. Two of the financial assistance programs that help many are the supplementary aid for seniors program and the assistance to Ontario senior citizens of the rental housing program. For those less able to cope on their own, the province, in co-operation with the municipalities, supports the Ontario charitable homes for the aged and the Ontario municipal homes for the aged. Municipal homes provide extended care services.

I am proud of the many things our province does in support of its seniors. Other health care programs are also available to our seniors. The Ontario nursing program is certainly one of them, for we are able to give them extra care and attention.

A few days ago when the member for York South (Mr. Rae) was making his presentation, although I have always had a great respect for him and always will, I am sure, because of his leadership ability and his intelligence, when I saw him making his presentation, I had a different vision of him as leader. I saw him as something of a painter. Instead of a pallet and a fine brush for painting, he really had in his hand a pail of black paint and a wide brush, and it was his job to paint everything black. That is the kind of thing we really must beware of, a black bias that takes things to one direction without seeing a perspective to it.

I do not want to take the other side and say we are whitewashing things, and I do not want to say we are taking too much of an extreme. However, in this whole area there is a sense of balance that we should maintain, and when he started the kind of comments about nursing home care being run by a private sector and that is bad, or someone making a profit on it and that being bad, I began to wonder where it really is they are coming from. In fact, the concern of so many in nursing home care is that of the patient and those who need that care.

We see that as a very important and fundamental service in this province, that we continue to provide excellent nursing home care to those who need it. In fact, we see that in this province, where we have the Ontario Nursing Home Association working closely with the Minister of Health and senior health officials, discussing common concerns and working towards a better system.

This is a people industry, with a quarter of a billion hours of care being given each year to those who need it. Problems can enter, not only in government-run nursing care centres but also in privately run centres, and they always will because there are people there making judgments. Nonprofit does not mean there are no problems, and that is the bottom line that is offered in this black picture that is painted by the member for York South.

We often hear, as we did the other day, the negatives. There were a number of letters read about people who had complaints about nursing home care. I wonder where all those other letters are that people have written to the administrators and others, saying how happy they were with the care they were receiving. What about the relatives who know there is something very worth while happening. This was not mentioned in that speech.

There is a concern about a monopoly somewhere in running nursing homes. I happen to believe that in the nursing homes I have seen that are run by hospitals and by municipalities, and also by the private sector, there is something very worth while going on. In fact as I have visited the nursing homes in my riding, there has been a changing need in those homes over the last number of years. Ten years ago one in particular had the average age of its residents as 71; the average age now, 10 years later, is 81 years of age.

So there is an increasing need to improve and modify those services to meet the needs of those patients who are becoming more elderly.

There was some concern in that honourable member's speech about people being drugged. I suggest that is not a problem in the nursing homes; it is a problem, if someone has one, with the doctors who prescribe the drugs, because it is not the nursing home which prescribes medicine. It is either the patient's own doctor or the nursing home doctor.

The suggestion really gives the impression that the nursing homes want to have more power and more problems. The fact is that what I see happening in those nursing homes in my riding is a sense of support and concern and care for those who need it. I also wondered, when the painter was painting his black picture, about those nursing homes that are run by union employees, who also have a very genuine concern for the residents and the people they are serving. I wondered if they too were being painted by the same black brush.

I listened to the speech and I have a sense of concern. If we are going to be successful in this province it will not be by just giving everything to the government to run; it is up to the family and the community also to get involved to support the needs of these homes and these residents as they become older. Sometimes there is a problem of people abdicating their responsibility and maybe we should be doing more to encourage more community involvement in these programs.

I also heard the honourable member make great criticism of one particular company that has a nursing home near my riding with Extendicare. I can just say that the member failed to appreciate the fact that, when he was indicating that Extendicare owned so many homes—it owned 16—one of them in my riding is a beautiful facility providing excellent care. So I would beware, and ask others to beware of broad generalizations that really do not lead anyone anywhere.

I ask members to look at the positive side of things. There is not just a black side; there is a sense of momentum and movement within this whole program that has a concern for people. As we see a creditation program developing, those problems that have been addressed will be resolved, and there will be a continuing effort to clean up those little problems where they exist.

When I have seen problems I have gone to the administrator or I have gone to the Minister of Health and they have responded to them, rather than making a spectacle within the House to draw attention to a particular incident. I happen to believe there are other ways of solving the problems and that is by working with people and by promoting good things and giving an example to work towards. I see that happening through a number of developments and programs that are taking place.

There are ways we can go ahead and that is to be proactive rather than reactive. I see our Minister of Health giving the kind of leadership to these areas that we want to have within this government.

The provision of good nursing home care has always been a priority of our health care system. When at any time the ministry has reason to believe that standards are not being maintained, it has moved in swiftly to investigate the situation. When serious deficiencies have been found, it has not hesitated to close down the facility and transfer the residents to another setting, or give the nursing home operator a deadline by which he must comply with Ministry of Health standards.

During 1982, for example, of the province's 340 nursing homes which were in operation during that year, 15 were closed through ministry negotiations because they did not meet the standards set out in the regulations.

I believe all of these facts speak for themselves. Within a health care system as large and diverse as ours, we know that in Ontario, from time to time, one will be able to find problems, one will be able to isolate unique circumstances that one can blow up and make a story out of. But may I say, on the other hand, there are many good things happening within this program.

We can continue to work to make it better but we cannot paint the whole system with a black brush, as some would have us do. I do not want to paint it with a white brush, but there is a way in which we can continue to work to have a better system, and that is certainly one of our great desires.

Mr. Roy: How can he mix that white with that black paint?

Mr. Cousens: That becomes grey, and when it is grey it sort of gets to another party that is in the middle. So maybe we can have the white over here and the black somewhere else.

I do not want to be either white or black. I would like to move toward that which is best. What is happening in our province is a sincere and genuine effort by our government to move, to improve and to develop the kind of programs that mean something to people.

I think the example of the extended home care support for the elderly is an example where our government expanded services to help elderly and senior citizens to stay in their own homes longer. There are programs that people do not realize that our government supports. I would like to give credence to that. We have Meals-on-Wheels, housekeeping, home maintenance, transportation, visiting and many other kinds of valuable assistance for elderly citizens living on their own. It is another of those positive undertakings supported by our government.

The government's commitment to our senior citizens was highlighted last year by the establishment of the seniors secretariat. The government believes it is important to help Ontario's seniors maintain their independence wherever possible. To this end, it has encouraged increased emphasis on home care and home support services. Rather than institutionalized care, innovative health care such as day programs, outpatient programs, and community-based health clinics are in the process of being developed as alternatives to acute hospital health care.

There are tremendous benefits for our seniors in this province. If one talks to our seniors, one knows they appreciate the services that are available. There is not a member in this House who does not try to help the people in his or her riding by directing his or her constituents to those services so they can get the optimum advantage that is there for them. It is important for us not to take them for granted. Our government has not taken them for granted. Our government is moving to continue to improve them.

Our health care system seems to get knocked by a number of people, but the people who are the quiet majority continue to stand out there, knowing that waiting for them in case they need it is a service that is one of the best in the world—that is the service of health care in our province.

As we look at the services, there is a changing need in our province. We see the changing need of treatment of infectious diseases being replaced with degenerative and chronic cares. Our government is trying to adjust health care policy to the new realities as we see them.

For example, we are increasing the number of facilities that offer less-intensive care. There will be more outpatient clinics and more home care programs to encourage early discharge from hospitals. Public health programs will become increasingly important to educate us as to how to eat, exercise and work.

One of the things our Minister of Health is doing is to bring together this coming May a policy conference entitled Ontario's Health Care System in the 80s and Beyond. This is an important conference, one that will bring together representatives of the Ontario Medical Association, the Ontario Hospital Association, the Registered Nurses' Association of Ontario, other health care providers, planners and members of the public. The results of this conference will provide the government with guidance on the direction for Ontario's future health care system.

Mr. Cassidy: You sure kept the unions out of that one, didn't you?

Mr. Cousens: The fact is they are represented.

Multiservice centres are one response to the fragmented service provision and the Minister of Health announced a few months ago an expansion and further development of community health centres which will provide access to a range of health—

Mr. Cassidy: After Timbrell fought them for seven years.

Mr. Cousens: The honourable member is seeing progress. He is seeing the evolution where the government is continuing—

Mr. Cassidy: Why do we have to wait while stupid ministers resist progress?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the honourable member please refrain—

Mr. Cassidy: It is your government. He says it is good; Timbrell says it is bad.

Mr. Kolyn: Your member talked three and a half hours.

Mr. Cassidy: Martel was talking sense.

Mr. Kolyn: Baloney.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will not caution the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Kolyn) and the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) further.

Mr. Cousens: The community health centres are an important step towards providing services today in a way in which more and more people can benefit from them. They will be funded in the same manner as hospitals rather than the present short-term contracts. The advantage of community health centres is they can perform many of the functions now handled by hospital emergency and outpatient departments.

We have a health care system in our province that is an enormous undertaking, and because there are so many different professional groups, institutions, agencies and public interest associations legitimately involved in its provision, the people of Ontario—

Mr. Kerrio: You said “we had.”

Mr. Cousens: Have; it is present tense. It is the present tense and it is something that is continuing to improve.

Interjection.

Mr. Cousens: No, I am in this House in the company of good people. It is a relatively easy thing for someone to single out one area for criticism, but the fact is health care is one of those areas that is of significant importance to our government. It is the single biggest expenditure which is made each year by this government.

During the past fiscal year, 1982-83, health care alone accounted for $6.7 billion and represented nearly one third of the total revenues available for allocation. The health care system of our province is truly among the best that can be found anywhere in the world. The government of this province is determined to protect that tradition and that reputation.

Last year when things were tough, in response to a Health ministry request for additional funding to develop a new budgeting formula for our public general hospitals, cabinet agreed to provide the ministry with moneys totalling $110 million. This new funding adjustment has since been made in the Ontario Hospital Association, and the great majority of our individual hospitals have responded positively and enthusiastically to the new financial arrangement.

I would also like to point out that these funds were protected for the health care system during a time of economic difficulty in this province and during a time when there were numerous other worthy and important demands being made for government support. I would point out that this decision was made at a time when the federal government had seen fit to export its own deficit problems to the provinces by cutting back on the revenue guarantees of the established programs financing arrangement. Our provincial cabinet made a decision that was therefore a clear illustration of this government's commitment to preserve the excellence in health care that the people of Ontario enjoy.

In the past few months new initiatives have been undertaken in the mental health area. New community-based services are now in place for former psychiatric patients, and more are under development. Patient advocates are also being appointed to our provincial psychiatric hospitals to assist patients in their relations with the hospitals and to better understand their legal and treatment circumstances. Community advisory bodies have also been appointed to the hospitals to promote the development of better relations with their local communities and for a better understanding of local mental health needs.

Indeed, it is a well-known fact to every member of this House that the development of new mental health services is a priority of the Minister of Health and that within the next few years we will see many dramatic changes in the provision of this vital health care service. A complete review of mental health care in Ontario is now being completed, and it is expected that the final report of this exhaustive study will be ready by early this summer.

Better health services mean people are living longer, and the baby boom generation now coming to maturity means that shortly after the turn of this century we will see in Ontario a growth of nearly 58 per cent in the number of senior citizens. This group already accounts for almost one third of the demand on health care services, so it is readily apparent that the implications for our future health care system are significant.

With an eye on these strategic developments, the Health ministry is now embarking on a major expansion of home care programs to assist elderly residents to maintain an independent and productive life in their own communities. Home care is now available in some 36 out of 38 Ontario regions and districts. The two remaining regions will have home care service by the end of the current fiscal year.

We can also expect, however, on the basis of the record of this government and its commitment to health care for the people of Ontario, that any problems or difficulties will be quickly identified and the appropriate actions will be taken to maintain the excellence in health care of which we are justifiably proud.

Our government is there to continue to provide the best people services it possibly can within the financial limitations that its budget can provide. Even though we build a deficit, we continue to maintain those important fundamental services for the people of this province. Our child care, our elderly care, our social assistance, our day care, our nursing home care—these and many programs continue to provide the kind of lifestyle that we have come to expect and take for granted.

May I say to all of us that we should not take it for granted. Like the padre at the Empire Club today, who began the luncheon with his prayer giving thanks for the bounty we have in this province and this country, maybe there should be a little bit more thankfulness for all the good things we have and—

Mr. Kerrio: There is going to be a mutiny on that Bounty, I'm telling you right now.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cousens: There is going to be a mutiny over there, I think.

10:10 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bradley: What about the Albany Club?

Mr. Cousens: No, this was the Empire Club. It was simply those of all parties and all concerns having a concern about the future of our country. This to me is something that makes one proud to be part of this province.

Mr. Bradley: Who was the guest speaker?

Mr. Cousens: We had an excellent speech by the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett), an outstanding speech, which reiterated the importance of people and the concern that government has to have for people.

There is a number of other things one could say on this throne speech, but I would like to leave a little for the other members of this party. It certainly makes me proud to be part of a government that shows such a genuine and deep concern for all its citizens.

Mr. G. I. Miller: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the throne speech debate at the beginning of 1983. It is interesting to sit and listen to the government members trying to defend their positions and what they have done over the years, particularly the House leader when he was going over the history and how he became connected with the Conservative Party.

I would like to think that Mitch Hepburn really was the one who put hydro up and down the concessions. I remember it quite well. I believe it was 1935 when we blew out the lamp at our home and that first light bulb went on. It was like a miracle. I recall well that many good old Conservatives voted, maybe only once, but they did vote that time for Mitch Hepburn just because he was going to provide hydro to many rural areas in Ontario. I just wanted to bring the government House leader up to date.

We have been critical of Ontario Hydro's spending and I think justifiably so. When we have to start mothballing plants because of overbuilding, we have to bring some sensibility to the overall expenditures everybody has to pay for. I am not critical to the point of saying Ontario Hydro is not providing a good service, because it is. It is providing much employment.

I do not know whether we should be going totally to nuclear. The member made some interesting comments about coal-fired stations. We happen to have one in Nanticoke, which is only now getting the bugs out. It is employing 500 people. It is utilizing coal, 50 per cent of which comes from Canada. If those scrubbers were applied to that plant, it would certainly create some jobs that are badly needed. It would also clean up our environment. It would set the pace for our negotiations when we are dealing with the United States. We had our American friends sitting in the gallery today. If we set them examples, I am sure they will co-operate and follow along.

On a lighter note, I would like to bring to the House's attention that we have had some success in our hockey. All the problems and unemployment make it kind of depressing when one goes back to one's riding. It is nice to know we had a Port Dover hockey team playing Norwood.

Mr. Kolyn: Sailors?

Mr. G. I. Miller: No, juveniles. It is a fantastic team; they play with lots of heart. I thought Norwood was in the Speaker's riding. It is pretty close to his riding. We lost out to them in a best-of-seven series, I believe it was two games to four.

The real contest we have going is the junior teams, the Dunnville Mudcats and the Lindsay Muskies. I have a little wager with my colleague the member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Eakins) that the Dunnville Mudcats are going to be too much. As a matter of fact, last Sunday they threw a mudcat on the ice just to show there are real mudcats in the Grand River. I think they lead in that series three games to two.

Interjection.

Mr. G. I. Miller: There are hundreds of them in there, John. You ought to come down some time.

I would like to bring to the government's attention and just put on the record some of the facts in regard to this government and the particular economic picture in Ontario.

Figures for March show unemployment is at 569,000 or 12.6 per cent of the working force. The 1982 throne speech—and in the 1982 budget, I recall it well, the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller)—predicted an improvement in unemployment by the end of 1982 of 125,000. However, since last May we have actually seen 175,000 more people become unemployed. Present figures show 233,000 young people between the ages of 15 and 24 are out of work. This figure increased by 22,000 last month alone.

I do not know how the members on the other side of the House can be really concerned with trying to defend it, when we have unemployment rates running at that kind of figure.

In terms of the gross provincial product, Ontario is now in a position equivalent to where it was when the member for Muskoka (Mr. F. S. Miller) became Treasurer in 1977. We have fallen that quickly. Bankruptcies are at a post-war high with 3,427 firms filing for bankruptcy in 1982. One can see by that total that it certainly has added to the unemployment figure.

It was brought to my attention only last week that there are no more programs to assist small business to refinance, only through the Federal Business Development Bank. Their interest rates are 15.5 per cent. With today's economy, there is no way a small business can make that kind of profit and survive.

The throne speech did not mention the fact there was going to be assistance for small business to get some of those bankruptcies back on track again. I feel it is an area where, if the government is really sincere, it will come up with programs. I have asked the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker), through his good offices at Kitchener, whether there are any programs available to assist small business. I find there are none.

There is funding available, if it is in the manufacturing sector, where we will provide some assistance with a lot of strings attached. There are some programs there, but when it comes down to financing small business, there are no plans available except at the federal level, and as I indicated before, at 15.5 per cent.

I would like to compare that to agriculture and some of the programs they have. The picture for Ontario farmers is similar to that of the businessman. The young farmer of Ontario has tremendous difficulty competing for markets because of long-term loan arrangements in every other province, along with interest assistance plans. The present Ontario government lacks any real commitment to the agriculture industry in this province.

In fact, agriculture budgetary expenditures have declined from 1.83 per cent in 1971 to 1.1 per cent of our total present budgetary expenditures. This for an industry that employs one of every five people in Ontario.

A farm bankruptcy occurs in Ontario every two and a half days. Although there are many and varied reasons for this, the important thing is we need to maintain farm production.

Mr. Cooke: What does Gene Whelan say?

Mr. G. I. Miller: I will get to that. He is doing something about it.

The important thing is we need to maintain farm production to feed the people of this province and country. Ontario farms could produce most of what is needed and required in food production.

I would like to point out that in our own particular area, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has put out a 1982 edition of Agriculture and on the front page it says, "A Major Industry in Haldimand-Norfolk," and, "Farming is a Big Business." In our region of Haldimand-Norfolk, agriculture produces $280 million worth of crops, and of those crops tobacco produces almost 50 per cent.

Speaking of tobacco, when we find a farming industry that is in trouble, I think the tobacco industry sets an example second to none. As a matter of fact, they had a devastating frost on August 29, 1982, I believe, which wiped out at least 50 per cent of their crop, so this year they are negotiating for prices and markets. Because they are coming up with a production of only 210 million pounds compared to last year's 230 million, and with a short crop last year, they are not taking it sitting down; they are trying to form a national marketing agency so they can get a better share of the market in order to protect their industry.

I know some people in this House frown at the fact that tobacco is not a product that people need, but I would like to inform everyone in this Legislature that tobacco produces something like $1.5 billion in taxes at the federal and provincial levels, plus the fact that it is about a $500-million crop within the farming area itself. So I think it does contribute much to the overall economy of this country. The Ontario producers are competing successfully with world markets and are a leading force. They are quick to react and protect their own interests.

Mr. Cooke: What about Liberal interest rates? They have put farmers in trouble.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. G. I. Miller: Our friends to the left have asked what Gene Whelan is doing about assisting the farm industry. Again I would just like to comment briefly on the throne speech of 1982.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Haldimand-Norfolk has the floor.

Mr. G. I. Miller: Getting back to the throne speech, in 1982 this government committed itself to protecting—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Now perhaps we can listen to the member for Haldimand-Norfolk.

Mr. Ruston: I will learn more listening to the member for Haldimand-Norfolk than I will from him.

Mr. Speaker: Then let's give him a chance to say it.

Mr. Cassidy: Sheila said a Liberal is a Liberal is a Liberal, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. G. I. Miller: Getting back to the throne speech of 1982, this government committed some assistance to the young farmers of Ontario with a lot of prodding from opposition members, but nothing really took place. They did bring in the Ontario farm adjustment assistance program, and by the end of 1982 interest rates were down to a level where it was not very meaningful to many of the farm producers.

The only program that is available is through the Farm Credit Corp. They have a program of assisting farmers up to $300,000 for a two-year period at 9.25 per cent. I would like to put on the record for the members to our left that some progress was made in 1982. But 1983 is a new year, and this is the throne speech we are speaking to and criticizing.

Mr. Cassidy: Forget about the past, eh?

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the member for Windsor-Riverside (Mr. Cooke) would just turn his seat around a bit and face forward and listen attentively to the member for Haldimand-Norfolk.

Mr. Bradley: It is much noisier since the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) was moved from the front row.

Mr. Speaker: I can tell you, you are not doing badly.

Mr. G. I. Miller: Mr. Speaker, again I would like to speak about some of the bankruptcies that are taking place at the present time because I have had three of those to deal with in my own riding, as my friend the member for Kent-Elgin (Mr. McGuigan) indicated in his address just a few minutes ago.

It is not very pleasant when one is talking to a family that has been farming for three generations in one location—they have two sons who went to Ridgetown and got their training there, but one boy is sent home and told there is no future in farming, not to go back to the farm—and see those people get into a financial position that they cannot really finance because of the programs this government would not provide even with the prodding that we have given it over the last four or five years.

That is why I say in my opening remarks that this government does not really care about agriculture when it is the most important item, it is the engine that makes the economy work. As I pointed out by mentioning the booklet on Haldimand-Norfolk, agriculture is big business, and when agriculture goes, industry goes.

We have a steel plant at Nanticoke providing employment for 1,300 people and running effectively. We have a farm machinery plant at Brantford, and the member for Brantford (Mr. Gillies) is sitting here tonight. They unveiled a new tractor down here in front of the Holiday Inn only yesterday, the second tractor that has been manufactured totally in Canada.

But there is White Farm Equipment. I have people in my riding asking, "What is my future? I have worked there for six or seven years. Are they going to go back to work? Are they not going to go back to work?" They are left on a teeter-totter. We have people like that. I think that is when it gets very difficult to deal with.

As I spoke to the chap with the Massey tractor sitting in front of the Holiday Inn yesterday, he said, "If we can get the farm economy going here"—he recognizes where the needs are—"if we get the farm economy rolling again, give the farmer a fair dollar for his corn and soybeans and his wheat and his produce, he can buy that equipment and he can get that circle rolling again." That is the key. That is what we have to try to achieve.

I spoke about agriculture's engine breaking down, and it began to break down four years ago and nobody would recognize it. I do not think our friends to the left understand that. I do not think they could survive on a farm. I cannot see anybody there who really could survive on a farm. I would challenge them to that.

Mr. Ruston: Just on the asphalt, that is all.

Mr. G. I. Miller: Asphalt farming. I am not here to defend Gene Whelan; I am here to defend the farmers I represent today, and I intend to do that.

If we do not come up with a program to refinance, if we do not get the program that has been announced in the throne speech, there are going to be a lot more sad young people out there with no place to go. They will not have a home to go to; their lifetime work will be gone; their future will be gone. We have to give them a helping hand at this particular time. That is why we have brought out a—

Mr. McLean: When was the last time you milked a cow?

Mr. G. I. Miller: This morning. When did you last milk yours?

On motion by Mr. G. I. Miller; the debate was adjourned.

The House adjourned at 10:30 p.m.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

SPECIAL SERVICES AT HOME PROGRAM

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to have the opportunity to bring the honourable members up to date on the outstanding success of the special services at home program of my ministry.

When I spoke to the standing committee on social development a year ago, I told them my ministry was initiating a program of support services and special equipment to assist parents with developmentally handicapped children to care for their children in their own homes.

I am proud to say that not only have we developed a unique program, exciting in many ways, but also we have been able to take it directly to the parents and the children. In only six months my ministry staff has consulted with the Ontario Association for the Mentally Retarded, the local associations, other agencies and interested community groups. We have developed guidelines and a manual of operation, carried out a province-wide community education program and committed $1.5 million to this program.

To date, 870 applications for assistance have been approved. In total, 881 children and their families have been provided with services ranging from parent relief workers to specialists in behavioural management. The special services program has also provided equipment such as bath lifts, educational computers and hearing aids.

All this has led to some extremely encouraging response from the community. I might add that the media have also commended the government for providing services currently not available from any other source.

Let me give the members some examples of how this program has helped the people of this province.

In Cornwall, Peter and Nancy Amell have told us that special services at home were the key in keeping their family together. Funding to hire a specialist to work with their three-year-old blind and quadriplegic child allowed the Amells relief from hours of constant anxiety and concern. It has also given them more time to attend to the needs of their other child.

The Rogers family in Mississauga also know the stress and tension of having a 13-year-old arthritic child who suffers from severe tuberous sclerosis, leaving her mentally disabled. This program made it possible for them to purchase a whirlpool so that the child could receive the necessary therapy and relief from discomfort in her own home.

The Edwards family in St. Catharines told a newspaper reporter that the special services program was a life-saver. It strengthened their determination to help their two-year-old son, who is blind, deaf and suffering from a rare kidney disease, to succeed in developing a future. With special indoor playground and gymnastics equipment for physical stimulation, brightly coloured to improve his visual senses, and a tiny radio-like box complete with hearing aids, Trevor now is able to explore the world around him. It has also given him the ability to distinguish voices and to develop to the level of his peers.

In Gravenhurst, doctors told the Dolmage family that their multihandicapped child would not survive infancy. That was eight years ago. Now, thanks to the special services program, a teaching assistant instructs Matthew in the use of a simple computer, and he is learning to read and communicate. He attends a school for developmentally handicapped children.

Let me emphasize, in keeping with the concept of collaboration, that the Ontario Association for the Mentally Retarded and my ministry staff have co-operated in consulting with the private sector as well as various community groups and agencies on the purchase and use of special equipment. Throughout the province, more than 200 public presentations have taken place since last October, and more than 1,000 inquiries about the program have been received.

Besides what has already been done to improve the delivery of services to children in this province, I am pleased to announce that my ministry will expand its spending to ensure that this program continues to flourish and provide the necessary assistance for Ontario families.

The special services program provides a comprehensive range of services to assist parents of developmentally handicapped children in strengthening the natural bond of love and care with their children while in their own homes. We are showing the families of 881 developmentally handicapped children that the community admires them for the work they are doing and deeply cares.

Everyone recognizes that parents of these children have accepted the responsibilities even though it means assuming a very heavy burden. This program is a further commitment by my ministry and this government to community living for the developmentally handicapped.

TAX GRANTS FOR SENIORS

Hon. Mr. Ashe: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce to the honourable members that today the Ministry of Revenue is mailing some 554,000 interim Ontario tax grant cheques totalling nearly $145 million to eligible senior citizens throughout the province. These cheques are combined payments of 1983—

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Ashe: Mr. Speaker, it is great that this is such an excellent program that it disturbs the members opposite to some great degree. It is only when a program is well received by the public that they get upset.

These cheques are combined payments of 1983 interim property tax grants and temporary home heating grants. The interim property tax grant portion of the cheque is calculated as 50 per cent of the senior's 1982 property tax grant, to a maximum of $250. To that amount is added the temporary home heating grant, which this year equals $40 per household. The maximum possible value of each cheque is therefore $290, while the average cheque is $260.96.

As members will be aware, the mailing of these interim cheques marks the beginning of the 1983 Ontario tax grants for seniors program cycle. In September, seniors throughout the province will receive an application form which will determine the amount of the second instalment of their 1983 grant. Seniors who turned 65 after December 31, 1982, will not be receiving the interim or first instalment of the 1983 grant. However, they will receive an application form this fall and may apply for the full 1983 grant at that time.

I would like to point out to the members that once again the mailing of these interim grant cheques is being supported by a full range of public information measures, including advertisements in daily, weekly and ethnic newspapers and the mailing of bulletins and comprehensive information kits to all constituency offices and other key government outlets such as northern affairs offices and community information centres.

In the past these information kits have proven an important resource for staff in these offices who provide valuable support to the tax grants program through their inquiry and referral services. I know the Ministry of Revenue can rely on the continued co-operation and assistance of these offices and their staffs in the successful administration of our 1983 tax grants for seniors program.

MEMBERS' PRIVILEGES

Mr. Sargent: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: My point of privilege is in the interest of both myself and thousands of other Ontario citizens who are charged by an officer of the law or a court official, who go through the court system and pay their debt to society. Yet we have a Citizen Kane like Conrad Black who is above the law, who can call up the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) and get a private appointment with him to ease the pain of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to ask the honourable member to resume his seat. He may question the appropriate minister during the question period.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, my rights as a citizen are being trampled on—

Mr. Speaker: All right. You are absolutely right as a citizen, but the only privileges you have the right to bring up in this House are your privileges as a member, which are over and above the privileges enjoyed by anybody else. I would have to say that you are out of order.

Mr. Sargent: I have a message I want to give to the House.

Mr. Speaker: You can give the message at a more appropriate time perhaps.

Mr. Sargent: Like when?

Mr. Speaker: During oral questions.

SEAWAY TRUST

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce that an arrangement has been made to provide for the orderly administration of the assets of Seaway Trust Co. and the payment of its liabilities as they come due.

The assets of the company have been in the possession and control of the registrar of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act since January 7. With the finalization of an agreement, the registrar will relinquish control and as of this morning, April 29, restrictions on withdrawals have been lifted for Seaway depositors except for certain depositors against whom Seaway may have legitimate claims.

Separate agreements have been reached between Seaway Trust, its subsidiary Seaway Mortgage Corp., the Midland Bank Canada, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. and the registrar. As a result, the effective control of Seaway Trust and Seaway Mortgage will be exercised by nominees of the Midland Bank Canada to carry out the management of Seaway's assets and the payment of its liabilities. Honourable members no doubt will recall that the assets of Seaway Mortgage have been in the possession and control of the federal government since January 7, 1983.

Under the terms of the agreements, neither Seaway Trust nor Seaway Mortgage will accept new deposits or make new investments except those incidental to the management of their assets. As the Touche Ross reports tabled in this House last week clearly indicated, the state of Seaway Trust's finances are such that the only alternative to this kind of arrangement would be the winding up and liquidation of the firm. Such action would have been detrimental to the realization on the assets, which in turn would impact negatively on depositors, creditors and shareholders. A similar situation exists in Seaway Mortgage.

As a result of this arrangement, as of today, depositors are able to receive return of their deposits or investment certificates in full as they mature or come due.

I want to emphasize that this is not a sale involving an exchange of funds. Control of Seaway Trust and its subsidiary Seaway Mortgage is being exercised by Midland Bank Canada, which will proceed to wind down the firms over about a five-year period. Seaway's staff and offices will be reduced to an appropriate level.

A five-person board of directors has been appointed, with André L. Morissette as president and chairman of the board. Mr. Morissette is currently president of Les Entreprises Pimori Inc., a Montreal-based real estate development company, and brings to his new position at Seaway a wealth of experience in the finance and banking field. The other four directors are senior officers of Midland Bank Canada.

Under the arrangements that have been made, Midland hopes to be able to reduce its own losses on a loan made by it to the numbered holding company which held the majority of the shares of Seaway Trust. The loan was secured by shares in Seaway Trust and by other assets. As a result of this relationship, Midland was seen by the registrar and the CDIC as being uniquely positioned to control and operate Seaway. Furthermore, Midland has the capacity to do so.

Midland Bank Canada is the Canadian subsidiary of the Midland Bank Group of Britain, one of the largest banking organizations in the world. The administration agreement with Midland will remain in effect as long as any deposit liabilities of Seaway remain outstanding and any amounts are still owed to CDIC.

To ensure liabilities will be met as they fall due, CDIC will provide for funds to be made available to either company as may be necessary. CDIC's financial support is based on its authority to make or guarantee loans or advances to a member deposit-taking institution when such support will reduce or avert a potential loss to CDIC.

CDIC's potential liability was made even larger by the royal assent this week of federal legislation to increase the level of deposit insurance provided from $20,000 to $60,000.

It should be clearly understood that under the terms of the agreements all depositors, all holders of guaranteed investment certificates and all holders of debentures other than those that have been designated will be paid in full when their security matures. Any moneys realized from the assets of the companies during the course of the agreement will be used to cover liabilities and repay as much of CDIC's advances as possible. Any surplus after such liabilities have been met will be turned over to the common and preferred shareholders. The major preferred shareholder is Midland Bank Canada.

Although the registrar is a party to some of these agreements, there are others that are made solely between the private sector parties. I am exploring with these parties the extent to which they will consent to the tabling of these agreements. I would like to provide the House with as much information as possible, and I will table copies of any of the agreements that can be publicly released.

ORAL QUESTIONS

NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES LTD.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Attorney General with respect to the Norcen affair. It has become obvious that there has been a great deal of confusion through public reports and in a variety of other places about the difference of opinion, apparently, between the Attorney General and the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Elgie), who has the power under, I believe, section 119 of the Securities Act to go ahead with proceedings in the matter.

Could the Attorney General explain to this House why he did not ask the minister directly for his consent to proceed with charges in this matter?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I think I have said on numerous occasions in relation to this. It is our view, the view of myself and my ministry officials, that it is clear the securities legislation obviously requires the consent of the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, and for that reason there can be no doubt that there is a significant degree of prosecutorial discretion built into the legislation.

Basically, I am repeating what the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations said yesterday, because I happen to agree with his statement.

When the Leader of the Opposition refers to differences of opinion, I can assure him those differences of opinion do not exist. I think it is quite clear that the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations must give very serious consideration to the advice he gets from the Ontario Securities Commission, which I think all members of this House agree is not only an independent body but also a body made up of distinguished members of the community who are obviously dedicated to acting in the public interest.

Our law officers were of the view that there was an evidentiary base for a prosecution under the securities legislation, and for that reason I asked the minister to have the commission reconsider its decision.

At the same time, I recognized the fact that the securities commission was in a better position than we were to make a judgement in relation to what was in the best interest of regulating the securities industry, and that, of course, would be consistent with what is the public interest.

While we had certain views with respect to the evidentiary base, we would recognize the primary role of the securities commission to advise the minister as to how he should or should not apply the prosecutorial discretion.

As the honourable member knows, there are relatively few pieces of legislation that require the actual consent of the minister who has the responsibility for administering the act; in the Criminal Code there are several sections that require the consent of the Attorney General before a prosecution can proceed, for example.

The reason this consent is required is that it is recognized that this prosecutorial discretion has to be exercised in cases where there may be a prima facie breach of the legislation. But that in itself does not necessarily mean a prosecution will follow; it depends on the public interest.

It is quite clear to me that the securities legislation is constructed in such a way as to give the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations that responsibility, and in my view he should reject the recommendations of the Ontario Securities Commission only if there are very compelling reasons for doing so.

I saw no such compelling reasons for him to reject its advice, but I certainly thought there was reason for him to ask the commission to reconsider the matter, as it did; and I thought, given the unusual circumstances surrounding this matter, it was also in the securities commission's interest to issue some reasons, as it has done.

I think the commission has attempted to address the matter to the extent that it can—of course, bearing in mind, as we all must, that there is still a criminal investigation into this matter and that we simply have not reached any conclusions with respect to that investigation.

Mr. Peterson: Ultimately, the Attorney General is charged with the administration of justice in this province. It is obvious from the public pronouncement that he and his staff have had a different view of the situation. It is obvious that he has asked the minister to make the report public and that he has refused to do so—

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: No, I have not.

Mr. Peterson: Well, that is according to press reports. That may or may not be correct, and he can stand up in this House and deny it. But it is obvious that there is a great deal of bad faith, and even though the minister has made a decision to go no further with this matter, the Attorney General is continuing with his police reports and continuing to cloud the reputation of people and to again—

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: You are so irresponsible.

Mr. Peterson: This is obviously the case, and there are so many economic interests at stake.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Peterson: I want to ask the minister about this letter that was addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, dated April 27 and signed by one Mr. Peter Dey. It says:

“Dear Dr. Elgie:

“I am writing this further letter separately from my letter dated April 26, 1983, which I have suggested be tabled in the Legislature, because this letter deals with an issue which you may wish to discuss privately with the Attorney General.

“The commission’s review of the staff report only became a matter of public information when the contents of the staff report were improperly provided to the media. The commission has questioned its own staff and it is satisfied that its staff was not the source of the information provided to the media. The commission would like to suggest to you that you request the Attorney General to initiate similar inquiries of his staff.

“The commission remains anxious to co-operate with the Attorney General in parallel investigations, but in doing so the commission must be assured that the confidentiality of its investigations is respected. The commission does not at the present time have this assurance.”

The commission does not trust the minister or what he is doing; there is obviously a bad relationship. How does he explain the hunt he is on, as opposed to the difference of opinion the commission has?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: First of all, I would be interested if the Leader of the Opposition would clarify the statement that was part of his supplementary question. He seems to be suggesting that I should direct the police to cease their criminal investigation. Is that what he is suggesting? I would like to have that clarified, because certainly that is the inference I take from his question.

He is saying that reputations are being unnecessarily clouded, notwithstanding the fact that he seems to think I should require the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations to consent to the prosecution. On one hand, he seems to be criticizing me for not making that direct request. On the other hand, he is accusing us of unnecessarily clouding reputations. I suggest that he examine some of his own statements, examine his own conscience and determine whether he is acting in a most irresponsible fashion.

The simple fact of the matter is that I am not going to direct the police to stop their investigation. I have confidence that the Metropolitan Toronto Police will conclude its investigation when it thinks it is appropriate, and certain recommendations will be made at that time.

Despite any views the member may have on the matter, I am not going to interfere with that process. I am not going to interfere with the integrity of the administration of justice to the extent that he suggests and attempts to do on a day-to-day basis.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, relating back to the first question by the Leader of the Opposition, the main question this morning, and the introduction by the Attorney General into his answer of the term “prosecutorial discretion,” which he used a few days ago on the Metro Morning program, I want to ask the minister to clarify for me, if he can, whether he believes there is any prosecutorial discretion conferred by the Securities Act on the commission.

I also want to ask the Attorney General whether he believes the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations ever exercised any prosecutorial discretion, having regard to the very clear statement by the commission that the unanimous decision of the commission was not to recommend a prosecution under the act.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I have said on numerous occasions. As I read the legislation, clearly the prosecutorial discretion lies with the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. The honourable member knows that is so. That is why the legislation requires the minister’s consent.

It is very clear that the advisory role of the commission is very important and very vital in assisting the minister in the manner in which he should exercise that very important discretion. That is clear to me and I know it is clear to the member, unless he is again playing the little games he likes to play from time to time to cloud important issues unnecessarily.

Mr. Peterson: The Attorney General chose not to address some of the very substantial questions raised in a letter from one Mr. Dey to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations which, when one cuts it all down, shows that he does not have very much faith in the Attorney General and/or his investigation. There are selective leaks going on at various times that are in contravention of the decision the minister has made. I would ask the Attorney General to address that question.

Would the minister not agree with me that there are a myriad of questions still outstanding, such as his own role with respect to the crown attorney Mr. Johnston; his own apparent shift of position on this whole matter; his own obvious displeasure in not having full disclosure of the investigator's report of the OSC, only getting a selective report; his own opinion on this whole matter and his staff's opinion, which is different from the securities commission's?

Given all the economic interests that are at stake here, given the reputations that are at stake, given the question of the administration of justice which has again been clouded, and the minister is well aware that again another in a long series of questions has been raised about the quality of the administration of justice in this province, surely we should have an independent probe into this whole matter to get the thing cleared up.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: With regard to the views of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the administration of justice and independent probes, this is about the 50th time he has suggested an independent probe at the same time as there is an independent inquiry and a police investigation going on.

I wonder when he is going to come to grips with some of the basic and fundamental principles of the justice system, one of which is that we do not have public inquiries at the same time as we have police investigations. That is pretty basic to most first-year law students, at the very least. I think he might start to—

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I really think the hypocrisy the Leader of the Opposition demonstrates on a day-to-day basis in the manner in which he attempts to address these issues—he just has no respect.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the Attorney General to withdraw the use of that word “hypocrisy.”

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I will, at your request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you. I think that was a complete answer. We have spent 14 minutes on the first question.

SECURITY AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Health. It relates to a statement he made while answering in the House yesterday.

I will quote for his ready reference: “I would report to the honourable member that all of the measures in place as of this week, before the recent incident, were substantially better and more secure than they were in March 1981. In other words, there was no relaxation from March 1981 until last Friday. Subsequent to the events of last Saturday, as a precautionary measure, some further rather extraordinary measures have been taken to increase the level of security once again.”

Last January 28, the minister will recall the Dubin report urged the creation of appropriate systems that would have required “identification of all hospital personnel and visitors.” Could the minister tell this House when those security requirements were implemented for personnel and, more important, for visitors with respect to the cardiac ward?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, with regard to all employees at the hospital, that has been in place for some time. With regard to parents and visitors in the cardiac ward, that was put in place just this past weekend as one of the extra security measures.

Mr. Peterson: Could the minister explain to this House how, as I understand it, a Canadian Broadcasting Corp. researcher gained access to the hospital yesterday? I am told the sequence of events went something like this. The person went to the cardiac ward, talked for some time with the security guard there, asked for access, had to sign his name and no identification was required.

I am told he signed his name, gave the name of a fictitious baby patient in the ward to go to visit, was granted ready access and walked about the ward. There was no one at the nursing station. He was able to look into various rooms. There was no one there attending to the various children. He meandered about for 10 minutes or so and then walked out.

I am told that happened yesterday. Is the minister aware of that? Is that the kind of security systems the minister has in place to prevent that kind of thing?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If the honourable member wants to draw certain conclusions based on that series of events to suggest that in his opinion the security measures in place on wards 4A and 4B are inadequate, perhaps he ought to say so without making an inference, if that is the case. Let me say—

Mr. Breithaupt: That is a pretty fair conclusion.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, but I am quite prepared to say on the other side of that case that the security measures the hospital has in place, particularly on 4A and 4B, are quite sufficient. The fact that someone was down there and was able to hand in his or her name and get certain access under certain terms and conditions does not mean the security is inadequate.

It means the hospital has certain backup measures, which the member and I know should not be disclosed. It should not be taken to mean the hospital was unaware of the circumstances, that access is available to those children or that all the perceptions which he understands that particular person has are necessarily accurate.

Perceptions—the way it may appear to someone attempting to do that sort of thing—are not entirely in line with reality. The hospital knows well what is under way in 4A and 4B; and in point of fact, with regard to the recommendations they have received from the Centers for Disease Control and from Dubin regarding 4A and 4B, there is hardly anything left undone with respect to security in those particular areas as of today.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, did I correctly understand the minister to say that the physical security measures with respect to parents and visitors as recommended by Mr. Justice Dubin were not put into effect until Saturday? If that is in fact what he said, can he explain why it took that length of time for those measures to be put into effect? Also, would the minister be prepared to present to the House some indication of the history of security measures as they have been implemented at the Hospital for Sick Children since March 1981?

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Minister, you may pick any one of those three.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, may I say only that the hospital, in consultation with experts in the field, is reviewing and has been reviewing for some time the appropriate security measures to take. The fact is that up until a few days ago they had not decided to go the route of having each and every parent and each and every visitor in the hospital or in 4A and 4B get his picture taken and be tagged as he walked through the hospital. That would be a dramatic change in the way this hospital and most hospitals in North America are run. It is partly a question of whether they are going to change the atmosphere and make the operation into one that apparently looks like an armed fortress.

A decision made in the interim on the identification of staff, that everyone who is walking around with a lab coat or a white coat of any nature in a hospital should be properly identified, has been in place for some time. The question came down to a situation of whether the one million parents and visitors who come to the hospital every year should go through the process of having their pictures taken and identification put on.

In the meantime, the hospital has adopted other security measures that they and most experts feel are adequate in the circumstances. They may want to reassess that at some stage; at the moment they and most experts in the field see no reason to reassess that decision. They are still looking at it.

In the meantime, with the circumstances of last weekend and in yet another attempt to reassure the public, they have decided for the time being to go to that particular system with regard to 4A and 4B. I think when one considers the circumstances of the hospital, the extraordinary expense all of that involves, and, more dramatically, what it would do to the whole nature of the hospital, and puts that against the extraordinary security measures they have taken in lieu of going that particular route, I think one would find that is an appropriate, reasonable and safe choice that the hospital has made.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, there is no one in this House who does not want to restore the reputation of that hospital; we even respect the minister's right to have a secret security system and not even share the details of it with the members of this House and members of the public. But clearly it is not working: that is the point. The point is that if this researcher, unnamed, can get in and meander about, walk about the way he did yesterday, I am told, then surely that should tell the minister it is not working.

What we are asking him for are assurances that it is working; and so far, with great respect, apart from the minister's pious speeches we have not had those assurances. I am asking him now for some results, not just more speeches.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The member said clearly he has not had that assurance, and he has. He has had that assurance from me, he has had it from the hospital and he has had it from Dubin and his people and from CDC and their people, who have said, "If you do certain things, that will be in place."

May I say, with respect, that it is a little unfortunate for the member to stand up and say he shares with everyone else the need to maintain confidence in the hospital and to have reasonable responses out there and then to go on and say in his very next sentence that clearly the security is not adequate. I wrote it down as he said it. "Clearly it is not working," he said.

The member cannot really stand there and say he wants to share and show some leadership and public responsibility in trying to maintain public confidence in the institution, and then stand up on the basis of a radio report and determine that he, as Leader of the Opposition, is prepared to say that clearly the security measures are not working.

Has the member called the hospital? Has he asked them to walk him through all the incidents that happened with regard to that particular reporter? Has he had or have his researchers had an interview with the administrator of the hospital to determine whether there is an explanation for what happened yesterday? Has he asked them whether they have backup steps in place so that they were aware of what happened? Has he done all that before he found it within his power to stand up in this House and announce to the public that the security measures are not working?

10:40 a.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The member has a sense of responsibility. I think he ought to discharge it.

Mr. Rae: The minister is obviously preparing for a long role in opposition with all those questions he has been asking. I wish him well.

[Later]

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to keep the House fully informed about any developments with regard to our continuing review to ensure safety at the Hospital for Sick Children. I am somewhat relieved to be able to report to the House that once again we have acquired the services of Dr. Hugh McDonald, who was one of the members of the Dubin inquiry, to come back and undertake what I call a "recertification" process at the Hospital for Sick Children, pursuant to the statement I made yesterday.

Dr. McDonald is the administrator of St. Paul's Hospital in Vancouver. As well as being an administrator, he is assistant clinical professor of the department of health care and epidemiology at the University of British Columbia. I anticipate and hope, having spoken with Dr. McDonald yesterday, that his analysis re certification and review might be as short as two or three weeks, presuming all goes well. Dr. McDonald expressed to me yesterday his total confidence in the Hospital for Sick Children and his desire to do anything necessary to help maintain confidence in that great institution.

EXTRA BILLING

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. It concerns extra billing.

I would like to ask him whether he stands by the remarks he made in this House on April 21 when he said, in referring to extra billing, "The benefit of it is that the better-off in society pay the freight." Later on in the exchange he said it is the rich in society who are extra-billed. Does the minister stand by those remarks?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, no doubt the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson) has more judgement than the leader of the third party. He would not ask that sort of question.

Mr. McClellan: That is because he supports extra billing.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, he does. What the leader of the third party is no doubt about to do is stand up and read me a name and ask me if I am aware of Mr., Mrs. or Ms So-and-so who was asked to pay X dollars last week by physician Y in such-and-such circumstances.

As happens on Johnny Carson some nights, let me give him the answer to that question before it is asked. The answer to that question is no, I am not aware of that particular case. When the member draws it to my attention, I will take that forward.

The whole principle is as I outlined it last week. To the extent that principle is being violated by one or two of the 14,000 physicians in this province, then I should like to be aware of that and so would the Ontario Medical Association, because it is prepared to take appropriate action in that circumstance. Now, open the envelope.

Mr. Rae: Given the fact that the minister did not answer the question I put to him, I would like to put to him as a supplementary question the statements he made with respect to the better-off in society paying the freight and the rich in society being the ones who are extra-billed and compare those with the fact that a retired Chrysler worker in Windsor by the name of Aurèle Drouillard was asked to pay—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How did I guess?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rae: This man has received bills. The minister can laugh at extra billing. It may be a laughing matter for him but it is not a laughing matter for Aurèle Drouillard, who has $690 a month. It is not a laughing matter for a person on $690 a month.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the member for York South please place his question?

Mr. Rae: I would simply like to ask the minister how he can put the kinds of fatuous remarks that he made a couple of days ago with respect to extra billing and the wealthy in society paying those extra bills, considering the fact that this gentleman has to pay $600, or 65 per cent above the Ontario health insurance plan, for two operations in the past nine months to two specialists, one an ophthalmologist and one an anaesthetist?

How can he possibly justify that kind of contradiction when he makes these fatuous remarks about the wealthy having to pay, when the evidence is overwhelming in this instance and in many other instances that it is ordinary people—in this case a retired Chrysler worker who is living on $694 net per month—who are paying the freight, and not the better-off as the minister would have us so fatuously believe?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I would not want to suggest that the member is engaging in hyperbole when he suggests that the evidence is overwhelming. What he has done is bring me one example of the 60 million services that are rendered each year through OHIP. Perhaps in the member's view that one circumstance out of more than 60 million is overwhelming evidence.

May I say that in terms of running a workable system—as I said when I spoke on this matter in the House last week and I said today, and the member's Health critic has heard me say it before—out of 60 million services, 14,000 doctors, 2,000 opted-out doctors, there are going to be some who occasionally are billing people they should not bill. The people who put that proposition know very well, or should know very well, that they ought to be calling the Ontario Medical Association through the number—

Mr. McClellan: Tell them to save their dime.

Mr. Rae: Save their money.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, of course. I may be convinced that the members opposite do need more researchers. Have the members taken a moment to call the OMA to ask how many calls it gets per month on that number? Have they? No, they have not called the OMA and asked, because they do not want the answer. The number is often used.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, does the minister not recall the commitment made by several of his predecessors that specialists would accept the Ontario health insurance plan rates in all public hospitals—at least they would guarantee that one or more specialists in each area would accept the OHIP rate? Has he abandoned that concept and can he not use that in his discussions with the OMA to ensure that the basic services are available in all public hospitals?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, Mr. Speaker, in point of fact that is what I was referring to here. Three or four years ago, after discussions with the government, the OMA put in place a toll-free number for all residents of Ontario who might call when they require or want the services of an opted-in doctor or an opted-out doctor on an opted-in basis in any public general hospital in the province. As a result, they are now getting—to save the members a phone call—200 to 300 calls per month from people who are taking them up on that service.

Mr. Nixon: The commitment was that the service would be available across the province.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They have just centralized the service so that the OMA gets the call and will then call back into that area and arrange for an opted-in doctor to undertake that activity, or in the absence of that, get an opted-out physician to provide the services at opted-in rates.

When one looks across the province one finds that fully one third of all opting out and extra billing is confined to three categories in Metropolitan Toronto. They comprise one third of all opted-out physicians. That would indicate that province-wide we do not have much of a problem and inside Metropolitan Toronto there is such a variety of alternatives that this should not present much of a barrier either. It should not present any barrier at all.

In any case, the shorter answer to the question is yes, the OMA offers that service; yes, it is used by approximately 3,000 people a year; yes, it seems to be working well; no, I am not satisfied that it is 100 per cent effective.

Mr. Rae: The minister is just amazingly out of touch with what the reality is for a great many people who have to go to specialists in this province. That reality is that, regardless of their means and regardless of their income, they are being presented with additional bills.

How can the minister talk about universal access when the evidence shows that for anaesthetists, for example, in Grey county 100 per cent opted out; in Middlesex county, where this example comes from, 98 per cent opted out; in Nipissing 100 per cent opted out, and in Toronto-East York 100 per cent opted out?

How can the minister say the problem is simply confined to one particular area of the province when the evidence is absolutely overwhelming that with respect to several specialists all across this province they are opted out and the practice of extra billing is one that is on the increase?

The kind of justification he has given in this House for extra billing, which bears no relationship to the facts, no relationship to what is really going on in the world of this province, is only encouraging the practice and encouraging the destruction of the universal health care system in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Might I say that the member has neglected to indicate—I do not have the figures with me, surprisingly, but I do not know how many anaesthetists there are in Grey county. How many are there? Two? Are there two?

Mr. Rae: Does it matter how many there are?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It does matter how many there are.

Mr. Speaker: Will the minister just answer the question please?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The fact is the member wants to say that 100 per cent of the anaesthetists in Grey county are opted out. I suspect there are one or two. I could be wrong. I would suggest in those circumstances the perception he wants to raise, that 100 per cent are opted out, would be perhaps more fairly presented by him if he said one or two or three anaesthetists in Grey county are all opted out, but I suspect that if I inquire—which I will do—we will discover they are very often providing their services on an opted-in basis.

The member wants to present the spectre, through glib statistics, that we have a system that is not accessible in Grey county. In point of fact, if he wanted to be fair and balanced to present the argument, which still leaves him lots of room to manoeuvre on this issue, he would do so in that context.

Yes, there may be 100 per cent opted out in Grey county but to suggest that means there are no opted-in services rendered in anaesthesia in Grey county is, with respect, an enormous distortion and the member knows it is. He should present the case fairly.

10:50 a.m.

NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES LTD.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the Attorney General on the question of Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., Conrad Black and Edward Battle with respect to the Ontario Securities Commission.

When the Attorney General reviews his association with this case from the ill-advised meeting he had in May 1982, as recorded in Hansard of December 15 with respect to the questions I raised at that time, when he takes into consideration the flurry of activity which then took place within his ministry, when he considers the efforts to have a joint investigation of the OSC and the Metropolitan Toronto Police fraud squad into this matter in an orderly way, when he asked his colleague at the last minute to allow officers from his ministry to meet with the commission in order to try to persuade the commission that there was an evidentiary case to be put and decided in the court, and finally when he culminated that by requesting publicly that the securities commission give reasons for its decision but would not join with that a request that the report of the investigation be made public, has he not now so completely compromised the police investigation into this matter that the matter should be brought to an end by him as the Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to that is no, but I am not going to leave it at that. Since the member has invited me to indulge in some history, I think it would be appropriate that we do so.

First of all, as the member recalls, the original meeting with Mr. Black and his lawyers was a result of an allegation that was made that some unnamed person within the Ministry of the Attorney General was interfering directly in a very major civil lawsuit that had reached a very critical stage in Cleveland, Ohio; namely, as we all know, the lawsuit with respect to the attempted takeover of Hanna by Norcen.

The allegation was not correct, but there were certain disturbing facts surrounding the allegation. The judge who was trying the case in Cleveland at this very critical stage of the proceedings took what I consider to be not only an unusual step but an initiative which would have been totally unacceptable in the Canadian context. He phoned a relatively junior lawyer in the Ministry of the Attorney General who, without my knowledge or indeed the knowledge of any other members of the ministry, had been advising the Metropolitan Toronto Police department.

So first of all, I have to concede that Mr. Black's solicitors might well be concerned with the fact that a judge, at a critical stage in a civil case, phoned a lawyer in another jurisdiction to make inquiries about a criminal investigation involving principals in this litigation when he was about to make findings of credibility with respect to the same principals. Obviously that is a situation which was without precedent and certainly one which would alarm any lawyers who were advising clients in these circumstances.

In my view, the meeting to deal with this issue was not ill-advised. It is true that had I or the Deputy Attorney General or the director of the criminal law division or the director of the crown law office, criminal, or the director of the crown attorneys or any of these individuals been aware there was a criminal investigation going on, the meeting would probably have taken a different format, but we would still have had to address that very serious issue of a judge in Cleveland talking to one of our lawyers about a criminal investigation just before he is going to have to make a very important decision. As history records, in the decision he made he had some rather unkind things to say about these very principals.

The ongoing police investigation was quite separate from any investigation that was being undertaken by the securities investigators. I think Mr. Dey's letter to the minister records the fact that there had been a complaint made to the commission about this which had something to do with the initiation of the investigation. I also believe that probably some of the Metropolitan Toronto Police advised the commission as well that this might be a matter that would be of interest to them.

The next flurry of activity involved decisions that were made by the director of the criminal law division, now the Deputy Solicitor General, Rod McLeod, whose integrity the member will fully appreciate is beyond reproach, and by Howard Morton as director of the crown law office, criminal. These two gentlemen are both well known to the member for Riverdale. I am sure he would be the first to agree their integrity is beyond question and above reproach.

They made the decision—it had nothing to do with me—that more senior counsel experienced in criminal law were necessary to deal with some of the admitted complexities of this case. It is unfortunate that some rather irresponsible innuendo, to put it mildly, has been bruited about because of the change in counsel. That decision was made, as the member knows, by two—

Mr. Ruston: Time.

Mr. Conway: Four minutes.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: I am sorry. I realize this question is—

Mr. Speaker: I realize the importance of it, but I think we must get on and ask the member to put a supplementary.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: In his question, the member for Riverdale has really touched on the whole history of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that, but it may be more properly dealt with through a statement if you wish.

Mr. Renwick: Is it not now true that the police role in the investigation of this matter—that is, the investigation by the Metropolitan Toronto Police fraud squad—is complete and that the matter is now in the hands of the Attorney General's ministry with respect to the questions of the advice to be given as to whether charges will or will not be laid under the Criminal Code?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The last information I had at the beginning of the week with respect to the state of the police investigation was that it had not been concluded.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, are there still bad relationships between the police, the Attorney General's staff and the securities commission, as evidenced in Mr. Dey's letter to the minister? What is he going to do as chief law officer of the crown to try to restore some relationships in this whole network that is charged with the administration of justice and preventing securities violations?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: First, Mr. Speaker, it is totally inaccurate to characterize the relationships between any of these bodies—my ministry, the police or the securities commission—as being bad.

Obviously the securities commission is concerned about the release of what it properly regards as a confidential report. As the chairman has pointed out, it would be very difficult for the commission members to conduct investigations credibly in the future unless they can give the industry assurance of the confidentiality that is so critical to their investigations. Obviously they are concerned about how the report got out. Apparently they have satisfied themselves it did not happen in their own offices.

Obviously we also were concerned about how that was leaked and I have been assured by the Deputy Attorney General that he believes it could not have happened in the Ministry of the Attorney General.

I am not surprised by Mr. Dey's concern about the leak of what has to be treated as a confidential document. Obviously he wonders whether somebody in our ministry or someone within the police department may have released this report. I cannot criticize him for expressing those concerns, but I can assure members of the Legislature the relationship continues to be one of a high level of mutual confidence.

Mr. Renwick: Will the Attorney General agree or undertake to review, over the weekend, the whole of the report of the investigation that was presented to the Ontario Securities Commission? And will he make a determination whether or not that report should, in the public interest, be released, bearing in mind there is nothing in that report that could possibly damage any person's reputation?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Certainly, even in advance, I would not agree to the release of that report prior to the conclusion of the criminal investigation and a decision made with respect to the possibility of charges under the Criminal Code.

HANDICAPPED EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour on the handicapped employment program.

On Wednesday I acted on the invitation, which the minister extended to me and members of the resources development committee during estimates, to drop in on the handicapped employment program offices and talk with Ms. Earle and her people. The minister was right when he speculated at that time it would be quite an experience, as indeed it was.

In my two-hour meeting with a group of very able and determined persons, working under conditions which I will generously describe as unacceptable, I found their quarters to be cramped and confined, and they were working with equipment which was both inadequate and inappropriate for their needs. It would not be overstating the case, as I am sure the minister is aware, to say in some respects the environment is hazardous to the health of some of the persons working there.

As well as lifting those physical constraints upon the handicapped employment program, it is imperative that the minister lift some of the financial constraints. A good start would be for the minister to assure us that the $70,000, which was originally earmarked for the HEP budget for innovative research and has since been removed from it and, as he knows, integrated with the overall research budget of the ministry, will be returned to that program.

Will he give us that assurance this morning? If not, why not?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, in answering that question I can perhaps set the record straight in respect to some of the remarks that were made by the member when he first raised the question.

At that time he indicated there was a 13 per cent drop in the budget of that particular department. That was inaccurate; it was a two per cent cut and that two per cent cut was less than the total restraints placed on our ministry. In other words, we did not just cut uniformly across the board within our ministry; consideration was given to the excellent work that was being done by that department.

Also, I think it should be borne in mind that the department came into operation in 1979-80 and the actual expenditures in a relatively short period of time have increased from $134,000 to $625,000. The number of staff has risen from three, that is two professionals and one administrative support, to eight—six professionals and two administrative support—in that particular length of time.

In other words, that program has been growing and has been properly funded and, as I said the other day, I am totally satisfied and gratified by the dedication of the people who operate that program and the progress they have made.

As far as the actual quarters are concerned, I think those are not dissimilar to quarters occupied by civil servants throughout this government. We would love to have additional space, but we have to put up with the space we have and make the best of it.

Mr. Wrye: I feel very sorry for the civil servants of this government if they have to put up with those kinds of cramped and inadequate quarters and with very few filing cabinets.

In spite of the comments of the minister about how much more money he has put into this program, surely, with 10 per cent of the population physically disabled, what he needs is real initiative and innovation. In keeping with his policy of restraint, let me suggest to him, along these lines, a new program at minimal expense which was discussed at our meeting.

Will the minister undertake to authorize the funding and staffing for an awareness program of the possibilities and needs of the handicapped employment program among the members who sit in this Legislative Assembly?

There are 125 offices in existence throughout this province which could serve as ideal resource centres for the dissemination of information for prospective employers and employees. I have with me the kinds of information, all printed, which could be sent to our offices. We could sit down with our constituency assistants and explain it to them. Will he provide the staffing and the funding so that this program could get into the community and provide the information to our offices so we may bring it to our communities?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I should also point out to the honourable member that in addition to the staff persons I just referred to, there is an extra professional staff person who has been seconded from elsewhere in our ministry of late in order to give additional support to the program.

In addition—and I am not actually sure of the number I am going to give, so I reserve the right to change it if it is inaccurate—this summer there will be 39 Experience '83 students working across the province on the handicapped program. This will be the largest number we have ever had on the handicapped program in summer employment. This is another indication of the importance we place on it.

I cannot disagree with anything the member says with respect to the need for attention, resources and action for the handicapped. I will match my record in the community over the years with the member's any time as far as involvement with handicapped people is concerned. I feel very strongly about that. I do not want to put down the member because he is honourable, he is decent and his concerns are genuine. I am sure the concerns he is expressing are shared by everyone in this Legislature, not only the member for Windsor-Sandwich.

He did make an express recommendation or suggestion to me. What I would like to do before I address his recommendation is receive the report I am anxiously awaiting from Jean Pigott, who has spent the past couple of years in what I think is going to be an excellent and enlightening report on the role of the handicapped.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same minister, the Minister of Labour—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if, with the indulgence of the House, I might indicate—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I note that we have eight minutes and 45 seconds left.

Mr. Speaker: New question please.

[Later]

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: Earlier today the member for Windsor-Sandwich raised the matter of the accommodation of the handicapped branch in the Ministry of Labour at 400 University Avenue. In the excitement of the debate I neglected to tell the honourable member and the rest of the Legislature that those employees in the area he described are being moved to new and certainly more comfortable and more spacious quarters within the next couple of weeks, and that has been planned for some time.

PROTECTION OF NURSING ASSISTANTS

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is aware of Thompson House, run by the Don Mills Foundation for Senior Citizens, which had 12 full-time nursing aids and 23 part-time nursing aids who are with the Service Employees' International Union Local 204. Having worked themselves up over the last few years from minimum wage before they were unionized to $7.03 an hour, they learned on April 1 that Thompson House was going to contract out to Medox health services, a division of Drake Professional Services, which would re-employ these people at $4.75 an hour, an amazing drop in pay. They were all advised to apply and try to get work there and basically lose all the things they had worked for over the last number of years.

Why is there no protection under the law in Ontario for those people who have worked so hard to gain the kinds of benefits they have? Will the minister bring in legislation to make sure this does not happen to other registered nursing assistants in Ontario?

11:10 a.m.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect, every question that is asked by the third party winds up with the question, "When are you going to bring in legislation?" My God, if we brought in all the legislation we were asked for, we would be sitting 365 days of the year, 24 hours every day.

Mr. Renwick: Not a bad idea.

Mr. Ruston: Hire another 100,000 civil servants.

Mr. Rae: Part-time Russ.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Imagine having to work 12 months a year, Russ. That would be terrible.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Scarborough West has the floor.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I would like to make the argument to the minister that there is a pressing need for legislation here and ask him to consider that 30 days after this decision has been made and the contracting out has taken place, the following has happened to workers who have been there for many years:

Jennis Thomas, who has worked there for 14 years, has not been called back once, although she registered with Medox; Celine Clarke, who worked there for seven to eight years, has come back for two nights of part-time work; Sally Packeri has been called for six days in total after having been there for 14 years; Cordelia Simpson, after 10 years, no time; Patricia Watson, 14 years with no time; Yvonne Johnson, nine years and has not been called back. These people have basically had all of their rights taken away, including their jobs. They were told they could come back at sort of half pay, $4.75 an hour.

Will the minister not investigate what is going on here? Will he not pressure this firm to hire these people back? There are a number of these women here today, and I would like the minister to assure us that he will meet with them to talk about their situation and the incredible jeopardy that RNAs in Ontario feel they are in because these international hiring agencies become the only way to get employed, and at rates that are basically just above minimum wage.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, you are probably going to cut me off for not responding directly to the question, but the leader of the third party made a comment that I simply will not accept about being "part-time Russ." I will match my hours on this job against his at any time.

Mr. Mackenzie: Oh, come off it. That is not the issue and you know it.

Mr. Speaker: Now to the question, please.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: In response to the honourable member's question, which is a reasonable one, certainly I will investigate; certainly I will meet with the people. May I suggest 10:30 on Monday morning in my office?

Mr. Mackenzie: Look at the cleaners over in the centre, the same thing.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Take a look at everything you have ever asked me, you have got it.

Mr. Mackenzie: Every week we bring a case to you and nothing happens.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie) will please restrain himself.

Mr. Conway: There is going to be overtime.

Mr. Speaker: Not very likely. The clocks are still running. The member for Victoria-Haliburton.

MINAKI LODGE

Mr. Eakins: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Treasurer. Even though the government has not issued a press release today, I am sure I would be remiss to let this Friday morning pass without mentioning the opening, finally, of what was described by the former minister of tourism as the jewel of the north.

I am referring to none other than our own Minaki Lodge. I say "our own" Minaki Lodge because, whether we like it or not, $45 million of scarce taxpayer dollars have been put into this.

We are told that the room rates charged at Minaki Lodge will be $85 per night without meals, or $135 with meals. What this means is that its availability is restricted to fairly wealthy individuals. There may be some justification for a taxpayers' subsidy on a type of family establishment such as Ontario Place that provides recreation and entertainment for families and for some who may not otherwise be able to afford it, but to put $45.1 million of taxpayers' dollars into a lodge that can only be enjoyed by the rich is equivalent to providing a public subsidy for the well-off.

Mr. Speaker: I assume you have a question.

Mr. Eakins: Given that this government will never recover the investment in Minaki, how does the minister justify such expenditure to the people of this province?

Hon. F. S. Miller: I would think my honourable friend, coming from a tourist area, would not throw too many stones. Either that, or his eyes are a bit green. If he checked the daily rates in any downtown Toronto hotel without meals, they are more than $85 a day. He knows that. Those rooms are not just for the rich.

What people are visiting the lodges in Haliburton? Has he ever asked for any government assistance for a lodge in Haliburton? Are there any subsidies for the lodges in Haliburton? Of course there are, and they provide jobs for Ontario people right across the north.

Mr. Eakins: I remind the Treasurer that the resorts in Haliburton are run by private enterprise. We have no quarrel with the geographical location, but, given that the final results for 1982 will probably show the most negligible increase in this province's tourism revenues since records have been kept on this, given that this trend in our revenues has been due largely to the decrease in visitors from the United States, with preliminary figures showing some 23 per cent fewer visitors than in the previous year, and given that the main clientele at Minaki is expected to be just such visitors, in particular from the midwest United States, how can he realistically expect to see Minaki Lodge operate at a profit at some point in the near future, if ever?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Minaki may or may not make a profit, based upon the investment. There are many things that are done in remoter parts of the province that are not totally justified based on investment, but are justified upon the spinoffs that occur through the area.

The member is very learned in the resort business. It happens that the many small operations all around this province basically need attractions and/or lead hotels. That is a lead hotel. It is a world-class hotel and it will bring people into the northwest who have never known about the northwest. They will discover the smaller, family-style lodges, and they will return. We will also find benefit for the native peoples up in that area through the sport fisheries, through the jobs, through the training that is going on now that will very fully justify that basic infrastructure investment.

PETITION

RETAIL SALES TAX

Mr. Riddell: Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition that was organized by a grade 7 class at Robertson Memorial School in Goderich, consisting of students who wanted to exercise their democratic rights, having discussed the democratic system in the classroom. The petition contains 317 signatures and reads as follows:

"We the undersigned feel that the sales tax on candy is too costly. We feel it should be charged per 75 cents."

Naturally, I support the petition as I have always said it was a sad day when this government chose to use the children of this province to pay for its past mistakes.

11:20 a.m.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

SOLICITORS AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Norton, first reading of Bill 25, An Act to amend the Solicitors Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitors Amendment Act, 1983, is a bill which will permit lawyers to charge the taxing officers to award interest on overdue legal bills at a more realistic rate than the five per cent rate which has been prescribed in the Solicitors Act since 1909. The bill prescribes an interest rate on overdue legal accounts which cannot exceed the prime rate. This is consistent with the rate of interest which is currently awarded under the Judicature Act for other judgements. It is also consistent with the recent divisional court decision that solicitors are entitled to the prime rate of interest from the date of judgement.

In addition, the bill provides that, for the first time, a lawyer's client will have a corresponding right to interest where upon a review of the lawyer's account it is determined that the client has overpaid his lawyer. Now it is going to be hard to vote against that.

[Later]

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you did not see me, but before the orders of the day, I had two private member's bills to introduce. May I introduce them at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Do we have unanimous consent to revert to bills?

Agreed to.

CONDOMINIUM AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Philip moved, seconded by Mr. Cassidy, first reading of Bill 26, An Act to amend the Condominium Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, I know the Liberals always get upset when I introduce property bills. Property usually involves fences and they can never decide which fence they are sitting on.

This bill would repeal unproclaimed provisions of the Condominium Act that relate to the condominium bureau and instead provide for a registrar of condominiums who would give advisory services to the public, maintain a register of mailing addresses of condominiums and issue licences to condominium managers.

Condominium management would be restricted to licencees except in the case of managers of single condominiums having more than 100 units, and the Lieutenant Governor in Council would be empowered to make regulations requiring the posting of bonds.

The Association of Condominium Managers of Ontario may, with the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, set standards for the managers.

The bill also provides consensual procedure for the review and resolution of disputes within a condominium.

CONDOMINIUM AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Philip moved, seconded by Mr. Cassidy, first reading of Bill 27, An Act to amend the Condominium Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, the bill would authorize condominium corporations to make bylaws providing for the collection of special levies from owners of residential units that are occupied by tenants.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Renwick: Before the orders of the day, I would like to draw to the attention of the government House leader, who I hope was here, standing order 26(c) dealing with statements by the ministry. It says, "After any policy statement the minister shall table a compendium of background information."

On Thursday, April 21, the Premier (Mr. Davis) stated that he was pleased to advise the House that the government of the province will introduce in the near future a resolution to authorize from Ontario's standpoint, an amendment of the Canadian Constitution regarding property rights. I would assume that is a policy statement, and I would ask the government to table or provide us with a compendium of background information, either now or at the time the resolution is actually introduced into the assembly.

MOTION TO SET ASIDE ORDINARY BUSINESS

Mr. Renwick moved, seconded by Mr. Stokes, that pursuant to standing order 34(a), the ordinary business of the House be set aside to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the role of the Attorney General and the Ontario Securities Commission in the investigation of alleged breaches of the Securities Act and the Criminal Code by Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., Conrad M. Black and Edward G. Battle in relation to trading in securities.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise all honourable members that the motion under standing order 34(a) to set aside the ordinary business of the House has been received in order and in time. I ask the honourable member to explain why he thinks the ordinary business of the House should be set aside to hear this.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, briefly, with respect to the question of the urgency of this matter, I am not going to speak on the question of its public importance. It is obviously a matter of serious public concern, but the question of urgency is the matter that will justify this motion being accepted for the debate to proceed.

I need not say that in any comments I make I am not making any reflection on the personal integrity of any of the people who may have been involved in any of the matters that are brought before the assembly.

My first point on the question of urgency is that I have brought this motion at the earliest possible opportunity following the decision of the commission not to prosecute under section 118 of the Securities Act. It could not have been brought in on an earlier occasion because an opportunity had to be given to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Elgie), to the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) and to the Ontario Securities Commission to respond to the serious concerns raised by the decision of the commission to close its file on April 13.

The commission's jurisdiction in this matter is now entirely at an end. It is urgently necessary because the integrity of the procedures, and I emphasize the integrity of the procedures, of the commission is in question. The commission has failed completely to abide by the code of due process and fair proceeding laid down in section 11 of the Securities Act.

This section is a mandate by this assembly to that commission of the way in which investigations are to be conducted with respect to the procedures to be followed when considering the laying of charges under the Securities Act or, indeed, under the Criminal Code. That procedure was not followed in carrying out this most serious investigation and decision, and must be debated immediately; otherwise, the commission and its reputation will continue to suffer.

It is significantly urgent that the matter be now debated, because in portions of the decision of the commission that were placed before the assembly yesterday by the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, there was no reflection in the decision of the commission of whether it accepted the evidence that was before it.

The commission members went off on an esoteric discussion of the questions of material fact and material change, which are of course germane to the question, but they did not reflect in their decision whether they accepted the documentary and other evidence that was in front of them or whether they accepted the denials of that documentary evidence that took place in some of the statements that were before the commission. In my view, these are matters of great concern.

My last point is that in the real world, not in the world in which these matters now are being discussed, for practical purposes the matter is at an end. The earliest opportunity must be taken to debate it here in this assembly. When I say the matter is at an end, I am referring not only to the fact that the commission is finished but also to the fact that for all practical purposes the police investigation has come to an end and the decision of the Attorney General has been reached, and it is urgent that these matters now be considered.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion of my friend the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick). As he has pursued this matter from the beginning, he has demonstrated nothing but judgement and fairness all along.

This whole matter has raised a number of very serious questions that at this point have not been resolved in anyone's mind. It has to be put in the context of the whole question of the administration of justice, the whole method the Attorney General uses in a sense of almost holding people hostage, be it Susan Nelles, be it Mr. Proverbs, be it some of what I consider the indiscreet behaviour of him and his ministry, and the political nature of the whole Attorney General's operation here.

I accept the suggestion from the member for Riverdale, although I did not know it myself, that the police investigation is to all intents and purposes finished and is only requiring a judgement from the crown attorneys and/or the Attorney General ultimately. We face the spectre that these charges are still going on, the investigation is still going on, and we are playing very fast and loose with a number of people's reputations and with the economic interests of very many people.

I do not know how anyone in this situation—and for the purpose of my argument I equate Neil Proverbs and Conrad Black as being in identical positions—can fight back against an Attorney General who is so cavalier in the way he handles some of these matters. It is not just one piece of evidence; there are a number of pieces of evidence to support the concerns I have felt about this whole matter.

In England, I understand, the Attorney General does not even sit in the cabinet. That is one position that is supposed to be above politics. Yet there are so many suggestions here of political influences at various different times along the way and so much confusion in this matter with respect to his position and the position of the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, who has ultimate authority in this matter.

I do not think anyone should accept the suggestion for a minute that the opposition has ever attacked the integrity of the securities commissioners. That has never been the issue; and even though the minister would wrap himself in that cloak or in some sacred principle about not letting the reports go public, those are not the issues.

I refer the minister to section 15 of his own act, which says, "Where an investigation has been made under section 11, the commission may, and, where an investigation has been made under section 13, the person making the investigation shall report the result thereof, including the evidence, findings, comments and recommendations, to the minister, and the minister may cause the report to be published in whole or in part in such manner as he considers proper."

The minister has statutory authority to make that report public. He has chosen to make some parts of it public. It is no secret. He has seen it, we have seen it and a lot of other people have seen it. Again, with the selective release of certain bits of information, I suggest both ministers are complicitous in tainting the reputation of the administration of justice. The minister would not believe the number of calls I get on these issues asking why one group in society is treated differently from another group, and I cannot explain it.

I think there are a number of unanswered questions here. The Attorney General said in the House today that there is an evidentiary base, whatever that means—grounds to lay charges, presumably. He has not been able to persuade his colleague that there are grounds for charges to be laid. There is still the outstanding question of the role of Mr. Johnston, who was summarily dismissed some time ago as the crown attorney leading the investigation into this matter.

I think it is time now, on the basis of this, to have a wholly new look. We could start shedding some light on the question by having a debate today, and I would hope it would result in a probe of this whole matter as well as a new look at the securities legislation in the future, including a look at the conflict of interest rules.

It is very difficult in this situation, when we have commissioners, not to have conflicts of interest; I recognize that, and I am aware of some of the jurisprudence on the issue. But I think that as of this point it has not been fully aired to anyone's satisfaction. The minister has the authority to let that report go; I think it is reasonable in the circumstances. Let us commence that discussion today by a thorough airing, as suggested by my colleague the member for Riverdale.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, it was certainly our view until a few moments ago that the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations would represent the government in a brief submission, but in view of the unfortunate aspersions that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson) insists on hurling at a lot of people who are associated with the administration of justice in this province, I feel compelled to respond at least in brief.

We on the government side oppose the emergency debate at this time. We do not believe there is an emergency. This matter has been debated for some months and will continue to be debated, and in view of the fact that there is an ongoing criminal investigation, it certainly would not be in anybody's interest.

I think the commission, in coming forward with a very lengthy letter from its distinguished chairman, has made every reasonable effort to explain its decision in the very unusual circumstances surrounding all the history of this unhappy affair.

But I want to say to the Leader of the Opposition that he has the colossal gall to talk about being free and easy with people's reputations, yet almost on a day-to-day basis he makes snide comments and cheap innuendoes about a lot of very distinguished people who serve with me in the Ministry of the Attorney General. I really think he should be ashamed of his conduct in this Legislature.

A lot of people who used to have some regard for him, who have known him over the years, are a little concerned about the cheap shots he feels compelled to make on a day-to-day basis because of his sense of what the role of the Leader of the Opposition should be. He seems to think innuendo that attacks directly the integrity of a number of people is part of his role as Leader of the Opposition. He is behaving in a very shameful fashion, and he should be bloody well ashamed of himself.

The very difficult decisions that are made in the Ministry of the Attorney General with respect to the administration of justice are decisions that not only are shared but, in virtually every case, also are concurred in by all the senior members of the ministry.

11:40 a.m.

Obviously this is not the first time, because I am aware of the cheap shots that come from the member's office on a day-to-day basis. He wants to reduce every public issue to a trivial matter of petty political partisanship. In doing so, it is one thing to criticize the individual Attorney General; we are in a political arena and we do have some understanding of the process. But I want to say on this occasion that his remarks go far beyond criticizing me personally. On a day-to-day basis, he is attacking the integrity of a lot of people, many of whom he knows well and knows are totally committed to—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: Is it my understanding that this debate is one that ranges over any subject the Attorney General may be interested in?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Who introduced Neil Proverbs?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I am just saying there is a clear motion before the House and I would ask you to use your prerogative to insist that the Attorney General stick to that subject and no other.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Who was it who started talking about Neil Proverbs and Susan Nelles?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nixon: You are out of order. Why are we listening to this drivel? It is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: We know what happened to you.

Mr. Nixon: It will happen to everybody sooner or later, and your turn is coming up.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps we could just let our emotions subside and address the issue at hand, the motion which the member for Riverdale has put forward.

Mr. Nixon: Do you want the debate or not?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Who was it who started to introduce these other issues into the debate?

Mr. Speaker: With all respect, I do not think that is at all important.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The former and present leaders should know what has happened to the Liberal Party by insisting on sort of getting into the gutter on these issues instead of just—

Mr. McClellan: Now that we have passed the "Yah, yah" stage—

Mr. Cooke: Throw him out.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the Attorney General please address the motion?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: The member knows exactly where he is at and where he has been for some years. The fact of the matter is that the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations and ourselves—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I ask you to insist that the Attorney General withdraw his remarks, which are completely unacceptable in this chamber or elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker: Please—

Mr. Nixon: He said we are in the gutter and he knows we know where we are at.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear him say that.

Mr. Nixon: Why should he be allowed to talk that way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the honourable member—

Mr. Nixon: He is a disgrace to the democratic process and to the responsibility of law and order.

Hon. Mr. Wells: You people are pitiful.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Attorney General address the motion, please?

Mr. Sargent: Tell us why you are protecting Conrad Black.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: This is an example of what I am talking about, the level at which these people want to debate these important public issues. The Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations and I will continue to address these difficult issues in the public interest. Certainly it is quite clear from the attitude we have heard in the past few moments that an emergency debate at this time would serve no useful purpose.

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: I understand the passions this debate involves. I was quickly perusing Beauchesne, and of course he sets out over four or five pages many of the words and phrases that constitute unparliamentary language.

I ask the chair to reflect upon some of what we have heard here. I personally believe such phrases as "in the gutter" and "innuendo" are by any reading of Beauchesne or anything else clearly unparliamentary, and I ask the chair at least to reflect upon that and perhaps give us some direction.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you for drawing that to my attention. However, with all respect, I did not hear the use of the phrase "in the gutter."

Mr. Kerrio: Out of the side of his mouth.

An hon. member: Perhaps you will check into it.

Mr. Speaker: I will indeed. Thank you.

Mr. Sargent: If you have enough money, you don't go to jail.

Mr. Kolyn: You're still out.

Mr. Sargent: At least I am paying my fine and I am doing my chore and I am not driving my car. As far as I am concerned, you guys don't have the guts to put Conrad Black in jail.

Mr. Speaker: Would the member for Grey-Bruce please resume his seat?

Mr. Sargent: They make me sick over there.

Mr. Speaker: This surely must be Friday.

An hon. member: It's the clock.

Mr. Speaker: Indeed it is, and that may be a persuasive argument to follow the recommendation of the member for Sudbury (Mr. Gordon).

Quite obviously I have listened with great interest to the submission put forward by the member for Riverdale and to why other members think there should be and should not be a debate proceeded with under standing order 34(a). It is an important issue and one that obviously has raised a lot of public concern and public interest.

Somewhat reluctantly, I must say that in my opinion the matter does not properly fall within the limits of standing order 34 and I therefore rule that the debate will not proceed.

Mr. McClellan: Are you going to explain, Mr. Speaker, why it does not fall within the purview of the standing order?

Mr. Speaker: It is an interpretation and it falls within standing order 34(c)(i): "The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration."

In my opinion, this matter does not constitute an emergency in as much as it has been before the public for many months. It has been raised in this House on numerous occasions. It has been a matter of great discussion in all the media for a very prolonged period. That is what I base my opinion on and I stand by that opinion.

Mr. Sargent: You should read the paper some time.

Mr. Speaker: I do.

Mr. McClellan: Very reluctantly, sir, I have to challenge your ruling.

12:15 p.m.

The House divided on the Speaker's ruling, which was sustained on the following vote:

Ayes

Andrewes, Barlow, Birch, Cousens, Cureatz, Davis, Dean, Drea, Elgie, Fish, Gillies, Gregory, Grossman, Kennedy, Kolyn, Lane, Leluk, MacQuarrie, McCaffrey, McCague, McLean, McNeil, Miller, F. S., Mitchell, Norton, Pollock, Ramsay, Robinson, Rotenberg, Scrivener, Sheppard, Sterling, Stevenson, Timbrell, Treleaven, Villeneuve, Walker, Watson, Wells, Williams, Wiseman.

Nays

Allen, Bradley, Breithaupt, Bryden, Cassidy, Charlton, Conway, Cooke, Cunningham, Di Santo, Eakins, Elston, Grande, Haggerty, Johnston, R. F., Kerrio, Mackenzie, McClellan, McGuigan, Miller, G. I., Newman, Nixon, Peterson, Philip, Rae, Renwick, Ruprecht, Ruston, Sargent, Stokes, Worton, Wrye.

Ayes 41; nays 32.

MEMBER'S WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the regular business of the House and before all the members vacate, I think we should all note the fact that the member for Essex North (Mr. Ruston) and his wife are celebrating their 40th wedding anniversary on Sunday, May 1, and they would be very happy to receive you between the hours of two and five or six and eight. Have a great weekend.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, on that subject, I think Hansard should also note that they are still both very happy.

Mr. Speaker: The half that is here looks extremely happy.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. G. I. Miller: Mr. Speaker, it was nice to recognize my colleague the member for Essex North (Mr. Ruston) on his 40th wedding anniversary. Forty years is a long while, and it does add a little colour to the Legislature. After some of these difficult debates we have, it is nice to have something on the lighter side.

As I was winding up last evening I was trying to make some points about agriculture and the dire straits we find many of our farmers in, and some points also on behalf of small business, pointing out the fact that 3,427 firms filed for bankruptcy in 1982. I was trying to encourage this government through the throne speech debate to bring out some programs they had promised for the last two years, particularly for agriculture and small business, to give some assistance to those industries, which are so important in our province.

Another point I would like to make concerns the unemployment among our young people. There are 233,000 of them from 15 to 24 years old, and our area is no exception. Last year many of our young people who often get summer jobs were not able to do so because of the early frost and the cutback in the work that was available.

I would just like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that the provincial funding for the youth employment program has fallen from $58.80 per unemployed youth in 1980-81 to $45.28 in 1982-83, a 23 per cent decrease even discounting inflation. The Experience '83 programs have been announced and those programs are being cut back again this year.

At a time when unemployment is running higher, that is an area this government can take a look at. It was one of our issues when the restraint program was brought in last September through Bill 179, that this money should be set aside and utilized to get the young people and our economy going. We estimated at the time that some $400 million to $800 million could be saved through the restraint bill; if the money were used to provide incentives to hire young people or by subsidizing them, as the government is doing at the present time, it certainly would get our young people taking part in the overall work programs of our province.

Another issue that was brought out in the 1982 throne speech was that they were going to encourage and develop our port facilities in the province, but I have not seen very much evidence of that to this point. Again localizing and looking at our own particular area, we have Dunnville, which is situated on the Grand River with a natural deep-water port to provide a good seaway facility. I notice that in Toronto they are redeveloping the waterfront and removing those elevators. It seems to me it would only be a good stimulation to develop a port along Lake Erie that is capable of taking deep-sea boats.

We do have a strong agricultural base, and it could be stronger if the province were to take some leadership in developing the land at South Cayuga and Haldimand and in encouraging farm production in that area. It certainly has not reached its potential. Again, it would stimulate that part of Ontario and utilize our waterways.

With respect to the development of the Nanticoke industrial area, there is pressure being applied to Port Dover now to provide more port facilities at Nanticoke. It is probably one of the largest and it handles the most tonnage of perhaps any port on the Great Lakes with the exception of Thunder Bay and the Lakehead. Now that Stelco is utilizing its steel plant, Texaco is exporting oil from the Nanticoke generating station and the Hydro plant itself is importing many millions of tons of coal every year it is becoming a very busy port.

Last year's throne speech promised that there would be future development and these are areas we certainly could take a look at, along with developing some minor recreation ports like Turkey Point, Sandusk and Nanticoke Creek, because there is room for development there. I would certainly encourage this government to take a look at those projects to see if we cannot improve those facilities.

The last two areas of concern are to ask this government, when we are talking about small business and trying to get our economy moving again, whether it would take a specific look at our small towns. Again using some examples like Jarvis, Dunnville, Caledonia and Simcoe, we have a lot of vacant plants. There is one in Dunnville that was working for Essex International of Canada Ltd. three or four years ago making car lighting harnesses. It went out of business. That plant has been sitting there for the last three or four years now, and it is a good facility. The Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker) should be looking at that to develop some use for it.

We had a canning plant in Waterford. Granted, it was an old pickle plant that had been owned by Canadian Cannery Ltd., which closed down last year. But perhaps it could be upgraded by the so-called Board of Industrial Leadership and Development program, which has been useful to my area and many areas of Ontario. We are the heartland of the pickle and cucumber industry. Now with no facilities there the produce is going to have to be trucked to other locations and it is going to put a damper on the expansion of that program, although we have all the tools to produce and grow in that direction.

In this year's throne speech there was an indication that the government was going to promote and encourage development in regard to the foreign auto industry. If they want to produce, 85 per cent of those cars should be produced in Canada. We have an excellent location at the Townsend industrial park to handle those facilities in that area. We also have the potential to provide the housing.

That gets back to the fact that this government has spent and invested great sums of money in Townsend, including the water system that is capable of not only servicing that area but has within its scope to service Kitchener and the heartland of the Grand River. At a time when we are looking for work programs, it makes good sense to me that the water line be extended along the Grand River to Caledonia, Brantford and Kitchener, providing a good source of excellent water. In return, it would provide more runoff water to make better quality water in the Grand River itself.

What is the member looking at over there?

Mr. Treleven: Just the quality of your water.

Mr. G. I. Miller: It is Lake Ontario water. This is after it comes down and is diluted at the Niagara River and Toronto gets the results.

I spoke about the industrial area and the potential we have to develop housing in that part of Ontario.

One other area I would like to bring to the attention of the government is the fact that we do have Townsend. Going back to its history, John White indicated we were going to have a growth of nearly one million people and there was a need for those town sites, South Cayuga and Townsend. This has not really come about. The population of the region has changed by only a couple of thousand people since the inception of regional government in 1973.

We have always tried to be reasonable and promote our own municipalities, indicating to the government we should let the existing towns develop and then, when the pressure comes on, bring in the new town sites. The government, in its wisdom, did not pay attention to our criticism and our views. It moved ahead with Townsend.

There are about 100 homes there now. They have fixed it up to be a beautiful location, but it has been very expensive and it has been at the expense of communities like Jarvis, where we have now had a subdivision for six to seven years. The hydro services are there, the lots are there, the streets are paved and they are not being utilized.

If one moves into Port Dover the same thing happens, only with 250 lots and they are selling slowly. Simcoe is another example where there are hundreds of lots and potential to grow; they are just sitting there, but they are not moving.

In Townsend itself, it is only because of extreme sales pressure by the Ontario Land Corp. and the fact it has access to considerably more funds than the private developer has that they are able to promote those homes. They are certainly good homes, providing homes for our young people. I am not opposed to that but I think the same thing should apply to the private developer to get the other lots, which are serviced and ready to go, on to the market.

The program brought about in 1982 was successful. I think Caledonia was a good example. We were able to take advantage of that program and have perhaps developed more homes in the municipality than any other area. I think we have to bring in another program that will keep the home program viable, because the spinoff effect is tremendous. I guess the bottom line is it has to be at a price we can afford.

There is one other area which was mentioned in the throne speech, and that was that insurance benefits, workers' benefits were going to be reviewed. It is about time a close look is taken at the retirement funds so that they are portable. This has been a project of my leader.

It has come to my attention only within the last few days that one of my constituents who had worked at a firm within my area died after 27 years at the plant. His widow is going to receive a pension of $198.77. She is getting a portion of the Canada pension. Her total take is $406. If he had lived to age 65, he would have received $1,097 a month.

She is not capable of going out to work. She has raised her family. When the breadwinner is not there, how we can expect her to keep her home, live in it and keep it up on a pension of about $4,000 a year? It is almost impossible.

The husband had earned that pension but, just because of the unfortunate timing of his death, the family is not able to take advantage of that. It is an area we have to zero in on. I want to bring it to the attention of the government and hope that something can be done in the near future about that problem.

I will conclude my comments. These are the areas of my concerns. I know we are in very difficult financial times. Unemployment is running high. Our caucus and I want to support any program that will get the economy going and give our young people a share of the action that is so important to the future of Ontario and Canada.

Mr. MacQuarrie: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate. I would like to point out that on the same day as the Lieutenant Governor was delivering the speech from the throne a rather unique trade fair was taking place in Chicago. This fair was called Robots 7 and involved 200 companies with a total sales force of some 30,000 people. These companies had but one objective, which was to sell the articulated arms and the infrared recognition systems that will be standard equipment in the factories of tomorrow.

They were selling more than technologies. They were selling ideas and they were selling the future. It is that future and Ontario's place in it, as suggested by the throne speech, that I want to talk about today. I want to talk about it because it is not only of interest to the people of Ontario but it is of particular interest to me, the people of Carleton East and others in the Ottawa area, who see and hear of parts of that future evolving around them every day at places like the National Research Council and other government laboratories, the universities and laboratories of the high-technology firms in the Ottawa Valley.

Before I talk about that future, it is a privilege for me to represent the great riding of Carleton East and the fine people who reside in it. The riding, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is the largest riding in eastern Ontario and the fourth largest in the province in population.

Within its limits it contains the national aeronautic establishment of the National Research Council, which possesses some of the most sophisticated wind tunnel equipment and facilities in the world. It also possesses the Montreal Road campus of the National Research Council, which is engaged in research and development across the whole spectrum of scientific and technical knowledge. In addition, it possesses the laboratories of the geomagnetic section of the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the land engineering and test establishment of the Department of National Defence. Consequently, we are interested in high technology.

I would like to talk about the future, because it is the one thing which, to an extent, we can direct. In a world of exploding change, there is no question that we must be prepared to change and to change rapidly in order to maintain our future in as prosperous and rewarding a state as our past. I want to do what I can to ensure that this government's progressive policies and programs will help to shape a better future for Ontario. The technology of production is shifting to hard and soft automated systems. The shift is taking place at the moment and will continue at an even faster rate in the future.

The sad fact is that many of our industries are technological dinosaurs. Many of them are now involved in playing catch-up with their international competitors. At risk is the viability of our traditional industrial base and the jobs that depend on it. The automobile industry, so important to the economy of our province, is one of these industries. Currently, there are 25,000 robots at work in Japanese industry, and in the United States there are approximately 5,000 to 10,000 industrial robots, including 2,400 in the auto plants.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: What about the legislative robots?

Mr. MacQuarrie: Most of the robots I see are across the way.

The American auto makers plan to increase the size of their robot work force to between 15,000 and 25,000 by the end of the decade. That is according to an article in Business Week on March 28. It costs between $15 and $18 an hour to maintain the average auto worker. A six-axis, servo-controlled, computer-driven robot amortized over eight years costs between $4 and $5 an hour. More significant, the cost of operating robots will probably decline to the $1-to-$2 range by 1990.

Mr. McClellan: What kind of car does a robot drive?

Mr. R. F. Johnston: We need rules to make sure robots don't drive Japanese cars.

Mr. MacQuarrie: Judging from the remarks from across the way, I think the cost will go to even less.

In Canada, we have a grand total of 200 industrial robots. Of this total, 115 are at work for the Big Three auto makers, who are now attempting to modernize their production facilities and to increase the number of robots in their systems to approximately 450 by 1985. This in itself will not be enough to guarantee the long-term viability of the industry unless we supplement it in the short term by other measures.

This government's proposals in the speech from the throne with respect to quota and Canadian-content regulations should be adopted and put into effect by the federal government to give our domestic industry—

Mr. McClellan: You should give this speech in Oshawa.

Mr. MacQuarrie: Surely in Oshawa, they are realists; or are they?

Mr. Kolyn: We will find out in five years whether we have any.

Mr. Grande: Keep on reading, you will do well.

Mr. Nixon: I wish you guys would leave him alone.

Mr. McClellan: I wonder if they have robots that read speeches.

Mr. MacQuarrie: I have one other speed—slower.

It is essential that the regulations with respect to quota and Canadian content be adopted and put into effect by the federal government to give our domestic industry a chance to re-establish itself and put itself in a position to compete effectively in any market.

Firm trends suggest that in the future the most efficient and productive industries will be built around soft automated systems. These systems combine basic robots, specialized computers, numerically-controlled machines, all in a super-flexible manufacturing system.

It is interesting to note that the National Research Council is in the process of establishing a flexible manufacturing cell in its mechanical engineering division. It is also interesting to note that today, I understand, a group from our Ontario Centre for Robotics and from our Ontario Centre for Computer-Aided Design and Computer-Aided Manufacturing are visiting the National Research Council.

These new systems will set the world's standard in efficiency, product quality and cost. It is against these standards and these industries that we in Ontario must compete.

This government recognizes that fact and accepts the challenge. As the Premier (Mr. Davis) said at the opening of the Ontario Centre for Microelectronics, to compete in today's international markets means going up against the very best in the world and winning; winning in terms of quality and winning in terms of costs. There is really only one way to win and that is through superior technology.

The Science Council of Canada has issued a report which confirms the Premier's view. According to the Science Council of Canada, research and development of superior technology is the key to the survival of our manufacturing sector, to improving our competitiveness in world markets and ultimately to raising our standard of living.

To its credit, the Canadian federal government in its recent budget introduced a number of measures to support technological research and development. These measures include the construction of 15 technology centres across the country.

What will be Ontario's position in this world of the new industrial revolution? Looking at that future through the window provided by the speech from the throne, I see a general outline of that future and detect in the speech a genuine commitment on the part of this government to improving our economic prospects through investment in and development of high technology.

I am confident that the details and specifics of the policies and programs in the throne speech will be filled in by the provincial budget and by the policy statements which will be made by the ministers of this government. I would hope that at that time what I perceive to be a number of inadequacies in our current policy approach in the area of high technology and the transfer of that technology will be dealt with. The programs we have in place are excellent but do not address some problems which, if left unresolved, could jeopardize what we have achieved to this point and what we hope to accomplish in the future.

In an area as novel and dynamic as high technology, a program cannot be totally comprehensive. New problems will arise as our high-technology sectors develop. As our experience in managing this area grows, we will discover that some approaches are better than others in relating to specific problems. High technology is, after all, more than chips, computers and robots. High technology embraces a broad spectrum of scientific and technical disciplines. Programs that prove effective for the development and diffusion of technologies in one sector may prove to be less effective in another.

In addressing some of the points raised in the throne speech, I will make a number of recommendations as to how we might more effectively deal with the opportunities before us. In most cases these proposals could be seen as supplements to existing programs. All of them, in my opinion, will enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of current initiatives. In many instances, I am sure, I am anticipating the minister. However, I bring these forward for the consideration of all members.

It is my strong belief that if the economic recovery which seems to be building is to be anything more than an intermission between recessions, we must quickly and systematically exploit high technology. In the speech from the throne, this government undertakes to help build internationally competitive industries in Ontario. To realize this goal we will have to ensure that our industries have made available to them the high-technology hardware and software they will need to compete.

To accomplish this we must help build a viable high-technology sector in Ontario. We must then concentrate not only on technology transfer but also on domestic research and development. We must maintain this dual focus, because in Ontario and in Canada generally we have two problems. Our first problem is inadequate research and development. In 1983, spending on research and development by the private and public sectors will increase by some 12 per cent. In spite of this increase we will still be spending less than one per cent of our gross national product on research and development. This will have to improve.

Our second problem is that Canadian firms have proved to be extremely slow to adapt what are known as "best-practice technologies" in their operations. A recent study by the Economic Council of Canada shows that it is usually five years, and sometimes more than 10 years, after the first use of an innovative technology that the technology is picked up and applied by a Canadian firm. This is the case even for technologies developed in Canada.

The Ontario technology centres supported by the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development should help us overcome the problem of technological lag in our traditional industries. Our resource industries in particular stand to benefit because mining and forestry companies which have been hard hit by the recession have reduced their spending on research and have cut back on their research staffs. The technology centres will no doubt play an important role in our efforts to build internationally competitive industries. However, I think the following points should be borne in mind:

First, the centres should give special emphasis to the transfer of domestic technologies without neglecting offshore technologies that we can use to advantage. Currently it is estimated that 75 per cent of the technologies that come out of Canadian universities go abroad instead of into our domestic market. Technologies developed by other sources in Canada are also often developed offshore.

By way of illustration, a group in the photo-grammetric section of the National Research Council several years ago devised some revolutionary techniques. Were these techniques developed or exploited in Canada? No. They were picked up, developed and exploited by the Swiss and the Italians.

Another illustration concerns an electronics engineer, a space engineer, who was involved in the Telesat project. As part of his employment he went down to the Mojave Desert, where he discovered, in the motel where he was staying, water of the most pure and excellent quality. In looking into it he found that the water was produced and purified by means of a technology known as reverse osmosis, membrane technology or ultra-filtration. Having an entrepreneurial mind, he inquired as to where this technology originated. He found that the source of the technology and the leading expert in the field, was back in his own home town.

This is the type of thing that cannot be permitted to happen. We cannot expect to build a strong high-technology sector when a lot of our potential flees the country in search of development.

Second, unless we step up our own research and development efforts we will become increasingly dependent on those nations that do invest in basic research. Instead of innovation we will have importation; we will be perpetually one step behind our competitors in the development, application and export of technologies. Our technology centres will in this case only help our industries keep up with yesterday.

I notice that the time is one o'clock.

On motion by Mr. MacQuarrie, the debate was adjourned.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Monday, May 2, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

LEGISLATIVE PAGES

Mr. Speaker: Just before embarking on the routine proceedings I would ask all members of the Legislature to join with me in recognizing the following new pages, who are beginning their first day of service:

Carrie Aitken, Parkdale; Paula Albinson, Frontenac-Addington; Lisa Barry, Sudbury East; Kelly Ann Cook, Stormont-Dundas-Glengarry; Shirley Couchie, Nipissing; Robert Donovan, Fort William; Scott Geddes, Peterborough; Garfield Gilson, Rainy River; Renée Girard, Cochrane North; Michael Kennedy, York South;

Joshua Laughren, Nickel Belt; Lisa Livingstone, Etobicoke; Peter Manga, Ottawa West; Tanya McKinnell, Brant-Oxford-Norfolk; Sean Morley, Oakville; Scot Rutherford, Scarborough-Ellesmere; Cristopher Shepherd, Windsor-Walkerville; Donald Somerville, York Mills; David Taylor, Simcoe Centre; Michelle Timmerman, Wellington-Dufferin-Peel; Carolee Osborne, Wellington South, and Barbara Williams, Oriole.

I would ask you to join with me in welcoming the new pages.

ARTICLE IN NEWSPAPER

Mr. Kerrio: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: I rise to correct the record regarding a newspaper article in the Sunday Sun on May 1. There was a remark in an article by Claire Hoy that was attributed to me. I will not go into the details; I do not want to add any credibility to the story by outlining the details.

I would like to say to the House and to those who are interested in the article that I did not make the statement that was attributed to me, and I hope this gentleman would have enough dignity to withdraw or make some kind of apology to the member.

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTRY

ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT FACILITIES

Hon. Mr. Wiseman: Mr. Speaker, the need to offer every single citizen of our province the opportunity to visit all of the public buildings across Ontario has been of the highest priority to this government and my ministry.

The member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Wrye) rose on a point of privilege last week with respect to access by the physically handicapped to this historic building from the promenade and garden area opposite the main entrance.

I would like to take this opportunity not only to answer the honourable member's question but also to bring this House up to date on the many initiatives we have taken to ensure access to government facilities by the handicapped, not only at Queen's Park but across the province.

Over the past number of years, we have been adapting our existing buildings to ensure accessibility in virtually every corner of Ontario. Ramps, electric doors, sloping curbs and special parking areas are only a few of the changes we have undertaken to make certain all the people of Ontario have access to their government facilities.

To help co-ordinate these efforts, the Ministry of Government Services has set up a barrier-free design office. This office will assist with a one-window approach to address the needs of the physically disabled as well as those of our client ministries.

Our design expert, who is himself a paraplegic, will work with community associations for the handicapped. He will provide technical advice and design in this special area of expertise and we will be keeping an up-to-date record of new developments in this field.

In all of our new buildings, such as the Macdonald-Cartier Building in Kingston, the Ontario government Ministry of Revenue building in Oshawa and the Newmarket courthouse, we have addressed the need for physically handicapped access during the design stage, as we will in all future government buildings across Ontario.

I am pleased to say we will presently be making modifications to the area mentioned by the member to ensure wheelchair access from the promenade to the parking area adjacent to the front door.

However, with respect to providing access at the far southern portion of the sidewalk, we do not feel it prudent to encourage those people in wheelchairs to negotiate the heavy traffic flow on Queen's Park Crescent and University Avenue by requesting the city of Toronto to install a sloping curb.

There are no stop signs, crosswalks or traffic lights at this location. It would be far safer not only for the handicapped but for all citizens to utilize the Wellesley Street crossing. However, the improved access area will certainly allow people in wheelchairs to enjoy the garden and promenade area.

The House might also be interested in knowing precisely what we have done in and around this chamber to facilitate usage by the handicapped.

We have access ramps located at both the north and main entrances. There is a special elevator for the handicapped located behind the main staircase. All washrooms have been redesigned to accommodate the disabled visiting our east, west and basement areas. Water fountains have been installed. We will continue to make further improvements in the future.

I believe, and I am sure every member of this Legislature feels the same way, that we must continue to do everything in our power to guarantee citizens with physical disabilities the same opportunity as all other Ontario citizens to meet their elected representatives and government officials.

We will continue to make changes and improvements to guarantee this right at every opportunity, and I certainly welcome any suggestions and ideas from the honourable members towards our constant desire to achieve these goals.

2:10 p.m.

VISITORS

Mr. Speaker: Just before proceeding, I would ask all honourable members of the assembly to join me in recognizing and welcoming in the Speaker's gallery Mr. Robert McEwen, chairman of the United States section of the International Joint Commission, and Mr. Blair Seaborn, chairman of the Canada section of the International Joint Commission.

ORAL QUESTIONS

WEILER REPORT

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour arising from the observations of Professor Weiler contained in his second report on the subject of workers' disability and workers' compensation. While acknowledging that the Ontario Workers' Compensation Act is one of the best in Canada in dealing with occupational cancer, Professor Weiler goes on to present a litany of horror and grief with respect to a number of occupational cancer fatalities among workers.

He says, "Less than one out of 17 occupational cancer fatalities predicted by the conservative end of the scientific debate" receives compensation from the board. He then goes on to say, "Another way of putting it is that 650 workers (or their surviving dependants) who fall victim to occupational cancer each year are being deprived of $150 million in benefits which the law has promised them." Surely this is unacceptable to the minister, and I want to ask him his timetable for introducing reform to the current law to correct this very serious inequity.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I share the concerns and sentiments expressed by the Leader of the Opposition. We had been awaiting that report by Professor Weiler for some time. We did try to expedite it so that it would be available for the current hearings on the report, which started last Tuesday, and we were successful in getting it in time for that. Copies were circulated on Friday of this past week.

Meanwhile, there is one statement I would like to clarify, if I may. It was reported in the newspaper this morning that only 40 out of 700 work-related cancer fatalities are compensated each year by Ontario's Workers' Compensation Board. If the member would look at page 24 of Professor Weiler's report and the figures he has cited, that represents the potential number of work-related cancers in Ontario. The actual occupational cancer claims received by the WCB number less than 100 in any given year, and of those 40 received compensation. So it is actually 40 out of approximately 100, rather than 40 out of 700; but if there is only one, as far as I am concerned that is still an unacceptable level.

In response to the question the Leader of the Opposition asked about the timetable, the hearings, as I mentioned a moment ago, recommenced last Tuesday. They will continue for at least three more weeks and, during that period, it is planned to have Professor Weiler in attendance to answer questions to provide further information to the committee members. Then we will await, with considerable interest, the report of the committee. From that point on, we will try to deal as expeditiously as possible with changes to the legislation.

Mr. Peterson: I am sure the minister is aware that the original report was filed in November 1980, almost three years ago, and we are now only starting discussions at the legislative level. Surely there are some recommendations the minister could deal with on an interim basis. I refer him, for example, to recommendation 2.4 in the report, which I quote:

"An important issue at the intersection of the WCB, the ministry and the safety associations is the collection and analysis of data on industrial accidents. In effect, the board serves as the eyes and ears of the province on the size and distribution of the occupational injury problem. However, serious deficiencies exist in the current collection and transmission of this data, especially to the extent that either the ministry or particular associations wish to use it to better understand the causes and reduce the incidence of accidents."

What Professor Weiler is strongly implying is that the current co-ordination process in the ministry for detection and prevention is wholly inadequate. Surely that is something the ministry could move on immediately, rather than waiting for the results of the discussions, which may take some time.

Would the minister at least agree to moving immediately on some of these measures to make sure we do not wait any longer than we already have?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Without going into great detail, I would indicate that I believe we are already doing just that.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, Professor Weiler makes it very clear that one of the main problems as to why the board has not received more cancer-related claims—the minister mentioned the number 95 in his answer to the leader of the Liberal Party—is that the board has turned down so many claims, workers have been discouraged and doctors have been discouraged. That is the reason the board is not receiving the number of claims with respect to industrial disease that it should be.

I would like to ask the minister specifically, does he not recognize that he can, together with the Workers' Compensation Board, change the policy guidelines with respect to the recognition of industrial diseases so that we do not have to wait for changes in legislation? Does the minister not realize it is something which can be done right now so those workers and those families who are left out in the cold by decisions of the board, and by nondecisions of the board, will receive compensation starting tomorrow if the minister decides he can move to change the guidelines?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, the third party has three very capable, dedicated and concerned members on the standing committee on resources development that is studying the Weiler report at the present time. They are making their voices heard and we are listening to what they have to say. I am sure their advice and their input into the final report will prove to be very constructive.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, surely the minister understands it would be wrong in a sense to muddy the waters of the current committee hearings, which are really to look at the first report of Weiler and at the level of benefits, and to study whether we are going to have some changes in procedures.

While I acknowledge this new report does deal with some of the recommendations which flowed out of the first report, surely the minister must understand there are things he can do now without waiting for the legislative committee to act. I want to refer him to one thing, and that is recommendation 1.3 in which Professor Weiler says:

"The single most important legislative/administrative reform must be the creation of an Industrial Disease Standards Panel (IDSP) which will be charged with the primary responsibility for developing criteria for evaluating disease claims."

The minister knows he has proposed who the panel members would be and he has proposed far-reaching powers for them. Will the minister give us his timetable for acting on this recommendation? Will he give us his first indication that he will approve this recommendation?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position today to give any timetable, but I want to agree with what the honourable member has said in that I do not expect the resources development committee, in the study on the Weiler report, to deal with part 2 as well as part 1.

There is some relationship there and I would expect it to deal with those related parts, just as the member has pointed out. However, there are other matters there which my ministry, in concert with the Workers' Compensation Board, will have to deal with and we fully intend to do so.

SUNCOR EARNINGS

Mr. Peterson: If the Treasurer is through hugging the governor (Mr. Bernier), I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. Breithaupt: He just wants an invitation to Minaki. That is all he wants. He wants to see where his money is going.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Peterson: I obviously caught them in an embarrassing position, Mr. Speaker.

I have a question for the Treasurer. He is travelling about the province setting people up for a nasty budget, implying there will be increases in Ontario health insurance plan premiums, implying there will be major increases—

2:20 p.m.

Interjections.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, could you contain him? He is so excited about that hug, he cannot—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Peterson: The Treasurer is travelling about setting people up for a nasty budget, implying there will be higher OHIP premiums, higher taxes, probably a higher deficit and a variety of other things.

Has the Treasurer done a calculation, and is he going to share with the people of this province his calculation, with respect to the costs to the taxpayers of this province of holding the one-quarter interest in Suncor shares for the first five quarters we have had it? Has he done that calculation to figure out how much net out of pocket as of this point it has cost people in this province in the first year and a quarter, ex the dividends, ex the increase in equity, laid against the interest costs payable directly out of pocket by the taxpayers?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I was hugging the governor. It was probably a $2-million hug, I would guess. He usually needs those kinds of moneys.

I want to say one thing about the governor, if that is what one would call him: no one in the history of this province has done as much for northern Ontario or has made the people there as loyal to our government as that gentleman.

Mr. Laughren: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Now for the question, please.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, was I stretching the rules?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Sorry.

Mr. Martel: No one has given as much away.

Mr. Breithaupt: No one has done as well out of it, either.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Back to the question, please.

Mr. Martel: Are you looking for a vote or a delegate?

Hon. F. S. Miller: I am in my blue suit today. The truth is my friend who likes to have John Turner come to his fund-raising dinners and pretends he is a Liberal one night—

Interjections.

Hon. F. S. Miller: We knew no one would come if it were just the member's dinner, so John had to go.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think this has anything to do with the question. I point out to all members we have used 12 minutes of question period and I ask the Treasurer to respond to the question please.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I was just using that as they do, as an introduction to my comments.

What I was going to say is that it is intriguing to me that he can complain about us buying 25 per cent of an oil company when the party he was espousing that night bought 100 per cent of two companies for a price at least double market value. We negotiated long and hard for what was then a fair market price. The estimates will show the true cost.

Mr. Peterson: Because the Treasurer perhaps does not know the answer to the question, I can assist him with the answer.

The reality is the 1982 earnings for Suncor were some $60 million, the 1983 first-quarter earnings were $22.7 million; total earnings were about $82 million, and the government's share was about $20 million. The 1982 interest was $93 million and the first quarter of 1983 interest was about $23 million for $116 million.

Would the Treasurer not agree with me that the net cost out of pocket to the taxpayers of this province for the joy of ownership of a one-quarter interest in Suncor has been $95 million. That is what it has cost us out of pocket to own those shares. Would the Treasurer not agree with that?

Second, would the Treasurer not agree with me that the $95 million would have been far better spent on, for example, the youth employment program he has cut back and underfunded by $50 million? Would he not agree it would have been better spent on the Ontario home renewal program which was cut back and underfunded?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I pointed out to all honourable members at the beginning of the session that each member would be allowed one question. I quite clearly heard your question. The Treasurer will respond.

Hon. F. S. Miller: My colleague is quick to try to assess immediate returns against immediate investment. I would suggest if he went through the investments made by Noranda and MacMillan Bloedel in 1982, and investments by hundreds of companies in 1981, and then looked at 1982, he could come up with figures like that.

Without a doubt, 1982 was one of the worst years for economic return on investment in Canada. Many a company had a loss last year. Does that mean there was not value in the assets of the company? Does that mean the basic investment in that company was not sound? I do not believe so.

Mr. Peterson: Would the Treasurer not agree with me that the $95 million which the taxpayers are out of pocket represents an amount similar to a five per cent increase in Ontario health insurance plan premiums, which he may attempt to impose on us? Would he not agree also that it represents in total a $50-million cutback in youth employment programs, an $11-million cutback in Ontario home renewal programs, the tile drainage loan program underfunded by $20 million, the young farmers' program not implemented for $11 million? All of those together would add up to roughly what it has cost the taxpayers out of pocket for the joy of owning those shares in Suncor.

Would the Treasurer not agree with me now that he was right a year and a quarter ago when he protested but did not have the clout to prevent that process?

Would he not agree with me that he should start the process of trying to realize a maximum gain by disposing of those assets, because it will continue to bleed the taxpayers for a long time into the future?

Mr. Sweeney: It's the oil version of Minaki.

Hon. F. S. Miller: If it is the oil version of Minaki, we ought to be proud of it.

The proof of the pudding will be in the eating. I would suggest to the member that I, for one, have never tried to defend that investment—I do not believe the Premier (Mr. Davis) has very often—on the basis of immediate financial return. As a matter of fact, there are seldom times in history when governments can justify an investment in a corporation, at least from this government's point of view, for the dollars returned on investment. There has to be a secondary, political reason.

The secondary, political reason—there were three or four of them in this case—was what effect that would have on Ontario's position and right to have a place at the table to discuss the pricing and supply of oil in this country. The member knows that was part of a coherent Ontario policy enunciated in 1979.

WEILER REPORT

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the Minister of Labour about the report of Professor Weiler and the problem of industrial disease. I am sure the minister is aware that the criteria established by the board to decide whether to recognize a particular claim for cancer are internally generated criteria, and the policy guidelines are internally generated policy guidelines.

Given the pretty devastating criticism which Professor Weiler levels at the approach the board has taken and the impact this approach has had on rejecting a number of claims and on discouraging other workers from launching their own claims, does the minister not feel this is something he and the board itself can work on immediately?

Does the minister not see that it is not necessary to wait for the never-never report of the standing committee but it is something that can happen today with respect to people whose claims are being denied today and families who are being left out in the cold today? Does he not recognize the urgency of the problem?

Mr. Riddell: It's a never-never report because your colleagues wouldn't sit.

Mr. Rae: No, you wouldn't sit.

Mr. Riddell: Oh, you've got to be out of your mind.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Riddell: You're stupider than I thought you were. It was the Tories who wouldn't sit. You guys are right out of your heads.

Ms. Copps: You guys are the only ones who can afford to go to Florida.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I believe I answered that in the first round of questions, where I stated rather clearly, I thought, that Professor Weiler's second report does not have to wait for the report of the committee. There are many things in there that can be looked at right away, and I assure the members of this House they will be considered as quickly as possible.

2:30 p.m.

Mr. Rae: With respect to the second major aspect of Professor Weiler's report, the need to develop a universal social insurance scheme that will cover people injured at work, at home and on the road, can the minister tell us what his position and the position of his government is with respect to that proposal, given the number of people in this province who are not covered by workers' compensation, who are not covered by public schemes and not covered by private schemes, and who are literally left out in the cold after suffering a serious disability? Can he tell us what the position of his government is with respect to that major proposal by Professor Weiler?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I first had the opportunity to read Professor Weiler's second report on a plane going back to Sault Ste. Marie on the weekend and on a plane coming from Sault Ste. Marie on the weekend, and I do not really want to be presumptuous at this time and make any statement that I might regret later.

I have to look at it in more depth. I have to discuss it with my senior officials. It is a very complex report. It is very enlightening. It has some dramatic departures from the current system. It is one that required a great deal of study and a great deal of contemplation, and again I commit myself to trying to do that as quickly as possible.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, I want to return to the ongoing problem of our committee's deliberations, and the minister in his response to a question I asked earlier noted correctly that there is some interrelationship between this first and second report.

Can we have a commitment from this minister and from the Ministry of Labour that before the committee meets with Professor Weiler at the end of May we will have in our hands as a committee the initial response of the ministry in all of those areas that may overlap in our considerations?

To mention just one, there are the new changes that Professor Weiler has proposed with respect to experience rating in his second report, where he has gone much further, it seems to me, than the recommendation in the white paper and in the draft legislation. Can we have the ministry's views on the changes that Professor Weiler is now proposing?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I would truly and sincerely wish to be able to answer in the affirmative to that question, but I really do not think I can. I do not think it is something we can address, with all the other demands this month, in that quick a period of time; nor would it be appropriate to answer that quickly. This is a very important matter and one we are going to have to look at very seriously.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, since only three regulated substances deal with cancer, it would seem the only way to reduce the possibility of workers being exposed to toxic substances that are carcinogenic is for the minister and his ministry to move to ensure (a) that all new toxic substances are pre-market tested; and (b), that all labelling of materials would give the generic names, the chemical composition and the hazardous effects on workers exposed to those substances.

Will he move to do this so that workers will know what they are working with and thus put pressure on companies to test adequately to guarantee that we reduce the horrendous number of cancer cases from occupational disease?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is yes. I believe we are working towards that objective.

EXTENDICARE LTD.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Provincial Secretary for Social Development in the absence of the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) and the Premier (Mr. Davis).

Wakey, wakey, Margaret.

An hon. member: She will vote her own way, Dennis.

Mr. Rae: That's right. She will do whatever she wants to do, Dennis. Just because she is sitting next to you does not mean you can count on her.

I am sure the minister is aware of the agreement that was announced on Friday between the Queensway Hospital and Extendicare Ltd., which has been described as a trend-setting agreement that will give that private-profit institution, Extendicare, a very major stake in the operation of a chronic care unit at that hospital.

Is the minister prepared to table the agreement with Extendicare? And can she please explain to this House why taxpayers and seniors are being asked to pour money for 20 years down the throats of private-profit medicine in the field of chronic care?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the signing of the agreement, but I would ask the honourable member to pose his questions directly to the Minister of Health.

Mr. Rae: The minister is in Switzerland; I cannot very well ask him there. The provincial secretary is here and in the House and she does have a responsibility for the overall social field. This is clearly a very important element in the social policy of this government: the privatization of much of our public hospitals.

I would like to ask the minister a very basic policy question. Given the agreement with AMI (Canada) Ltd. in Hawkesbury and given this agreement here in Toronto with Extendicare, is it now the policy of the government of Ontario that private-profit medicine will be asked and encouraged to come into this province to run hospitals at a profit?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: No.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, would the provincial secretary be so kind as to find out from her colleague, when he gets back from his visit to the gnomes, whether she can obtain the information with respect to the ministry's share of the capital financing of this project, which I understand to be $2.2 million out of $6.5 million?

Would she tell us what the likely profit picture will be for Extendicare over the course of the mortgage on this facility and what return will there be to the taxpayers of Ontario other than the opportunity to pay a minimum $15-per-day user charge if they have to go to this chronic care facility? What other kind of benefit will there be to the taxpayers of Ontario?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, when the minister returns next week I am sure he will be prepared to give a full statement on the agreement that was signed with the hospital.

BUY CANADIAN POLICY

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson) asked me a number of questions last Tuesday with respect to the purchase of a computer manufactured in the United States.

I have looked into the matter and I find that the Ontario Manpower Commission prepared a specification for a total system, part of which was a requirement for computer hardware. In accordance with established practice, the commission invited four Canadian companies to bid on the specification. These four companies responded with bids for the total system ranging from approximately $57,000 on the low end to over $200,000 at the high end.

The contract was awarded to the Canadian company that submitted the lowest bid. The Canadian company, in order to meet the terms and conditions of the specifications, supplied as part of the total package a hardware component manufactured by a California computer company. I have been advised by my staff that there is not at present a Canadian company that manufactures equipment that meets the commission's requirements.

The member also asked that I table the specifications, the bids received and the analysis of the bids made by staff with regard to this purchase. I will provide him with a copy of the specifications. It is not, however, government practice to make public the proprietary information regarding pricing structures contained in confidential bids. I cannot, therefore, table the bids received or the analysis of those bids.

I would note for the member that the commission has not received any complaints regarding this purchase. In accordance with the government's policy on competitive purchasing the ministry would, if requested, provide unsuccessful bidders with information on the name of the successful bidder, the bid price and the reasons for nonselection. The ministry stands ready to debrief any vendor who wishes to discuss any bid. Two of the unsuccessful bidders in this purchase have already discussed their bids with the Ontario Manpower Commission.

I have been assured by staff that the computer purchase at the Ontario Manpower Commission was carried out in a fair and equitable manner. The allegations that the commission is experiencing technical problems with this equipment and that it is not performing are not true. The equipment is operating satisfactorily and there are no problems either with the equipment or with the supplier.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, since it is obvious that the Canadian company was acting as a broker and presumably the minister did not specify Canadian machinery in his tendering documents or in the specifications he tabled, why are we told that Nabu, a Canadian corporation, a multinational with some thousands of employees in Canada, produces comparable models here? I am told they could be applied here, yet the company was not given the chance to tender. Why would that be in these circumstances?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Obviously, the member and I are getting different reports or different pieces of information. I can only reiterate what I said in my comments.

I would add that I did ask my staff to review the Canadian content of the four submissions. That review indicates that the successful bidder had the highest Canadian content. The next lowest bid was inferior in terms of Canadian content and was also incomplete.

DEATHS AT HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. The minister is no doubt aware that the Centre of Forensic Sciences has completed its preliminary investigation into the Murphy death and that Dr. Hastreiter is already reviewing the results with a member of the team from the Atlanta Centers for Disease Control. Can the minister comment on confirmations by hospital officials that the police have already informally told them that homicide has been ruled out?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: I have no knowledge of what the member has said in regard to comments made to hospital staff by the individuals she has mentioned.

Ms. Copps: When the minister does receive information and when a homicide is ruled out, will he guarantee that a coroner's inquest will be called immediately, despite the fact that there is at present a backlog of two or three months, as indicated by the coroner's office today? Will he guarantee that a coroner's inquest will be called into the Murphy baby's death immediately, if and when he receives information that homicide has been ruled out?

Hon. G. W. Taylor: If this is a situation that warrants a coroner's inquest, I will accommodate the member and call for an immediate inquest if one is recommended by the chief coroner.

EXTRA BILLING

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Provincial Secretary for Social Development in the continuing absence of the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman).

I will quote briefly from the minister's statement to this House on February 14, "Until the time arrives at which the member can stand up, not with statistics but with a real case where accessibility to medicare has been threatened by a doctor refusing to treat someone unless they pay an extra-billed amount which they were unable to pay, then we do not have a problem with accessibility."

Has the minister had an opportunity to read about the simply appalling case in today's Toronto Star? It is the case of a five-year-old child born with a deformed upper jaw who requires facial surgery and who has been unable to obtain it because her father already owes the doctor an outstanding bill of $2,100. The doctor will not perform the rest of the surgery until the bill is paid. Further, the compound interest on the outstanding bill will probably add up to $10,000 by the time the amount is paid off. How can this kind of case possibly happen in a province that is supposed to have a universal medicare program?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, I have not had the advantage of reading that story in the Star today, but I will certainly ask the deputy minister to give me a report and report back to the House tomorrow.

Mr. McClellan: I had an opportunity to do a little informal survey of my own constituents. Out of 150 respondents, 50 had experienced extra billing. That is about one third. A number of them were extra billed in amounts over $100.

On Friday the Minister of Health said five per cent of claims are submitted on an extra-billed basis. That is three million claims a year, in case the minister cannot divide.

Does the provincial secretary agree with the words of the minister on Friday that we have no problem in this province with extra billing and even less of a problem here in Metro? Does she agree with that when we have the kinds of cases such as the one on the front page of the newspapers again today and three million extra billing cases a year in this province?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: As I recall the Minister of Health's comments on that specific topic, I do not recall him saying we had no problem. I think he indicated with the large numbers of claims that go through we do have a minimum number of problems, but in any large system it is almost impossible to have a perfect count. Even with one case, as the member points out today, I am sure the minister will be most anxious to have that one looked into to find out exactly what the problems are.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Industry and Trade. While the minister is returning to his seat, I would comment that I had this question all last week for the Premier (Mr. Davis) but he was not here Monday, he was not here on Friday, he is not here today, and on Tuesday and Thursday he left after 20 minutes. One would think he has other things on his mind these days.

Mr. Speaker: Question please.

Mr. Sweeney: The question is to the Minister of Industry and Trade as the Premier's stand-in.

On February 21, the Minister of Industry and Trade for Ontario, in a meeting in Ottawa with other ministers of industry, and I would assume the federal minister, recommended that all those firms that have fewer than 600 employees, or less than a $15-million gross, be exempted from the Foreign Investment Review Agency applications.

Since this would represent 85 per cent of all of the applications that come before FIRA, their own office has said they might just as well go out of business. Yet only seven days later, in Paris, France, the Premier of this province is reported thus: "Mr. Davis defended the Foreign Investment Review Agency. He insisted some review was necessary for a country with such a high penetration of foreign control."

One has to wonder who speaks for Ontario with respect to FIRA? Does Ontario have a policy with respect to FIRA?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, let me remind the member that in this particular case he has failed to read the accurate information and has read only the story that was reported in the newspaper. Had he read the documentation which I think was sent to his office, I think he would have realized that the position I advanced was somewhat different from what he is now suggesting.

The position I put forward was a prenotification procedure whereby if an application fell within a threshold, in other words it was a below a certain threshold, in this case a $15-million threshold, in that particular case the Foreign Investment Review Agency would be notified. If the matter was considered to be in any way sensitive, FIRA would immediately contact the party and advise that it wished to have a full and complete application. If on the other hand it was not deemed to be particularly sensitive, and if no reply were received within 30 days, then the company would be deemed to be appropriate under the circumstances and considered allowed to go forward with its particular acquisition.

It is called the prenotification procedure. It has been something of a position advanced now by the Canadian Bar Association, a position we have adopted within the province to speed up the process of FIRA, which has to some extent been slowed down in the past.

I will say there has been a speedup over the past year that has been substantial. It has not had anything to do with me. It has had nothing to do with me. It has had something to do with Mr. Lumley, who has brought in a new machinery that has advanced the process a great deal.

The particular procedure, that I advanced to them in conjunction with the recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association, would go a long way to cleaning up the morass of the Foreign Investment Review Agency, which as the member knows approves 95 per cent of the applications anyway. This would be a process that would speed it up. It would be worth while and it is deemed by most people to be appropriate. Almost all of the trade and industry ministers present that day agreed and supported the point put forward.

2:50 p.m.

Mr. Sweeney: Our understanding from talking to people in Ottawa is that they are substantially moving in that direction anyway. There is nothing new in that process.

Given the fact that Ontario is invited to comment on any application coming before FIRA which affects the interests of Ontario or an industry that might locate in Ontario, and using the Premier's words in terms of "penetration of foreign control"—and we not talking only of investment, we are talking of control—I would like to know how far this minister and the Premier are prepared to allow further penetration of foreign control?

As an alternative, how far are they prepared to assist small Canadian-owned businesses currently operating in Ontario to expand to fulfil the role that foreign control now fulfils or wishes to fulfil?

Hon. Mr. Walker: We are prepared to encourage as much investment as we can that is for the betterment of the public in creating jobs within the province. That is the first position. Any particular application that comes forward will be very carefully considered by us and encouraged as much as possible. We are more interested in the corporate behaviour of industries while here than in what their parentage may be.

That is a position I have advanced before. The member is well aware of that.

Second, I can indicate that from a statistical point of view over the last 10 years, the degree of penetration of foreign investment as a whole has significantly decreased in this province and in this country. That is a point of view which the member's research might reveal.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to figure out whether the minister is a Pocklington or a Gamble supporter. Is he prepared as a matter of basic policy in Ontario to require that before foreign-owned firms move out of the province and close down factories they should at least be prepared as a matter of policy to offer those plants to the workers in those plants?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, that is a very valid thing and I would like to encourage that. I would certainly never be part of any organization that would pass a law that would require it. However, I am certainly prepared to encourage that wherever possible and find it would be unfortunate if that happened otherwise. I support the principle but I am not prepared to see a law passed that requires that to be done. I do not think that is in keeping with decent business in the province.

EDUCATION FOR MENTALLY HANDICAPPED

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Community and Social Services on a problem with which I believe he is familiar. The minister is fully aware that in the Sudbury area many retarded children are not getting speech pathology services because for one thing his ministry, which provides funds to the Algoma sanatorium, does not attach any strings to those and the san has refused to provide the service to school-aged children.

The ministry has refused to provide funding for assessment and programs because it is the responsibility of the Ministry of Education. Education says it is the responsibility of the boards of education, and they say it is the responsibility of Health and Community and Social Services. In the meantime, these children are getting no services.

Will the minister tell us why he is not prepared to provide short-term funding for May and June in order to provide the service and to have a policy put in place down the road?

Hon. Mr. Drea: For the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that there is a policy. At every other place where there is an equivalent to the Sudbury Algoma Hospital there is no problem with the provision of speech pathology; none. The member should not shake his head at me.

At the Windsor Western Hospital Centre they may be a bit short, but there is no problem as to whose responsibility it is. There is no problem in Hamilton. There is no problem in Ottawa.

Mr. Laughren: Those are not the facts and the minister knows it. It is a blatant distortion.

Mr. Speaker: Question please.

Mr. Laughren: Is the minister aware that when children are in institutions they are provided with a service but when they are taken out of the institutions and put into the community they are refused service from anybody in the community? This is at a time when the minister's deinstitutionalization program is in place across the province. How can the minister justify such perverse policies that say to people in the community, "As long as your child is in an institution, this service will be provided; when that child is not in the institution, that service will be refused"?

Does the minister really believe his own words when he says there is no problem in this situation across the province? Of course there is a problem across the province. How can he justify that kind of statement? It is nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Drea: I would appreciate it if the honourable member would not distort my words. He talked about a particular funding problem at the particular children's mental health hospital in Sudbury.

Mr. Laughren: No.

Hon. Mr. Drea: He did.

Mr. Laughren: Not just in Sudbury.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Drea: He did and that is the answer he got. He is awfully good at trying to distort everything.

The particular problem that the member talks about in the Sudbury area is one that does give me some concern; but I am not going to step in and accept all the responsibility or the very thing that he is complaining about—that when one is out in the community one gets no service—will get perpetuated. We are—

Mr. Martel: So the kids can do without the service.

Hon. Mr. Drea: What is the problem of the member for Sudbury East?

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please. Just respond to the question.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I believe I did respond to the particular question.

ST. CLAIR REGION CONSERVATION AUTHORITY

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Government Services. I realize the Minister of Correctional Services (Mr. Leluk) is hugging him; there must be something catching across the floor.

Given that his ministry has been directed by cabinet to act as an agent for the St. Clair Region Conservation Authority in settling the expropriation claims with land owners in Moore and Sombra townships, for land which is required for purposes of a water diversion system to divert water from the Sydenham River to the St. Clair River for flood control purposes, and given that an extension to February 28, 1983, for making payment was obtained by court order, would the minister tell the House why payment has been made to only two of the 135 owners whose land and/or property was expropriated?

Hon. Mr. Wiseman: Mr. Speaker, it is true that we were asked by the Ministry of Natural Resources to go in and do an appraisal of approximately 15 properties in that area. At the present time, I have just given my two colleagues an update on that. We have purchased or put through offers to purchase by the advisory committee, made up of the Ministry of Natural Resources and the conservation authority, for seven of those properties. The eight remaining will go through as soon as possible. Some of them are in the process of being accepted and on others there are still further negotiations.

There seems to be one lawyer working on behalf of all the people and he is working down the list of cases. As I understand it, the offer has been made in most cases but to the present time the lawyer acting on behalf of the people has not come back with a counter offer.

Mr. Van Horne: This whole proposal has been described by the inquiry officer, who made the first ruling back in the fall, as "a gross case of bureaucratic bungling." It would seem that the bungling is being carried on.

My understanding is that there are still more than 100 owners of property, or property and homes, who have not been informed in any way, shape or form of offers. Some of them are people who simply have an easement for flood control purposes now on their property.

Can the minister give me and those people any assurance that the deadline, which was to have been February 28, will not be extended any further and that some form of offer will be made to them in the month of May 1983?

Hon. Mr. Wiseman: I have to defend our ministry. The honourable member said there has been some sort of bungling going on and apparently it is still going on. I would like to assure him that since we were asked to come and give an outside, private appraisal on it we have done that and have done it very quickly.

We are just acting as agents, as I said before, for the Ministry of Natural Resources and the conservation authorities. The 15 that I mentioned were people who were going to have to be bought out, and we were coming in with offers. I mentioned the seven that have already accepted. The honourable member said two, but I think if he checks now he will find that it is up to seven.

Eight of those are in the process, and the lawyer for those people is looking after them one at a time. It seems that each of these people has sought legal counsel of the same person.

We are dealing with the ones where there are flood plains after we get the ones that we figure are complete buy-outs finished; but it is a big job, and I cannot give the member an exact time when it will be finished, other than to say that I have had meetings with my staff and we are moving along as quickly as possible.

PRICE RESTRAINT CRITERIA

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations. I am sure the minister will recall that Bill 179, which was passed four and a half months ago, requires that he review administered price increases under economic criteria that he is required to establish.

Will the minister tell this House when he established the criteria, if he has; how many prices he has reviewed; and, if he has referred any to the Inflation Restraint Board, what services and companies are represented in those referrals?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Mr. Speaker, it is my recollection that those criteria were tabled. Second, I do not have the exact number of matters that have been reviewed. And yes, one has been referred to the Inflation Restraint Board, and I am not prepared to discuss it at the moment.

Mr. Swart: If that is the price increase awarded to Consumers' Gas, is the minister aware that the award they got of $20.1 million for their own use represents much more than a five per cent increase, that its profits in the first quarter of this year set a new high and that it has now asked for a further increase, which will amount to an additional 10 per cent increase in its own revenue for distributing gas?

If the minister has not referred that one to the Inflation Restraint Board, will he refer it? If not, why not?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: I cannot recall any recent matter related to Consumers' Gas that has been before the administered prices committee. When it comes before us, I will deal with it in the appropriate fashion.

FUNDING BY WINTARIO

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Culture. The minister is no doubt aware of the report released last week by the Joint Task Force on Neighbourhood Support Services, which highlights the desperate need for core funding in Metropolitan Toronto to keep neighbourhoods alive.

Considering their findings, which state that, excluding projects of a regional or provincial issue, the province paid out $3 per person in Wintario grants to every government riding in Metro while it paid out an average of only $1 in ridings held by opposition members, will the minister tell us whether he plans to increase funding to these other ridings?

Hon. Mr. McCaffrey: Mr. Speaker, I was aware of the report, and I am quite prepared either to share it privately or to table a more detailed response. While the report did imply that members of the government party received favoured treatment, at the same time it did show clearly that it is the central part of Metro Toronto, notwithstanding constituencies, that gets the support.

I just share with my friend the fact that the former member for St. George was a Liberal and the present member of St. George (Ms. Fish) is not a Liberal—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McCaffrey: I mention that because that particular constituency of St. George is in that urban centre and is a portion of downtown Metro that has received a goodly amount of money. Where the Royal Ontario Museum and Roy Thomson Hall are located has a great deal more to do with the history of those buildings than with the constituency they are in. I think an important point has been raised, and it might be fairer and more thorough if I tabled a more detailed response to it.

I think everybody understands that, from the outset of the Wintario program and the subsequent lottery games, there has been tremendous care taken by all members of the Legislature, who clearly at the time of estimates look to see if there are any of those kinds of abuses. We are extra sensitive in the ministry that those things do not happen, for very obvious reasons.

I think everybody understands that at the core of the Wintario money and the way it is distributed is the fact that we respond to local initiatives. To put it bluntly, the riding I represent is one of those that have received very little money. The fact is, we cannot put an art gallery or a museum in a community that does not want it and is not able to support it; but I would be prepared to give more details on that.

Mr. O'Neil: If the minister reviewed my initial question, I think he would see that I mentioned it was excluding such things as the Royal Ontario Museum and some of these other larger projects.

Is the minister disputing the graphs and figures that were released last week that definitely show a three-to-one ratio between government ridings and opposition members' ridings? I would like to know, first of all, whether the minister disputes those figures.

I would also like to ask him whether he proposes to make a change so that some of the other ridings that are not receiving the proper amount of funding are assisted and will have the long-term core funding that is essential to some of these community services in Metro Toronto.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister propose to make a change? That is the question.

Hon. Mr. McCaffrey: No, I do not accept the reality of those figures; so there will be no changes based on that submission.

When the member takes a look at my detailed response, he will see that a change is not necessary. What is required is clarification as to Wintario, Lottario, Super Loto and Provincial moneys and how they are invested, and my work sheet will help in that regard.

MECHANICS' LIEN ACT PRACTICES

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations concerning some practices that have sprung up around the Mechanics' Lien Act.

It has been brought to my attention that some builders are now making it a condition of sale, on the purchase of a new home, that the purchaser set up the trust fund that is laid out in this act and that we all thought would be carried on by the builder. Is it legal to make such a condition of sale? It certainly imposes a great hardship on people who are trying to purchase new homes.

Hon. Mr. Elgie: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I could look into that but, as the honourable member knows, that particular legislation is from the Attorney General's ministry and I have no current information about what the practices are there. However, I will advise my colleague of the member's question.

Mr. Breagh: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is looking into that, would he take a look at some of the practical problems people are experiencing? Many people trying to purchase a home with this kind of condition put on the closing of the sale are finding it very difficult to come up with financing that may be in the order of $10,000 to $15,000 for a 45-day period.

Would the minister take a look at some of these practices, and, most urgently, tell people what they can do if they are faced with a situation where they must close the transaction? What options do they have?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: Again, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I will draw these matters to the attention of the minister in charge of that act.

Mr. Sweeney: Is the minister aware of the fact that the Royal Trust company has issued a directive to its district managers not to take on any residential mortgages whatsoever because of the Mechanics' Lien Act?

Hon. Mr. Elgie: No, I was not.

3:10 p.m.

LIBRARY BOARDS

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Culture on the document entitled A Foundation for the Future, the consultation paper on public libraries. I would like to draw to the minister's attention that the 28-page report was done without any mention at all of the francophone issues as far as libraries are concerned.

Is the minister aware that there was a report published only a year ago, known as the Desjardins-Gagné report, and that report number 8 of the Ontario public library program review was released shortly afterwards? Is he also aware that the Council on Franco-Ontarian Affairs, only a month before the release of this document, had recommended major changes in the structure of libraries of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. McCaffrey: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I can quickly find the relevant section that I wanted to quote back to the honourable member. I think he may be correct that it does not specify Franco-Ontarian communities, but throughout the pages in the consultation paper there is consistent reference to the fact that the local library boards, and the municipalities that appoint the local library boards in main, are to be sensitive to the needs of their local communities. That has been a tradition for a century in this province which we have no intention of changing. It clearly refers to the francophone communities in a number of regions of the province.

The same point would hold with regard to ethnic representation and appointments from separate and/or public school boards, where we left some more options in here so the library boards would be able to run their policies on the basis of the needs of their respective communities.

So while the words "francophone" and "francophone representations" may not be there, and I cannot find it right off hand, there is no question that we were sensitive to that reality throughout and attempted to be consistent in each of the pages of the discussion paper to emphasize the need for these boards to respond to local needs.

NOTICE OF DISSATISFACTION

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing order 28(a), I wish to give notice of my dissatisfaction with the incredible answer from the incredible Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea), earlier during this question period, and I wish to have the matter more fully debated tomorrow night at adjournment.

PETITIONS

NUCLEAR DISARMAMENT

Mr. Eakins: Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition, but I would ask your indulgence. To me, this appears to be a petition, or it may be ruled an expression of concern.

It is signed by the staff and students of Fenelon Falls Secondary School, Fenelon Falls, who are in the Speaker's gallery today. It reads in part:

"While we realize that the provincial government has no authority to act in regard to nuclear arms reduction, none the less we strongly urge the government of Ontario to take a definitive stand in favour of nuclear arms reduction and that this position be communicated to the government of Canada to support an effective program to lower the risk of nuclear attack."

It is signed by the staff and students of Fenelon Falls Secondary School.

BULK FOODS

Mr. Pollock: Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition with the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman). The petition has 2,577 names on it, and it is from five bulk food stores in Campbellford, Belleville, Norwood and Havelock.

The petition is straightforward and states: "I am pleased with the method that the stores are using to dispense food."

The petition was delivered to my constituency office, and I would like to pass it on to the Minister of Health. I would like the record to show that it was delivered to the Minister of Health.

MOTION

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BUSINESS

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding any order of the House, private members' public business will be not taken up until Thursday, May 19, 1983.

Motion agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL

BOROUGH OF EAST YORK ACT

Mr. Williams moved, seconded by Mr. Rotenberg, first reading of Bill Pr6, An Act respecting the Borough of East York.

Motion agreed to.

BUDGET DAY PROCEDURE

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I thought I might clarify for the House the procedure that will be followed on budget day, next Tuesday, May 10. We will begin as usual at 2 p.m. with routine proceedings and we have undertaken not to have any ministerial statements. When routine proceedings are concluded, if there is still some time left before 4 p.m., the House will adjourn for a period of time, perhaps 10 or 15 minutes, and at exactly 4 p.m. the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) will begin the budget address, which will be concluded by 6 p.m. There will be no night sitting that night.

Pursuant to the motion the House just passed concerning private members' afternoon, it has been agreed that the responses from both the official opposition and the third party will be made on the afternoon of May 12. Again we will not have any statements and the time will be split equally, so that the two responses to the budget will be on the afternoon of May 12.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. MacQuarrie: Mr. Speaker, when the debate adjourned, I had pointed out how important it was to ensure that Ontario industries have available to them the most up-to-date technology and equipment to allow them to compete successfully in the marketplaces of the world and that it was also important to develop a high-technology sector in Ontario.

I mentioned that we faced two problems. The first problem is inadequate domestic research and development and our comparatively low expenditures on research and development activities. The second problem is technological lag, with our traditional industries being extremely slow in adapting best-practice technologies to their operations.

I indicated that our comparative expenditures on research and development would have to increase. I also suggested that the Ontario technology centres would help to ensure that Ontario industry would be internationally competitive.

However, I noted that a number of points should be kept in mind when assessing the role the technology centres would play in helping us meet the challenge of the new industrial revolution.

First, the centres should give special emphasis to the development and transfer of domestic technologies without neglecting offshore technologies that our industries could use to advantage. We should bear in mind that a great deal of technology developed in Canada is exploited offshore.

Second, we must increase our own research and development efforts to avoid becoming more and more dependent for technology and technological advance on those nations that do invest heavily in basic scientific and industrial research and against whom our industries must compete.

If we do become technologically dependent on others, we will always be behind our competitors in developing, applying and exporting technologies. As I pointed out, in this case our technology centres will be able at best to help our industries keep up with yesterday.

3:20 p.m.

Third, in my opinion it is vital that close links be established between provincial agencies such as the technology centres, the Ontario Research Foundation, the Innovation Development for Employment Advancement Corp. and other agencies in other provinces and at the national level.

I referred earlier to the National Research Council, one of the world's foremost research agencies, with internationally recognized expertise across the whole scientific and technological spectrum and a strong, well-trained, skilled support staff.

The NRC was established to undertake, assist or promote scientific and engineering research to further Canada's economic and social development. It maintains a close working relationship with Canadian industries, universities and other government agencies. The NRC also enjoys an excellent rapport with industries, universities and government research establishments in many foreign jurisdictions.

Although the NRC operates research facilities in centres in various parts of the country and abroad, its major facilities are in Carleton East. The NRC operates a scientific and industrial research program designed, among other things, to assist Canadian industries to develop new and improved methods, products, systems, techniques and services.

This government shares with the NRC the common objectives of improving industrial output, encouraging technological innovation and effecting the transfer to industry of best-practice technologies.

It would be a waste if we did not develop a much closer working relationship with the NRC than exists at present. After all, the mandate of the NRC includes close co-operation with the provinces and with provincial research establishments.

I know the NRC is more than willing to co-operate with the province in attaining our common goals. For instance, almost two years ago the NRC indicated it would permit the province to establish a distinctive provincial technology centre on part of its Montreal Road campus.

The NRC is often at the cutting edge of technological research and new industrial techniques. A close link with the NRC would give us early access to research activities and research results which could be further developed by our technology centres or other research agencies or transferred directly to Ontario industry or Ontario entrepreneurs.

This could be particularly beneficial since the NRC is carrying out research and making significant advances in areas that are of special interest to Ontario, from energy to genetic engineering, from computer applications to fusion technology, from medical equipment and technology to flexible manufacturing and membrane technology.

Furthermore, a close link with the NRC would provide us with an excellent window on national and international research and development. A provincial technology centre on the Montreal Road campus of the NRC would place this province at the centre of the action in research and development. Such a centre would permit the ready transfer of NRC technology to our centres, industries or entrepreneurs.

In addition, such a centre could serve as a mechanism whereby we would be able to co-ordinate our research efforts with those of the NRC and other agencies in those areas of special interest to the province or of special significance to other industries.

The NRC is there to be used and wants to be used. In my opinion, we are not currently making use of this agency to the extent that we could. I would therefore strongly urge the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker) to immediately take up with the NRC the establishment of a centre of the type proposed. We cannot afford to wait.

The NRC is anxious to see that its technologies are made available to Canadian industries and that industrial problems are referred back to its laboratories for solutions. It seems to me the least we could do in the interest of our economy would be to work with the council to achieve that goal. It would cost us very little and the returns could be potentially great indeed. It seems to me that such a centre would be more than worth the investment.

Above all, I believe that if we are fully to realize our research potential and get the best return for our investment, it is essential that an effective liaison be established to ensure that national and provincial research and development efforts are co-ordinated. It would be a waste of resources to have all these centres busy reinventing the wheel or unnecessarily duplicating each other's research and development programs.

For instance, we have a number of computer-aided design/computer-aided manufacturing centres sprouting up hither, thither and yon, and something must be done to ensure that the efforts of these various agencies are co-ordinated. We are too small a country to be able to afford that type of waste.

In the throne speech the government suggests it will act to ensure that a skilled and appropriately trained labour force is available to Ontario industry. Obviously a priority will be the creation of a labour pool capable of performing in a high-technology environment. We must then invest in people as well as in technology.

In 1980, the microelectronics task force report stated: "The government has a positive role to play in the provision of the supply of highly skilled personnel." It also noted: "The government should be actively involved with labour and industry in creating training and retraining programs for workers." In the coming months, I look for our efforts in this area to be expanded.

Looking to the long term, we must ensure that part of this effort is concentrated on our universities. In Ontario we have some excellent universities. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say some of our professional and technical schools and departments are world class. In the future we must do what we can to maintain this standard and to bring more of our institutions up to it by providing the resources necessary to help them improve upon their already fine performance.

3:30 p.m.

As part of this effort, we also must encourage more of our young people to pursue careers in scientific and engineering disciplines. It will not be enough, however, for this government to limit its efforts and programs to the provision of a skilled labour pool. We must also be prepared to deal responsibly and effectively with one of the negative consequences, at least in the short run, of industrial high technology, the loss of some traditional job opportunities in our industries. While high technology will create new jobs requiring new skills, it is also possible that it will lead to the creation of a new type of structural unemployment in our society.

To address this problem in the short term, this government must put in place programs to support the displaced worker. In the long term, we must be prepared to look at and seriously consider more novel solutions, such as concentration on labour-intensive as opposed to labour-saving technologies, or reduction in the working hours of the individual worker.

In the throne speech, the government notes that it will work to increase innovation in all sectors of our economy. At present, apart from the research being done by government laboratories, the most innovative and original research in the province is done by the universities and by industry. The government, through the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development, already supports research in both these sectors.

BILD and the University of Toronto, for example, have set up the Institute for Hydrogen and Electrochemical Systems. It is interesting to note that the National Research Council is also involved in hydrogen research. This serves to underline the importance of close liaison in our research sector.

In the private sector, BILD funds a high-technology financing program through the Ontario Development Corp. We would realize a better return on these investments if we co-ordinated the research activities in these two sectors—industry and universities. Certainly the desire is there on the part of industry and universities for a greater degree of structured interaction.

In a recent address, the president of the University of Western Ontario said he envisioned greater interaction among communities of scientists in the future, including scientists in industry. Dr. Connell stated this interaction should be arranged by the university administration or even a higher authority.

On the industry side, the Canadian Council of Professional Engineers has called for closer industry and university liaison to overcome what it refers to as the two solitudes. This type of interaction would result in the better use of available technical manpower and equipment to the benefit of both industry and the universities.

Our Innovation Development for Employment Advancement Corp. will supposedly serve as a technology broker among private, public and university research sectors. Although I am not sure if this broker role will involve the IDEA Corp. in direct organizational work, I think this is one area where we as a government could and should do more. For example, we could develop a provincial program similar to the federal industrial fellowship program. Under this program, qualified university staff would be able to spend a year in industry and become familiar with its production problems and research needs. This would not only help to direct university research towards industry's needs, but also might help motivate students to conduct research in the same area. Thus, this program could contribute, even if only indirectly, to the creation of the scientific expertise we will require to remain competitive.

In addition, we could use this program to encourage practising professional engineers and research scientists working in industry to teach in our universities. Again, this would provide an opportunity to improve communication, enhance interaction and interest students in the area of industrial research. An exchange and fellowship program supported by this government could be complemented by a special scholarship fund for graduate students in engineering and the sciences. Alternatively, the government could use the student aid program as a mechanism for attracting students into strategic fields of study.

Of course, there is little point in educating and training people to work in high technology if they find no place to work when their training is completed. We must develop our own high technology sector if we want to keep those highly skilled individuals in the province. Canada has too long been known as an exporter of brains.

In the speech from the throne, this government set itself two very ambitious goals: to increase domestic market expansion and to double foreign trade over the next five years. Expanding the domestic market will demand an increase in consumer confidence to the point where people feel it is safe for them to spend some of their savings. We can also increase domestic demand for domestic products by continuing our import substitution and buy-Canadian programs.

We need a significant growth in demand to bring our industries back up to operating capacity and to alleviate our unemployment problems. For real growth, however, we have to look beyond our domestic market to the export market. The Canadian market is simply too small to allow us to rely solely on domestic demand to support our industrial base.

It is apparent the less developed and newly industrialized countries are taking over the mass production industries which used to be the mainstays of the western economies. If we are going to compete with these producers, we run the risk of being constantly undercut. Reliance on resource industries for export revenues will be even more questionable in the future than it was in the past.

International resource commodity markets are always risky and uncertain. Last year our experience with the nickel market showed just how tough the competition can become. Technologically advanced economies are supplementing their export of commodities with the export of expertise. Trading nations such as Japan are beginning to broaden their export bases. The growth area in international trade is the export of techniques, of ways of doing things and making things better.

It will be no mean feat to double our export trade in five years, but it will be worth the effort since any increase in trade will mean more job opportunities for the people of Ontario. In order fully to realize our export potential, in particular I urge the government to support and encourage exports by high technology companies. This could be done through the international marketing and export financing programs under the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development.

In the throne speech, the government announced it will undertake an extensive and serious study of the impact these new technologies will have on our lives. This is a sound idea, and certainly there are enough unknowns about both potential effects and the implications for public policy to make this a valuable project.

3:40 p.m.

Since the government appears to be in favour of serious and extensive studies, there is one that I would like to see made. I would call this study, to give it the proper bureaucratic ring, the Ontario industry technology assessment survey.

This survey would consist of two parts. One part would concentrate on Ontario industries and would involve an evaluation against the world standard of the production technologies and productivity of our industries. This type of information would help us identify our strengths and our weaknesses and where it would be best to invest our scarce resources.

Once we had identified the competitive sectors in our industrial base and the most competitive firms within those sectors, we could undertake a comprehensive market study to determine how the competitiveness and growth potential of these industries could best be exploited.

It has become commonplace when speaking about Canada's economic future at least to allude to our poor record on productivity. If our productivity problem could be solved by the number of newspaper and periodical articles written about it, then ours would have been solved long ago. Unfortunately, that is not the case.

In the throne speech the government says it will attempt to improve our productivity. To assist this government in reaching that goal I suggest that a provincial productivity centre be established.

I am aware that the federal government has indicated its intention to set up a national productivity centre. However, I do not see why that should preclude us from establishing our own. In the first place, the federal government is not known for its speed or its productivity. There is no reason we should wait for them to get organized. It could be a long wait.

Second, productivity is a major problem for manufacturing in Canada. About half, 49 per cent, of the national manufacturing plant is located in Ontario. It seems sensible that there should be one organization dedicated solely to the analysis and discussion of the problems faced by our manufacturers and the possible solutions to those problems. We need a forum in which representatives of Ontario's industries, labour organizations and government can have an ongoing exchange of ideas.

Finally, I must say I was disappointed that the speech from the throne did not announce the creation of a ministry of science and technology. Such a ministry is needed to design, implement and administer a co-ordinated and comprehensive plan for technological development in the province. A ministry of science and technology could co-ordinate the wide range of research activities being carried out by the ministries of this government and by our universities and hospitals.

The ministry could establish and maintain effective liaison with other research agencies at the provincial and national levels. Such a ministry would ensure that the taxpayer of this province would get the maximum return on his high-tech investment dollar. Most important, a ministry of science and technology would serve as a focal point through which new technology could be passed on to Ontario industry and interested entrepreneurs.

I am firmly convinced of the need in Ontario for a ministry of science and technology. Only a line ministry with a mandate focused specifically on this area will be able to do the job which must be done if Ontario is to be competitive in tomorrow's markets. High technology and its impact on our economy is not a momentary thing that will fade away at the end of the decade or at the end of the century. It is a self-perpetuating, evolutionary process that will constantly and continually present us with new challenges and new opportunities.

If we are committed to taking advantage of these new opportunities for the benefit of all Ontarians, we must put in place the infrastructure that will enable us to do so in the most efficient and effective manner. A ministry of science and technology is the essential element in that infrastructure. Only such a ministry would be able to devise, implement and administer the sustained, co-ordinated effort that is required to ensure our industries do not become economic mediocrities in this century.

Ontario has never been a second-best province. There is no reason, given our human and natural resources, why we should be so in the future. Let us not give high technology our second-best effort. If we do, we cheat not only ourselves but also our children. If we are to give our best effort, in my view we can only do so through a ministry solely dedicated to that task. I would respectfully but forcefully urge this government to give serious consideration to the creation of a ministry of science and technology.

In looking at the markets of tomorrow, shaped as they will be by the impact of high technology, I see a world such as that aptly described in Lewis Carroll's Through the Looking-Glass, where the Red Queen said that it is a world in which we will have to run as hard as we can just to stay where we are; if we want to get anywhere, we will have to run twice as hard.

In Ontario, we have the skills, expertise, resources and manpower which will let us run twice as hard, and we must run twice as hard if we are to improve our standard of living. This throne speech demonstrates we are at least in the race. I submit that if we expand some of our programs in the directions I have indicated, our prospects of winning will be improved.

Mr. Ruston: Mr. Speaker, looking through the throne speech, one gets a little disillusioned with the system, as I suppose one would call it. Each year the government comes out with the ideas and generalities of what it thinks should be done in the province.

Some throne speeches spend more time talking about what other governments do or do not do. This one, this year, has not really spent any time on that and has not spent much time on the things the government should be doing. It leaves a great deal to be desired.

This gives a member an opportunity to put in some of his own ideas as to what he would like to see in a throne speech if he were making one. The time of eight days is allotted so people can reply to the speech from the throne under our system in the Legislature.

3:50 p.m.

From looking over parliamentary rules, I know that time limits are allocated in a number of areas of operations of the House, such as bills, the throne speech debate, replies to the budget speech and so on. We have not necessarily done that in the eight-day time allocation. I suppose there is not the interest in it that perhaps some members should take, and that is understandable when one looks at the throne speech, because it really does not get down to the nitty-gritty of the things that should be done. Most people seem to look to the budget speech because that is really where the nuts and bolts are, when it comes to the financial part of government. However, even with regard to the budget which we will be dealing with on May 10, there is not the same kind of anticipation as to whether it will mean that much to the economy.

From looking at the actual budget over the last number of years, it would appear that this government has got itself into what I would call a corner, as far as financing goes. Of course, this government is not the only one. The United States is in the position of having one of the highest deficits it has ever had. The government of Canada is in the same position, and it is too bad that we are mortgaging our grandchildren's future.

It seems to me that at one time it was a common thing for a family to want to assist the grandchildren as they came along. The government seems to do the opposite. They appear to want to burden them with the debts of the last two or three decades. In a way, we are really putting an awful burden on our future generations. I suppose to some extent the fault lies in governments thinking the way many individuals thought, which was that there was no end to the inflation cycle and governments could continue to spend and print money without any problems.

With all of these deficits, it comes down to who will pay them and what they will do to the money market. Certainly I am not an expert in money markets, but I have read cursory reports here and there in magazines, newspaper articles, editorials and so forth from our so-called economists.

Economists are like other people who make up our society; they have certain ideas, and if one were to ask 10 economists what to do about the financial structure of our country, I suppose one would get 11 ideas. It is almost like that. I find even those who study books and go to university for five or 10 years and acquire long titles after their names are not really all that smart when it comes to financing. I do not know whether they read so much they get the idea it can be done on paper, but the trouble is, they forget that human beings think differently from what is put down on paper; they live differently and have their own priorities. One of this government's priorities in the last year or two was buying 25 per cent of a large oil company.

One person told me he thought that at the present time the financial structure of Ontario was bordering on a $3-billion deficit. That is more than the total budget at the time the Premier (Mr. Davis) took office in 1971.

The rationale for buying into this company was that one had to have a window on the oil companies to see what the others were doing. Someone said it is similar to a person who has been laid off work for about a year and has saved maybe $1,000; he has two or three children and the future does not look that great for him, but he goes out and borrows money at 15 per cent interest in order to buy a new Cadillac. As far as I can see, the Ontario government did about the same thing when it bought Suncor.

It did not bring any jobs; it did not make one job in Ontario. The federal government had already purchased a window on the oil companies. Of course, a poll was taken at that time and, if I remember correctly, about 60 per cent of the people in Canada felt it was a good idea that the federal government buy an oil company and have a window so they could see just what went on.

In my opinion, it would have been fine if they had bought an oil company in the development area; but as far as I am concerned, I would never have bought out British Petroleum; and I would never even have opened a service station under Petro-Canada. If I had been doing it, it would have been a window in the door of the processing and development end of it; but then I would have put my oil and gas up for sale, and if you wanted to buy it you would bring a truck in and buy it and we would sell it. That is the ideal situation that the government should be in, it seems to me, not in the everyday servicing of cars and so forth.

I know that the New Democratic Party thinks this is a great idea. They want to run all the gas stations in Canada and in Ontario.

Mr. Breagh: Just the Petro-Canada stations.

Mr. Ruston: They want to be the ones who hire everybody.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: A little earlier you were telling us a Liberal was a Liberal.

Mr. Ruston: Now, that's an interesting point; and it is like a Conservative being a Conservative, I suppose. I think one of the your NDP friends in Ottawa is—well, I don't know if I should really bring that up. I don't think you would like me to bring up the fact that the NDP were in favour of a lot of social things that you and I would not approve of.

But the interesting one was the Conservative Laura Sabia. She ran for the Conservatives here in Toronto not very long ago, and she thinks it is absolutely ridiculous for us to spend $650 million for a 25 per cent piece of the action in Suncor. She says:

"Thanks a lot, Willie, for adding $325 million to our present provincial debt, making it a whopping $1.3 billion for fiscal '81 with not even an extra barrel of oil added to our supplies or one new job created."

As I think our leader mentioned during question period today, we are paying interest of anywhere from $50 million to $75 million a year just to have that little window. You can buy a lot of jobs for that.

Mr. Breagh: You could buy a whole Petro-Canada station for that.

Mr. Ruston: You could develop it into an awful lot of work. We have so much unemployment. There are a lot of small industries to which we could have lent that money at a low interest rate over a period of five or 10 years. We could have developed many thousands of jobs if it had been made available. That is what we should be doing.

Mr. Boudria: We could build our own window factory.

Mr. Ruston: Now there's another thing. The member for Prescott-Russell says we could build our own window factory. Well, I am not sure we want to do that, but in my area two or three entrepreneurs are starting new window factories and they are doing very well. If the government got into it, I do not think they would do that well.

Mr. Boudria: It would be like the post office.

Mr. Ruston: I think we should be lending the money to these small entrepreneurs and small industries, many of which are already developed. They just need the financing to put themselves into the new technologies that we are going to require for the next 10 or 20 years. For instance, we could lend them money that we are giving under the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development program. We gave $3 million to the H. J. Heinz Co.; and $1.3 million, I believe, to another tomato factory in our area; and that is an outright grant.

I had a fellow call me from one of the small tomato plants in our area. He said he had run his place for 11 years and up to the present he has had no need of assistance, but he thinks he should perhaps apply for some if they are going to start giving away money. His idea is not to give away the money but to give him a loan, perhaps in the first year with no interest or a very low interest rate, and as the years go on and the business picks up they could increase the interest rate over a cycle of 10 years until it was paid off. That is what I call recycling money; that would help considerably.

It is similar to what the member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. Riddell) said about tile drainage loans. The Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Timbrell) will get up with the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) when he makes his report to say the government is going to give $20 million or $30 million for tile loans. But it is really not that amount, because he is putting it out in loans and it is coming back every year in payments, so he is recycling that money. He is not putting in $30 million or $40 million of new money every year, but it sounds as if he is. The minister likes to make it sound great.

Our agriculture critic, who is well versed on this matter, brings that to the minister's attention quite often when he starts to say the government is doing so much. They are really overstating it completely and trying to bamboozle the farmers into thinking they are doing a lot for them when really it is very little. If one looks at the total agriculture budget in Ontario it is only about one per cent or 1.5 per cent of the total budget, so it is very minimal. I see a figure popping up there of 1.1 per cent.

One of the things that concerns me is something a neighbour brought to my attention a couple of times. People who never come into this place sometimes have a different view from us. We do not always think about the real things we should be doing. Perhaps it is because we have to sit here listening to all the bamboozling that goes on by the government with all its fancy advertising, etc. They spend $30 million or $40 million a year trying to tell everybody what great fellows they are. I am thinking about the plans for house building. Just lately the federal government put out a grant of $3,000 to buy a home, and it was not long ago that Ontario had a grant of $1,500, back in 1975. I have a son who used that. I helped him move for two days so he could get in a day before the time for getting the grant ran out, and it helped some.

It really seems to me what we should be doing, especially at a time like this, now that we have interest rates coming down to a more sensible level, is taking that $3,000 or whatever—the province had a grant of $5,000 that it was lending over a period of 10 years and then the borrowers had to start paying interest on it—to guarantee an interest rate that goes along with inflation or something similar to that.

In other words, today if we could take a person who was buying a home for $50,000, $60,000 or $70,000 and give him a mortgage for 75 per cent of that and the mortgage rate would be at today's rate for three years, somewhere around 11.5 per cent, we could guarantee that mortgage for 15 years at 11.5 or the equivalent if inflation were to go over a certain figure. Then if his wages went up he could afford to pay a quarter or a half per cent higher interest every two years, or whatever the case may be depending on inflation.

Instead of giving a grant to buy, if we used that money to guarantee a fair interest rate over the next 15 or 20 years I think it would encourage the purchase of houses even more than giving a grant. People like a little security when they sign their name on a $50,000 mortgage. If they do not know what the interest rates will be in two years, it can be pretty devastating.

I could also talk about debts. There are people today, and I suppose they are economists, predicting that the interest rates could very well be 20 per cent by December 1984 or February 1985, due strictly to the high deficits of the United States government. That is worrisome. I read that in one financial paper which I think is printed in the United States.

I know it is only a prediction, but we can imagine what that would do to someone who had just bought a house in the Toronto area, where they cost $100,000 or $150,000, and got a mortgage for 11.5 per cent. Two years ago, when we had mortgage interest rates going up to 18 or 19 per cent, it was devastating. We cannot stand that. It is not bearable by anyone. I do not think any government can allow that to happen again, because that type of interest rate is unbearable.

We need some written guarantee. I read in some articles prior to the bringing down of the new budget in Ottawa that they were planning some kind of mortgage insurance, but to this time I have not seen anything from the federal government on that matter so it is something we should be getting into here in Ontario.

It seems to me that in slow economic times we should be looking into the methods and systems of handling sanitary landfill sites. We are wasting a lot of time. We should be getting people involved in researching and developing that. There are different systems now. They are sorting out garbage and using incinerators.

I had an opportunity to read some articles about a number of places in the United States. There is a heavily populated area in Florida where my retired brother spent some time this winter. They opened a new incinerator in January in the fastest growing area in Florida, Pinellas county. They have had a terrible time down there in the last 10 or 15 years trying to get rid of their garbage. It is going to take about 75 per cent of their total garbage.

When filling a landfill site, the specifications that have been given at some of the meetings I have been at are that they can reduce the total going into a landfill site by about 75 to 85 per cent.

In my own area, Essex county is pretty flat country. When one drives down Highway 401 and gets within about 12 miles of Windsor, in the township of Maidstone, which I had the pleasure and honour to represent for about eight years as a reeve and councillor, they now have a sanitary landfill site. We used to call it a garbage dump when I was on the council. We had a small one and we had lots of problems just looking after the local municipality. Then the city of Windsor and the county of Essex made landfill areas and they now have three of them in Essex county.

They call them sanitary landfill sites. It sounds nice. At one time when people were poor they would call it going on relief. They changed it to welfare and now they call it social services. It is great stuff. All these people from university get all these nice words and it makes people feel good. I often wonder what they do at university. I would like to find out some day. It makes me wonder sometimes. They get all these fancy words that make people feel good, but I do not think it really helps much.

A sanitary landfill site looks like a big mountain when one is driving down Highway 401. People are not used to seeing little mountains and hills in Essex county and they wonder what is going on. They will call up to ask, "What is that over there?" I say: "They are piling up the garbage for future generations. They may ski off it some day. They might play golf up there." I do not know whether that would be any good, but they are talking about all those things. It is great stuff.

I attended a public meeting not long ago in the civic centre in Essex. The county of Essex is doing something about it. The city of Windsor wanted to buy more land there and the county turned down the application for the land to be sold to Windsor for a sanitary landfill site. They already have 200 acres and they wanted to buy another 100, because at the rate they are going the 200 acres will be covered within about 10 years. I figure within 25 years, at the rate they are going now, they will have a hill from Highway 401 right down almost to Lake St. Clair. That is just not right. I do not think we should be damaging our future in that way. We have to have other systems.

I can assure members that the 250 people at this public meeting were totally in favour of having proper systems put in. Incinerators could be put in and perhaps the steam could be used; proper sorting systems would be used so that glass and metal could be sorted out. In this way we could take care of these things in the future as they are in many countries in Europe, I understand, and in some of the cities in the United States.

That is something we definitely have to look at. It should be done now. We have the manpower, we have the universities and we have the people who can do the testing. The government keeps talking about doing this and doing that and says it has money available for that. I think the initiative has to come from the province, because for each local, regional or county government to get involved in this it is going to take a lot of money to set it up. After it has been set up and is operating, I think people will be prepared to pay for it.

At the meeting I held, people asked what it would cost to have it dumped in and taken care of. At present it is costing about $5 a ton; they mentioned $20 a ton. Of all the people at the meeting, there was not one person who objected to paying for that to get rid of the mess. That is something that has to be done as quickly as possible.

There are one or two other things I would like to mention. One matter concerns the unemployment we have. We have make-work projects, and I will give the government credit for its co-operation with the federal government on the new employment expansion and development program, but again there is still a fair amount of criticism as to how that actually operates.

My understanding is that a person has to be off unemployment insurance benefits completely or on welfare to get a job in the NEED program. Of course, when one starts on a big project one has to call for tenders. Many companies employ a staff of 20 or 25 people, who may be laid off; but if they have not been laid off and are not collecting unemployment insurance, these companies cannot use these people for a lot of those jobs. There have been some problems getting that sorted out. It is not working as well as it should.

It seems to me we should be getting into some real projects that are doing things we need. In the city of Windsor, for example, there has been talk about building a chronic care hospital. The Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) keeps saying: "You have been recommended for a chronic care hospital. It's in the program, but we do not know which year, 1984, 1990 or when." It seems to me this would be an ideal time to go ahead and build a chronic care hospital.

We have to look at the overall good of the country and the province and of the people in the area. When we are talking about needs and helping people to get off welfare and get work, we should be doing something the community can use. In the city of Windsor and the county of Essex—I do not have any hospitals in my own riding, and that is fine; we use the facilities in Windsor—I suppose 80 per cent of the people use the Windsor facilities, while the rest use some in Chatham and some in Leamington.

In Windsor there is a great need for a chronic care hospital, because the waiting lists in some of those hospitals are just terrible. We need more nursing home beds as well, but we really need a new chronic care hospital. Chronic care beds have been transferred into every one of the hospitals, and there may be 20, 30 or 50 in each one.

The Riverview Hospital in Windsor provided very good care for its chronic care patients. It is an old building and needs replacing, but the care was excellent there. I have had relatives in there who really came along well. They had proper therapy for them. The staff there was trained to look after elderly people and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, you just could not get better care. But now that we have moved them all around I do not think any one hospital can really do that so well.

This would be the time to build it. I am sure when we are putting tenders out now for jobs, for buildings or whatever it is, whether it is constructing watermains, sewer lines, it is a very competitive time to have that done now and we could have a 250-bed chronic care hospital built there in 18 months if they really wanted to go ahead.

They have the plans pretty well ready and it would really solve a very serious problem in the city of Windsor in the future, because Essex county has a very high percentage of people over 60 or 65 years of age. We live in the sun parlour, as we call it—and although we get a few snow flurries there are not that many, not every year anyway—so we have a larger percentage of the ageing population in that area.

I would like to mention Ontario Hydro. Hydro has lost perspective of what it was really supposed to be: a utility for the people of Ontario. Where it went astray I am not sure. I am not sure if it is not the fault of the government or the Premier (Mr. Davis), or those he appointed into that little senate he has under the chairman of Hydro. He keeps moving his friends in there and we call these positions the senate in Ontario.

Ontario Hydro closed its plant in Windsor, the J. Clark Keith generating plant, a coal-fired plant. They closed it about six or seven years ago and mothballed it. Then they decided to open it up and take the mothballs out and they got a contract to sell hydro to the United States. Now the United States has cancelled that contract, or the contract ran out as of this year, and the old J. Clark Keith plant is going to be mothballed again.

They just do not seem to know what they are doing. They are able to generate about 50 per cent surplus hydro for what the requirements are for Ontario, and I think if anybody runs more than 25 per cent surplus in anything they are doing they are in deep trouble.

I can recall a few years ago when Chrysler just did not have the supervision or management or whatever. Not long ago they made thousands of cars and rented hundreds of acres to store them in. They said: "The cars are going to sell. We will just make them. Do not worry." They had to tow the cars out of the mud with tractors when they finally did sell them some place, through fleets and so on. They lost millions of dollars because they made them and did not have a sale for them.

Hydro has built more hydro plants than we will ever need for the next 25 years at least. To build a nuclear plant it takes about 10 to 12 years from the time they start until they are ready for production and then sometimes they have problems with them. Hydro has put the province into terrible debt because of this. Ontario Hydro now has a $15-billion debt and when you pay your hydro bill, Mr. Speaker—mine is around $45 a month—about 42 per cent of it goes to paying off the debt. That is an awful percentage to be paying on the debt of a utility company. It just shows the mismanagement over the past 10 to 20 years that has caused it to be in this position.

This is a burden on the people of Ontario. This is a mortgage on our backs that we and our children have to carry on over the future and pay off at some time, and no one is to blame but Ontario Hydro and the government of Ontario under this Premier, because since he has been here he has never thought it necessary to pay the bills as they go. He always figured, "Let somebody else pay them," and that is the way he has run the province as Premier since 1971.

I suppose a person could go on about the many things left out that should be in the throne speech and the things that we could do, but we have covered a number of the things that we feel are important. I have mentioned tile drainage and the way the government comes out with its announcements.

One of the best improvements for land is tile drainage. I know there are farms in Essex county and in my own family holdings of which some parts have never been tiled, partly because of the heavy clay soil. That heavy clay soil will work with tile and it saves erosion too. If one does not use tile the runoff causes some erosion of the land. That is a liability this property should not have.

The government raised the interest on tile drainage loans to 10 per cent two years ago. I asked the minister a question a week ago Friday about when he was going to lower the interest rates due to the lower prime rates now and so forth. He said he would be making an announcement on it in a few days. Last week he announced he had lowered it to eight per cent.

He still did not bring up the percentage he is paying. He left it at 60 per cent. A few years ago, 75 per cent of the total cost was included in that loan, but now it is only 60 per cent. At least he did go halfway and lowered the interest rate to eight per cent.

That did not cost him all that much because of the prime rate being what it is. I would hope that when the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) brings down his budget a week from Tuesday he will have considerably more money in it for the farm tile drainage system, because that is one of the areas where farmers can improve their production from 25 to 50 per cent or more; that is an area the farmers can use, and it improves the land.

That system is far better than the government giving a farmer a grant for a year just because he is a good fellow or he is a little short of money. Give him something to improve his production ability. Of course, we do need stabilization in the prices. This has been a good part of the problem this year. In the last three months the price of soybeans and corn has gone up almost a dollar a bushel, due mostly to the announcement in the United States that they are taking a lot of land out of production to try to avoid the high surpluses of corn and soybeans in the world now.

That is a very important matter, and if the farmer had this money available to tile his land, it would give him the opportunity for higher production and in that way he would be able to survive without government handouts.

I have covered all the things I wanted to. It is a little more interesting when one can deal with the budget because that is the nuts and bolts of it, the money part of it. The member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) just came in. I told him I would be speaking until around 4:25 or 4:30. I am disappointed. I know he wanted to hear my speech.

He is a very highly respected member of the Legislature. He has been here since 1963. I have had the honour to sit on a number of committees with him and hear his legal expertise and I have had a great deal of respect for his thoughts on many occasions. However, I do not agree with all his philosophy that he may spout each day. I am sorry he missed my speech, but I will look forward to listening to his tomorrow.

Mr. Renwick: I will read it.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, it is on days like this, when the weather is grey and rough outside, when the House is barely 20 per cent filled—to be generous—and when the newspapers are out, the correspondence is being written and the conversations are taking place that we all participate in all the time—

Mr. T. P. Reid: We are all starting to nod off.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Yes, there is some nodding off that takes place. It is on days like this that I sometimes get a little depressed about the relevancy of this august institution we have here.

I wonder who out there actually knows what we are discussing a lot of the time. Half the time I am not sure that all our own members here care very much about it. It is hard sometimes to get yourself up and enthusiastic for a speech when you know you are going to be looking at perhaps 21 or 22 members in the House out of 125 and nobody in the galleries except for the odd masochist who happens to have drifted in without realizing where he or she is.

It is also the case that I often feel—and I do not know about other members—

Mr. McClellan: Make some comments about Elgie's section.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I must say that the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Elgie) seems a little isolated over there today.

Mr. McClellan: No more than usual.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: No, no more than his usual position in cabinet meetings, from what I hear. But I am a little disappointed to see not even the back-benchers there to support the red Tories in the caucus.

I cannot help but feel—and I mean this seriously and not whimsically—a little depressed these days about our position here, especially as an opposition member.

I remember the first time I sat in this chamber, in the last chair in the House at that point when there were by-elections in Scarborough West four years ago and a little bit. I started looking around and I thought: "You know, it is interesting. Everybody here has a role to play, like a little chamber theatre group where we all play our little part. We are all identifiable. They know us by our various categories." In fact, we get listed by the Toronto Sun, for instance, at the end of each year: who was the most eloquent, who was the funniest, who was the most irrelevant—and that is often the hardest one to choose, I think. We all have our little positions.

Mr. T. P. Reid: You are going to be at least a runner-up at the rate you are going.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: I am not sure. I find, especially because we are in a majority situation, that there is a kind of automatic tyranny of the majority—that reality of March 19—which must take place in the ordering of business: the power of that majority always to maintain very strict control of the House.

We often feel we have no power here; we have no ability on this side of the House to get across a view that will have any major impact on the other side in any real way; that no matter how good one's question is that day, it is so easily just pushed aside—"I will refer it to the minister when he comes back from Switzerland" or "I have no comment at this point; I will get back to you"—or they come back in a partisan attack and the whole thing gets lost. The one question that gets picked up by the cameras that day is all that comes out of this place; it is all the people know about it.

Here we are at a time, in my view, when there are some really profound questions about the political morality of our governments today and about the relevancy of this whole body and its real effectiveness in touching people on the outside. I am burning with an anger that I think, if I might say so, is a little deeper and more depressing than the outrage that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson) was feeling about the doctors recently. It just makes me feel like getting up here today and yelling and screaming at the other side to listen to what is going on out there and to look at the abject failure of our government in real moral terms before the people of Canada. I am attacking both the federal government and this provincial government when I say so.

4:30 p.m.

I believe this government is morally bankrupt if it does not face the real issue of unemployment, meet it head on and accept the fact that it has failed up to now but that it must deal with the problem now and cannot avoid it now. I cannot believe what the federal government decided it would do in terms of approaching this serious crisis, the trickle-down notion it has come forward with.

I also cannot help but believe that our government must be inept, that it has got by for 40 years here because we have been so affluent and because the whole nature of our economy has been Ontario-based. In that affluence we have benefited; anybody at all could have run this province.

But when times get tough, this government really does not know what to do. It sits back there and responds to pressures when it feels they are getting a little high. It looks at the polls to see where the people want it to go and it follows those polls. But it has shown no leadership, no desire to react.

There are tremendous tragedies that are going on out there in our society today in Ontario. For that, I condemn this government in the harshest terms.

There is a tendency on this side of the House, because the Conservatives have been over there for so damned long, for us to start to look at ourselves as perennially in opposition and to say: "You know, they really are not so bad. Things in Ontario are not really that bad and if we keep pushing on the pressure, they will make changes." There is almost a desire that we be in opposition forever.

But, by God, watching the government's performance in the past number of years, when it has been needed most in terms of helping the people of Ontario, it has failed so abjectly that we must not persist in that tendency. These people have to be thrown out.

The government has been successful in defusing politics in this province and we have been unsuccessful on this side in politicizing things and polarizing issues. Mr. Speaker, look at the fact that only 58 per cent of the people bothered to come out and vote last time. The government has a huge majority with only 25 per cent of the possible voters supporting it. It has neatly made it seem as if there is no politics in Ontario; that there is no major disagreement about the way this province should be run, all it is is a question of management.

When we get up and we are outraged about something, with the kind of righteous indignation that the third party has been traditionally known for, the government always says it is concerned too. "I am just as concerned as you are," we hear from across the way; but the government will be judged by its acts. I suggest that in being judged by its acts now, it is found to be very wanting indeed.

In my view, the government has institutionalized poverty in this province. It has condemned hundreds of thousands of people to live in poverty, and it is unwilling to do anything about it; its record over the past couple of years shows that.

Along with the federal government, this government is now saying that maybe 10 per cent of the people in this province should be without work for the next number of years, that this is something we are just going to have to put up with. The rest of us will manage in this lovely trickle-down recovery we are going through, but those people will have to suffer along.

Now King Billy of Brampton wants to run off to another sphere of influence. I say, "Go; please go." Having overseen from the provincial perspective the deinstitutionalization of this province, maybe he should go to the federal level. Believe me, he will not have success there; he is going to be exposed for what he has done here.

Let us look at poverty for a second. The gap between the rich and the poor has been increasing in this province. We have a minimum wage of $3.50 an hour, $140 a week. Only Newfoundland has a minimum wage lower than Ontario's—Ontario, the industrialized province; Ontario, the largest province in the country and the strongest in economic terms. That should be seen as a crime.

A Minister of Labour who can stand up and say that is not a crucial thing to overcome immediately—and this was last year—and does not move to increase that minimum wage substantially and to index that minimum wage to make sure it continues to increase with the cost of living is a Minister of Labour who is not fit to sit in his chair. Those are very harsh words, not the kind of niceties or playfulness we normally go through even when we are making attacks on the government, but I believe that fundamentally.

In the past year we increased the welfare rate by five per cent. Those people on welfare have not had an increase in 18 months, and in that time the cost of living has gone up by 26 per cent. The minimum wage did not increase in more than a year, but at the same time we in this House voted ourselves a five per cent increase, thinking that somehow should be accepted as equitable. We all know that is approximately the equivalent of what some of these people are living on for an entire year.

If one takes a look at what was given to the doctors in our society in the past 12 months while we have let these people live on $3,000 per year income, one finds we gave the doctors an increase of approximately $12,000 last year; out of the public purse essentially, through the Ontario health insurance plan. It is an interesting notion that at the same time as we have no money for the poor, we have hundreds of thousands of dollars for 14,000 already very privileged individuals in our society.

The balance of $52 million that went into all the programs for income maintenance in this province, compared with more than $200 million going to 14,000 doctors, is not something that should be forgotten and is in my view fundamentally immoral.

I am not questioning the right of doctors to be well valued and well paid in our society, but surely a government that in this kind of recession and crunch is assisting that broadening of the gap between rich and poor is a government that is out of touch with the basic moral precepts that any government should be functioning under in a democracy.

I believe what we have seen is a reinforcement of the class structure in this province in the past number of years as we have never seen before. We have even reinforced it through the tax system. Last year, instead of increasing the progressive income taxes, this government decided it would add to the sales tax and to the OHIP premiums, which affect poor people much more than they affect the wealthy; and it got away with it.

It is nuts to do that. The government has taken the position of bashing its provincial employees instead of helping those in the private sector get back to work. It has decided that punishing the one is better than assisting the other. At the same time that the government has been bashing labour in political terms in this House for being too greedy—at a time when any of the statistics will show that they have not been too greedy in terms of the things they have been asking for—it would not bring in legislation to help in first contracts, which would have helped many people at a lower income level, such as the women at Irwin Toy who receive just slightly more than the minimum wage.

It has done nothing to bring in anti-scab legislation, which again would give some kind of power to people at the bottom of the scale to fight for their rights. The government has done nothing to stop contracting out, which I mentioned the other day and which is destroying the capacity of nursing aides in this province, for instance, to earn an adequate living. The government has done nothing to bring in a justification process for plant closures. All of these are the sorts of things that could reinforce the working people in this province.

The government's major flaw has been in its failure to provide work, its failure to meet what is surely one of its major ethical responsibilities: to make sure that people in this society who wish to work and who are capable of work can get the gratification and financial remuneration from working. It is the failure on the part of the members opposite, as a government, to ensure that this has taken place, for which it should most assuredly be condemned and to which I address my remarks now in terms of its responsibilities—not as outlined in the vacuous throne speech we have received, which touches nothing of any seriousness, but in terms of the need for a budget that will directly assist people who are in desperate need now of that kind of work.

In a society like ours, which takes personal, physical violence very seriously, we are hypocritical not to look at the kind of structured and accepted unemployment we have, which is just as violent an act against hundreds of thousands of people. This is perpetrated on them by the people who control the means of production in Ontario; and those people are the government, which could put large amounts of money into assisting the poor to allow them to get work.

What we get a lot of talk about is the need to start looking at work-sharing, a shorter work week and all those kinds of things about the notion of the use of leisure. It would be great for those of us who have jobs. In some ways it is already being used by many people who have jobs in the political sphere at this point. But it is of no use at all to those people who are on forced leisure at the moment without any of the sense of self-worth one should get from one's working conditions.

If there were any leadership in this province, we would not talk about the fact that during the recovery a bunch of us are going to do very well and 10 per cent are not going to do well. There would be a systematic plan to make sure that there was an equitable sharing in the recovery and that those who are most severely hurt would be helped the most. Those of us who are already doing quite well, thank you very much, would be given less help and would be asked to pay more of our share.

I have said about as much as I want to say on my own. As part of my frustration with this place and the incapacity to get word out about what some of the real issues are, I have done a number of things in an extraparliamentary fashion to try to attract attention to issues that are of major concern to me.

One of the things I did recently was to place an advertisement in a number of papers in Ontario asking people who were unemployed to write to me about what it was like so I could help them express themselves and be a voice for them to the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) when he came forward with the budget. I thought that might have more of an influence on him than it obviously had on the federal Minister of Finance.

I have received some coverage for that. The issue has had a bit more talk in the press than it otherwise would have had. I have also done something else. I replied to those people who wrote to me and asked them to write to me a month afterwards to tell me their situation. I again promised them I would read their words into the record of this Legislature.

These people come from all over the province. The members will notice that, because in many cases I will be able to use their names and tell where they were from. No area of this province is immune. None of these people has been identified before in the press. These are all new people who are willing to talk. They want to have their stories told.

The group of letters I have with me today is a small portion. I have received more than 200 replies. In the second group of letters, something like 80 per cent of the people said they were willing to have their names used. It was quite extraordinary.

Six to eight people out of the 200 have received jobs in the month since I talked to them. There was great rejoicing over that in my office. It was like knowing friends of ours were somehow going to get burdens lifted off them. For Vicki Warren it was only a six-month job planting trees. I will say to the member for Renfrew North (Mr. Conway) that Vicki is from Renfrew. For somebody else, it was just a six-month contract doing some editing. Still, it brought to those people hope they had not had before, and we were very pleased to see it. But six to eight is not many when one considers all the work that is supposedly being done out there at the moment in job creation, which we are being told by both the provincial and federal levels of government is so successful.

Before I read some of the letters, I want to say that apart from the letters from people who allowed me to use their names, I would like to read from some who have not allowed me to use their names. Of course, I will not refer to them in that fashion. What I want to show the members is how remarkable it is that anybody would even allow a politician to use his or her name, given the cynicism they feel towards us. I also want to show just how hard and humiliating this whole experience is for them.

This is a letter from a woman in Aurora. It is about six pages. It details the difficulties she and her husband have been having. It ends in this fashion:

"If anyone had told us that we would have been in this position five years ago, I would have never believed them. For all of the hardships to endure, one not to be discounted is the humiliation and embarrassment. Keeping up a brave front. Never letting our friends know that we cannot go out with them because we are penniless. Pretending that we like the heat set at 45 degrees, do not need a phone or new dress or car. Therefore, I must ask you withhold my name and address."

This incredible sense of shame people have because they are unable to find work, and the way it affects their relationships with their family and with their friends, is something which I just do not think we can say enough about in terms of why it is so important for this government to react to these individuals.

Here is another: "Here is my letter concerning the work situation in Timmins. It is very bad. There is no work at all. I have been unemployed for 13 months as a construction worker. All construction projects for this area have been cancelled. Any government work projects will be given to students. We come second. Please wake up the government. Tell them that married men with young children want to work, not have handouts."

One from Toronto: "My unemployment ran out quite a long time ago. Then I had the chance to get a log truck, but I had to get a loan from the bank. Of course, when I bought the log truck there was lots of work. But things went sour. No one was doing any building; so no one needed lumber. Therefore, the mills did not need any logs. Now the bank has the truck."

"In the small town north of here where I was working with the truck I was also buying a house. After I lost the truck I was able to keep the house by doing part-time work in a garage. But then I got laid off from there in September and lost the house."

"I am looking for work in a garage as an apprentice mechanic as I have worked in garages for most of my working life, but I will take any kind of work right now. I am living on welfare right now, or at least existing."

This one from Stoney Creek: "Since coming to this country in 1966, I was continuously employed until August of last year, when I was laid off. I then applied for UIC benefits for the first time in my life. Although I have contributed fully to the UIC scheme over the years, and although I am able and willing to work, I have not received a penny in UIC benefits. Since August I have supported my family from my savings. Some welfare state."

"At the age of 51 I find myself without a job, with no prospect of finding one in the foreseeable future, and without any form of government support, despite the high levels of taxation that I have been obliged to pay for many years. A swift descent into poverty seems to await me if I remain in Canada. The moral would appear obvious."

The last paragraph is very angry and I will not read it, because I have some others later that will express it in even more articulate terms than this gentleman was able to do.

"I have been unemployed for two years," writes a young man from Welland, "since I graduated from high school in 1981. I have been going to every possible place looking for a job, but it is useless. My father is the only one working in my family. My mother cannot work because she is deaf. I have a sister who is attending high school who is also unemployed. It is becoming harder and harder for my father to support us. I am 20 years old. I should have a job to help out my family. I know you must be hearing this a lot of times, but please give me some advice."

This one is from a woman in Scarborough: "My son, Robert, has been out of work for 16 months. He is a skilled tradesman, a home appliance serviceman. Could you tell him if there will be any work for his trade soon?"

In all these letters there is a real despair and a lack of belief that things could be as they are here in Canada with all the resources we have. These people, as one can tell from the emotion in the letters, are hurting a great deal.

This one is perhaps as poignant as any. It is a very short letter from a fellow who is now living in Kingston. "I went west to find a job. I met a lady. We now have four children, ages six to four months. My unemployment ran out February 5, 1983. I have search for over one year for a job. On February 16, 1983, we separated. I came back home. My wife put my kids in foster care. I here by myself. I miss them and I love them very much."

4:50 p.m.

Here is a letter from Concord: "On May 2 of this year, I will turn 25 and thus not be eligible for youth employment projects; so I will be back on my own. Surely there must exist a job in which a university education will be of benefit."

This one is a little bit longer, but it is an incredibly moving letter from Toronto: "Where things are so bad that a 24-year-old would ever contemplate ending it all, then we are in a sorer state than we are willing to admit.

"No, my head is screwed on right, thanks. I am not crazy for thinking to kill myself. I am probably one of the most well-adjusted, down-to-earth people I know. This crap about people who think suicide is for neurotics or loonies is exactly that: crap. When a man who is strong and healthy has to go to the Salvation Army for a $7 food voucher because towards the end of the month he feels dizzy from a lack of food, well."

I will skip a paragraph. "Allow me to be blunt for a moment. I even know a couple of young guys who sell their bodies for money and feel lucky because they do not have to claim it to welfare." This probably goes beyond the bounds of good taste, Mr. Speaker, and I will not go on because of the presence of the pages. He ends up by saying, "So you see, they are worse off than myself when they do not even care about their own physical being."

When we consider that this is a person who is considering suicide and talks about friends who have been selling their bodies for money to supplement their inadequate welfare, the last part seems a little strange in comparison.

"Now I come to the real depressing part. I have a front tooth that is in desperate need of repair or I will lose it, and one or two more. Welfare allows you $75 a year for a dentist, which I used $68 of in May of last year; so I cannot even get any dental work done for at least a month and I know it will be more than $75. So what can I do? Can you even imagine what a 24-year-old will look like with a front tooth missing? I am sure it will depress me to the point I will never be able to get a job and doubt I would anyway. Who wants a toothless employee where you work with the public?"

This is the state we have brought a 24-year-old to in this country, because of a lack of willingness to understand that it is important to put money into job creation for these people. It is important not just to say we are going to put money in but also to increase the deficit to do it and not to hide behind the fact that this is necessary. What is more important, that we increase the deficit and cause ourselves some credit rating crumbling perhaps, or that we leave people in this province feeling as if there is nothing here for them at all? For a government with any moral strength at all, the choice would be clear.

This is a letter from Jim Burkitt from Belleville. It raises some of the problems he has in believing that anything is going to be done.

"In this age of enlightened self-interest, I do not suppose we can expect a great deal of support from the people that have made it. This is not disillusionment particularly, just disappointment, more acrid by the insularity of our modern lives. We are all entangled by the degree of circumstance in human relations. The pain of dull despair and of boredom or wasted possibilities and talents has to be experienced in order for it to be very personal."

What I am trying to do is to make us all experience that today and hope the message gets through to this government before it is too late for these people. I just do not believe it is possible that we can accept the notion that we should have this kind of unemployment for the next four to five years and that the government is suggesting people should be going through this for that length of time.

A startling array of people have written. There is a letter from Doris Alleyne of Waterloo. Her husband, an assistant professor of social anthropology, lost his job in 1979. She says: "I managed to get a job in Zellers department store in Waterloo and when the store closed last July, I lost my job. I was laid off on June 30 and have not been able to find work since, although I have tried hard."

"I saw my husband's morale sink deeper and deeper during his two-year job search. Then he could not take it any longer and in September 1981, he left for Trinidad, (where he was born) hoping to find work there. It was not easy for him to adjust to living conditions there, since he has spent most of his life in Canada. He finally managed to get a part-time teaching position, but the cost of living in Trinidad is very high and it was almost impossible for him to send enough money to provide the bare minimum to his family."

"For the past few years, we have lived on less than half of what is considered the poverty line. We have two sons. One has just turned 16 and the other is 20 years of age. I cannot leave Canada to join my husband, because my 16-year-old is in high school and there is no way he could fit into the Trinidad school system."

"Also, we all consider Canada our home and love this country. I think the fact I am here in our home gives my husband the feeling that Canada is not lost to him. In other words, there is a place to come home to."

"My husband has a PhD and is also a very practical person who can handle many different jobs. Can you honestly tell me there is no job in this country for a man like him?"

What an incredible, horrible irony that somebody has to go to what is called an underdeveloped country to get work because he cannot find the proper employment here in this country.

A letter from Hamilton, from Ellis Browning. It is to do with the kinds of things families have to do to consolidate and stick together. It answers specific questions I had in my letter.

"1. No, I have not yet got a job.

"2. I have not applied for make-work projects. I must confess it is something about which I know nothing about. I would be pleased for details.

"3. I mentioned in my previous letter that Brian Charlton was supporting an application for rehousing. This has gone ahead rapidly and new accommodation had been offered. However, in this short time, further ill luck has befallen the family and my older daughter's husband has become a victim of a layoff. My wife and I feel it is incumbent upon us to help them in whatever manner we can. As they have a spare room available, we have decided to pool resources and move in with them. We are reluctant to do this retrograde thing, but consolidation seems the wiser step in the event, with the hope that the need will be a short term."

From a letter from Heather Yettey of Sudbury, I will just read the postscript.

"Ask Mr. Miller what I say to my little girl when she needs a new baseball glove or money for swimming lessons. All her friends are involved and she cannot, because there is not enough money."

The mother is living on welfare, looking for work.

A letter from Royston Earl in Don Mills, Toronto. He is a person who is unable to receive welfare because of his particular marital status, but to leave that alone:

"I also found out last week through Manpower that because I am not on welfare or unemployment insurance, I am not on the priority list regarding work in the government job creation programs which I have inquired into.

"I asked a Manpower counsellor if I existed at all. 'Oh, yes, you are class two,' was the answer. 'Unfortunately, by the time we come around to class two, the jobs will be taken.'"

This is a man who has been unemployed for three and a half years.

Patricia Wright has a story about one of the course fiascos that are out there all the time now in terms of retraining.

"I received your letter today. Your timing is perfect. I just got off the phone from the Canada Manpower office at 4900 Yonge Street. The call I made was regarding an ad in Sunday's Sun, April 10, for a new program, a food service and bartending course. It starts April 18, 1983, for 20 weeks.

"I phoned to enrol instead of going to 4900 Yonge, because I had no bus fare to get there. When I finally got through to someone, they told me I would have to make an appointment with a counsellor. The earliest appointment she had to offer was May 25, six weeks after the course started. I had no choice but to accept the date."

From a man named Richard Ott of Mississauga, who went for a job interview:

"I had one job interview which I believe is part of the job creation program. I am not sure if I am going to get the job as there were other applicants after the same job. It is only a temporary job for six months, but is better than nothing, because maybe by then it will be easier to obtain a permanent position." This is a typed letter, but by the time he had finished typing it he had to write a postscript. "Mr. Johnston, would you believe that yesterday I was informed that I was too old for the position mentioned herewith? I am 25 years old. The job is for 18-to-24-year-olds; and that is after two interviews, to learn of the age limit."

5 p.m.

Here is somebody from Lambeth with the same kind of problem, talking about her husband: Monica and Russell Clark. She is talking about the course Russell took: "The course he took was sponsored by Canada Manpower and paid for by UIC benefits. In our area the course was taught at Fanshawe College. There were 25 people in his classes. It was to be a co-op course with eight months in school, an eight-month work term, and a final four months in school. However, when the eight-month work term came about, not one person could find a job to go to. As a result, the students were allowed to return to the school to complete the course. The government retraining programs have become a costly farce."

I cannot tell members the number of letters I received saying that sort of thing. I have limited time, so I will skip over some others, not because they are not important, but because I do not have the luxury of being able to read them all to the members, although I would love to. This has been a very depressing experience for me and my staff, and it has really brought home to me the human consequences of the failure in economic policy.

Carmen Leduc, who is now living in Markstay but moved there from Sault Ste. Marie: "My husband and I moved from Sault Ste. Marie when he was still receiving UIC benefits. At that time we could no longer afford the $350 one-room apartment we were renting. We moved to this place, although it was like a barn and used to store junk. We lived in this place and paid rent for some time, without plumbing, carrying the water from my parents. We have made this place livable by putting boards on the cement floor, plastic in the broken windows, and borrowed a small oil space heater to help the wood stove heat this uninsulated shack. Now our landlord tells us that he has someone willing to give him one and a half times the rent we are paying for this place and we are going to be forced to leave even that accommodation." I have a similar letter from Markstay from William Lecky.

Here is a guy named Donald Lauric from Kirkland Lake. This one paragraph strikes home to me in terms of what we are about as a province. "I was born and raised in Kirkland Lake and love to stay here but, if it comes down to it, I may have to sell my house and move somewhere else, perhaps even out of the country, in order to find work. As far as going on welfare, I don't relish the thought; perhaps it is my pride, but it would be my last possible resort."

Then there is a fellow from Thunder Bay who talks about running out of toilet paper and having to go and get some from a local restaurant. Another letter from Thunder Bay comes from Wayne Hutsul: "As for employment, nil. Present economic conditions make it difficult for the shoulder-of-the-road sweeper in search for empty deposit bottles. In fact, I found $10 in empties last weekend which helped to supplement my welfare income of last month of $128."

Judith Foell, who has recently moved to Kitchener from London, talks about the reality of what is out there in terms of jobs: "About 80 per cent of the positions offered on CFPL Channel 10 London pay $3.50 to $4. an hour. One day on this TV station a position was advertised as collections clerk. I phoned and was asked if I had any experience asking or collecting money. Since I did not, they would not consider me. The next day I happened to be at UIC and just for the fun of it I inquired again about the collections clerk position. It turned out it was an escort service. I asked Manpower what I was supposed to collect, money or men. She said it was a type of dating service. I was really ticked off. I am sure you can understand my frustration."

Brian Pattison of Hamilton: "I have been out every morning about 7:30 a.m. to fill applications for different jobs, and I have decided to offer two weeks' free labour or skills to any company that will offer me a chance to join their company."

This is from a woman who left Kingston to move to Ottawa. She is 30 years old, single, university-educated: "When I moved to Ottawa from Kingston in 1980, I was fortunate to find a reasonably priced apartment in an older house in an industrial park in the west end of the city.

"With what I receive from welfare, a single person's stipend of $303 monthly, minus my part-time earnings, and what I get working six to eight hours a week for $3 an hour as a waitress, I have managed to sustain the necessities. I find it a strain though because most of my earnings are deducted from the base figure.

"A single person is allowed to earn $50 extra a month and then 75 cents is subtracted from each succeeding dollar. It seems that the more I work, the more I lose. For instance, in September I was sent a benefit cheque for six cents. If it were not for gratuities, an unstable and unpredictable amount at best, I would not be able to eat on a regular basis. It helps that I work as a waitress as I can eat the leftovers from customers' plates or scrounge in the kitchen as long as the manager does not see."

Michael MacIntosh of Thunder Bay writes, "Just one final note on unemployment benefits: While earning $4 an hour at a ski resort, I now look forward to receiving $87 a week, compliments of unemployment. Could you live on that?"

There is another case. Jack Armstrong from Sudbury also talks about having to subsidize his unemployment insurance benefits with welfare. When we have make-work projects for people with low incomes and expect them to be on a project for some 26 weeks so they can requalify, we have to understand they will be back not only on unemployment, but on welfare as well because the unemployment will not cover them adequately.

Amelia Allidone of St. Catharines is single with three children. "The only difference between my last letter and this is the fact that my frustration continues to grow with every turn-down I receive. It is coming to the point where I will accept any job at any rate as long as I can find steady employment."

These letters go on and on. There are some from people who are obviously incredibly uneducated. Those members who think technological changes in our society are going to make a new nirvana for people must understand there is no place for these people in that technological revolution. We have to find other answers for them.

We must not say these people, a lot of them in their fifties, are going to be going on and off unemployment insurance for the next number of years because of the way the economy is going. We must not say: "That is all there is to it. We cannot do anything." The government must set as its priority the matter of trying to obtain full employment. We cannot accept this notion that eight or 10 per cent unemployment is what we are going to live with. It is unthinkable.

My time is nearly up. I want to read one letter from Toronto which I found very upsetting because it brings in some racist things. It is understandable people want to turn around and lash out at others when they find themselves without. There is a dangerous mood developing out there. Leaving this to brew will cause this society no end of trouble.

He lists the things he has been doing. "Article in Globe and Mail: '371 Jobs Created by Council.' These jobs were for unskilled labour. I was told, 'You do not qualify.' Three: Make-work project involving painting of hostels, etc., 'You do not qualify.' Four: Roman Catholic Archdiocese renovation project, 'Not available.'

"Maybe I should be an immigrant or a refugee or a francophone or some other qualifying minority. Maybe I should not be an adult. Adults do not seem to matter much in today's society. Ontario, Metro Toronto and Ottawa have all undertaken the task of employing youth. Now the federal budget, hah; more jobs for youth and nothing but the proverbial finger for adults.

"As for your question of permission to use my name, please do. My marriage is gone. I no longer have my children. I don't qualify. I am slowly starving to death. I may as well go on the RCMP's hit list as well.

"Regrettably yours, Paul D. Le Poidevin."

What are we doing? What are we breeding in our society when we say these people are to stew like this for the next number of years? If this government had any moral strength or any sense of leadership other than just the image leadership we have seen, we would have had a speech from the throne which would have spoken about that challenge. It would have spoken about the need to put massive amounts of money into job creation, into structural change in our economy so we could get control of it. It would have spoken about a protection of workers' rights in plant closings and of the need for a major stimulation of the housing industry.

It would have said, "We will cause a deficit to do this because it is morally necessary to do this. We cannot put these people on the chopping block just because it is easy to do."

5:10 p.m.

If this government does not react now and bring in a budget that does this, then I would suggest to them that there is going to be open warfare in this House; that all the niceties of the boys' club we have here should be thrown aside, because this should not be a debating society when people are suffering like this; and that any government that sits and lets them suffer and any opposition that does not do everything in its power to make the government react is not worth its salt.

By God, I pledge myself to harass this government like the devil if they do not come through with some major response to the human tragedies that exist in this province today.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I unfortunately cannot be as negative as the honourable member opposite when he made the comment a few moments ago that there is no room in the so-called high-tech area for the uneducated, because just a short couple of weeks ago a representative of a company in Ottawa-Carleton talked to me about a program he currently has going in which he has used such people, brought them into his firm and is working an apprenticeship program. I understand that he intends to try to continue that program.

Mr. Laughren: Is that the general rule out there?

Mr. Mitchell: No, I will grant you it is not a general rule, but the attempt is being made there.

I would like to go on and support, if I may, the comments made by the member for Carleton East (Mr. MacQuarrie), who enunciated his feeling for the need for a ministry of science and technology. Of course, the member for Carleton East and I, coming from Ottawa-Carleton, have seen the gigantic growth of all of those companies in the high-tech field. We see what they have to offer now and what they will have to offer, but also we see what can be there with the proper government support.

I should point out as well that I feel that a ministry of science and technology would perhaps be more directly able to liaise with the education system—and I am obviously speaking of the Ottawa-Carleton area—because companies there have told me they require not the engineers we are so used to seeing but the engineering technologists.

People at the community college level have told me they have a problem meeting that need. The problem is not totally provincial; they themselves have to look very seriously at the courses they offer and see where the demand is. In this regard, the demand for community college positions is growing; it is growing in those areas where the high-tech companies need employees.

Years ago when I was going to school it used to be that when parents were talking among themselves and one would say, "My John is going to university;" the parent whose youngster was going to a community college said so with his head bowed; but that is not the case today.

About a year ago, the area of Ottawa-Carleton, and particularly those high-tech firms in the municipality of Kanata, had an open house over one weekend when most of the firms there opened their doors wide for families to come out. And the interest was there. It was most amazing to see these families walking together among the Mitels, the Spars, the Norpaks and all of these firms that have grown so rapidly in Ottawa-Carleton; they went there with interest, with the idea in mind that maybe this was the direction in which their children would look for their goals in life.

Similarly, there have been two high-tech shows in the Ottawa-Carleton area, and those high-tech shows outdrew on a per-capita basis those that have been held in the famous Silicon Valley south. So the interest is there.

I see this ministry of science and technology perhaps being a subministry of the Ministry of Industry and Trade. I would not want to prejudge how it would best be handled, but specifically I see it dealing with industry and with education to make sure that the community colleges are able to meet what are seen as the goals and so the community colleges know what firms are going to be opening up in the area and what types of employment will be necessary.

I see this ministry as being there specifically to deal with those industries that are looking for government assistance, the companies that are coming in and saying, "We are prepared to go with 200 new jobs." These are not jobs moving around between the industry, but 200 new jobs, if the support is there for them to get that on the rails.

I support wholeheartedly the member for Carleton East. I have put that particular support in writing. It would be my sincere hope that ministry would be created to meet those challenges out there; and also the challenges in the technology transfer the member for Carleton East spoke about.

We have a gold mine, albeit a federal agency, in Ottawa that has worked very carefully and very closely with industries in Ontario. That is something we should be promoting, that continued relationship between the province and the National Research Council.

I would like to continue by making a few comments on agriculture. In the riding of Carleton, we still have some agricultural resources being actively farmed, and very well farmed.

Included in the throne speech was the government's view that farmers should be protected from the loss of their products, either when another business fails or through misrepresentations of a buyer. In particular, upcoming changes to the Grain Elevator Storage Act were mentioned. These will include better protection for farmers who store their farm produce in elevators.

The term "grain elevator" understates the scope of the act because it includes beans, cereal grains, corn and grass seeds produced in Ontario.

Mr. Laughren: You have not even put a food terminal in Timmins yet.

Mr. Mitchell: Come on now, Floyd. Don't tell any lies about us and we won't tell the truth about you.

We can all appreciate that if an elevator operator goes bankrupt or becomes insolvent, legal proceedings can take years. This can cause considerable hardship to a producer who has stored his produce in that elevator. The current act already gives the chief inspector certain powers to protect the property of producers of materials stored at grain elevators where the licence of the grain elevator operator has not been reviewed or has been suspended or revoked.

This government's plan to amend the act will make it clear that farm produce held in an elevator for storage remains the property of the producer unless that producer has been paid previously. As the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Timbrell) has already stated, the aim is simply to ensure justice by protecting the farmer's property rights. The envisaged changes will further protect the producer in sales transactions by ensuring the owner retains title to the grain until payment is actually made.

There is considerable support for these changes in the farming community at the level of both the producers' marketing boards and the Ontario Grain and Feed Dealers Association. Therefore, I look forward to this revision of the act and its speedy passage through this chamber. By helping producers in such areas as storage, we also come closer to meeting our goals to increase exports and reduce our own imports.

It is interesting to note as a very positive step that the construction of such storage facilities as has recently occurred has been made possible by assistance from the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development.

As the storage facilities are completed and are put into use, we will have to build and improve our already effective measures to market Ontario products offshore. With these storage facilities and the new technology for storage, it will be possible to store Ontario produce for longer periods. As a result, this produce will then become available for either export or the domestic market rather than lying in a field and being lost due to poor market demand at the time.

5:20 p.m.

None of us has to be sold on the quality of Ontario produce, but we have to recognize the limitations of the growing season here in our province. Our growing season results in harvests for a particular product over a period of a few weeks, effectively flooding the market in some instances but not being sold in others.

In other words, even though we may grow enough of a particular crop, we still have problems making it available over a longer period of time. Better and increased storage facilities will go a long way to keeping Ontario food on the shelves of stores throughout Ontario and for a longer period.

While my constituency is becoming more and more urban, the issues concerning food and farmers should rightly involve us all. I would therefore like to concentrate my remaining remarks on another of our throne speech commitments in the area of agriculture.

Because food is important to us, I welcomed the initiative of the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Timbrell) to establish a national tripartite stabilization program to protect our producers against potentially disastrous fluctuations in commodity prices. This initiative is particularly welcome in the light of the federal Agriculture minister's inability to find funding for Ottawa's long-promised red meat plan. In my view, the program being worked on by Ontario and Saskatchewan would still be preferable because it would be available to all producers who want to participate.

Since last summer's meeting of federal and provincial agriculture ministers, there has been general agreement that we need a national farm income stabilization program. The challenge of developing the operational details for a national program can be enormous, but we face a time when the survival of many farms depends on establishing price stability for many farm commodities. A national program would also be easier to run than 10 totally separate provincial schemes, each operating with different criteria and only for certain commodities.

Other than the costs imposed, the drawbacks of individual provincial programs lie in support levels being set that give producers in one province an advantage over those elsewhere. In effect, provinces end up in a form of nonproductive competition between producers in one province and provincial governments in other provinces. Only two recognized approaches exist for producers to control fluctuating farm incomes: supply management and stabilization.

Supply management is a useful technique for many producers, provided, of course, that producers are willing to enter into a fairly structured system and conform to its rules, such as setting quotas. Currently in Canada, about one third of our farm producers are covered by supply management arrangements.

Income stabilization programs are the other option. The federal government has had an income stabilization program since 1958 which, in spite of changes, is no longer considered adequate. As a result, provincial programs have also been established in most provinces with the different levels of support that I mentioned earlier. Not only has this been costly, but the interests of producers and consumers have not been served as well as they could be.

Stabilization programs basically work like insurance, with the participants paying the premiums. Stabilization programs guarantee farmers a floor price for their product. In the case of the proposed program, the national program would put a floor under the prices the farmers would receive in the marketplace. The method of establishing the floor price is one of the more difficult problems which will have to be dealt with.

It has to be set high enough so that farmers do not suffer major losses, but it has to be low enough so that farmers are not encouraged to overproduce. Once set, though, the participating producer will be able to plan ahead with a reasonable knowledge of what the minimum price will be from year to year. In order to eliminate its use for speculation, the national plan would also require agreement on how producers could enter and leave the plan. I expect that particular scenario, however, is only a minor consideration.

Because the plans envisage payment into the program, one third by the province, one third by Ottawa and one third by the producer, co-operation is needed at all these levels. Already a federal-provincial task force has been established to look first at the needs of beef, pork and sheep producers. As other commodities are examined, the means for including them in national stabilization programs can be developed.

Federal-provincial agriculture ministers are expected to meet in Prince Edward Island this July. We may learn then about the prospects for a successful national stabilization proposal. This program, if it goes ahead, will benefit not only producers but consumers as well. The farmer is not the only one to worry about fluctuating prices for his commodity; the consumer also is often bewildered by the availability and pricing of many products.

A good example to use is beef. Whenever there is a large amount of beef on the market, prices fall. With lower returns, farmers decide to cut back, resulting after one or two years in a reduced supply of beef in stores and higher prices for consumers. The higher prices then bring about more production and another oversupply, thereby continuing the cycle.

A stabilization program would even out such variations in supply and pricing and would allow for a steadier financial return to the producer and a steadier supply at a reasonable cost to the consumer.

As an added bonus, indications are that a national program would not be more expensive to the taxpayer than the existing national hotchpotch of stabilization programs that have been established in this country. Governments, in fact, would find it easier since the greater stability in prices and production would allow more accurate budget planning. This is one of those too-rare moments when provincial governments have joined together on their own, with federal participation, to develop a full national program. It is my hope that this proposal will succeed.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry I missed most of the remarks made by the honourable member who has just concluded speaking. I was busy with my duties on the Board of Internal Economy. Those of you who are driving home tonight will be glad to know there is another cent a kilometre on gas, which of course is long overdue. I thought perhaps I should just mention that.

The Deputy Speaker: How about the clock? Is there anything about the clock?

Mr. Nixon: I appreciate your comment about the new digital clock in here, Mr. Speaker. I should just mention that, contrary to Mr. Hoy's comment earlier this week, I think the digital clock is a very useful addition to this chamber.

All of us who have had an opportunity to observe the Parliament at Westminster will, of course, recall that there are digital clocks in that chamber for the benefit of the members and the observers in the gallery, because the question period is so stylized and structured that the questions are really never answered, or even asked. In our House they are never answered either. It is quite interesting because the topics for questions seem to change as the digits roll over the specific minute, according to the elaborate rules they have governing question period there.

It has also been brought to my attention that the intensity of the colour has been reduced since Friday. I did not notice that myself, but I was assured it had been adjusted over the weekend so that the bright green was somewhat less intrusive. Frankly, I feel it is quite an addition here, and I look forward to the time when some of our other procedures are brought into line with the modern computer age.

Mr. Conway: For example?

Mr. Nixon: I suppose, for example, even our voting procedures, while they are traditional and sometimes quite interesting—even hilarious—still put an unnecessary strain on our capable employees at the table. It seems to me other jurisdictions have found ways to determine the views of the members by their vote a little more quickly and a little more effectively.

Mind you, my wife has already recommended that the utilization of the members of the Legislature is limited in time anyway, and we will soon have an opportunity for all citizens to take part in the debates and, at least, monitor them through their televisions and simply vote themselves—yes, no, maybe—from the comfort of their own homes, in which case we would have the kind of democracy they have enjoyed in certain obscure cantons of Switzerland since medieval times. Of course, I have assured her that there will always be the necessity of the utilization of this chamber by members such as ourselves, giving the benefit to our colleagues of our views on these important emerging matters.

5:30 p.m.

I am less than impressed by the presence of the ministry this afternoon. As I observe the government side carefully I cannot see a single minister. I see at least four people who should be ministers.

The Deputy Speaker: Wait a minute.

Mr. Nixon: But in the rather unlikely event of that taking place in the near future, I thought I should say so.

Certainly we are on the verge of tremendous changes in the ministry. When Kathy Davis herself says it is her husband's duty to run for the federal leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party, can the decision be far behind?

Mr. Conway: Do you think the member for Mississauga South (Mr. Kennedy) might be Acting Premier?

Mr. Nixon: Could be. Actually, the leader of the New Democratic Party made a telling remark in that connection when he was reported to have said that the Premier (Mr. Davis) was giving indecision a bad name. I thought that was probably quite a good comment.

It now appears from the Toronto Star, which has been about as sycophantic as any newspaper has ever been in political support of an individual, that the Premier is going to make the decision. Whatever happens federally after that we can discuss at some other time, but what is going to happen here is really the interesting thing to which we have to give some consideration.

I thought one of the real giveaways if he does go is the fact that there has been no cabinet change even though the cabinet is in more serious disarray—even chaos—than at any time in the 21 years I have had the opportunity to observe it.

Mr. Conway: Twenty-one years?

Mr. Nixon: It is a long time, but not long enough, as the Premier would say.

It is difficult to go over the cabinet because, looking at the empty seats, I cannot even remember who they are. No doubt they are being driven down to the evening dinner at Winston's, or wherever it is going to happen tonight, with their executive assistants with their credit cards at the ready.

Mr. Conway: The Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) is in Switzerland.

Mr. Nixon: The Concorde has got to be kept flying somehow, and maybe he can do it single-handed.

I really have felt that there has been a good deal of restraint on the part of the cabinet ministers who consider themselves upwardly mobile; there has been none of this untoward jockeying for position. As a matter of fact, there has been a lot of Alphonse-Gaston bowing and scraping. It is hard to see who is really moving into the fore, although, as members will recall, from time to time members of the opposition parties are prone to give a judgement when an answer is given in the House and so on.

But there is no doubt that with these huge war chests that have been gathered by calling in the faithful to $200- or $250-a-plate dinners downtown we are going to be subjected to an even more massive and impressive campaign than the group that gathered at Roy Thomson Hall Saturday afternoon is able to put forward.

Mr. Kolyin: It was Massey Hall.

Mr. Nixon: Was it Massey Hall? Oh yes. You are always second rate. You always miss the real style accomplishments. That's right; I saw it on television. The last time there was a political meeting there I think it was Mackenzie King in 1940.

The Deputy Speaker: No, Diefenbaker was there.

Mr. Nixon: Was he? Oh well, that was a good meeting too.

Frankly, I agree with Kathy Davis. I think it is the Premier's duty to save the Progressive Conservative Party nationally from a fate worse than death. We are all very interested in what is happening there, of course, because the polls indicate that if an election were held now the Liberal Party might not achieve its usual goals of success.

As the Premier used to be willing to bring to my attention from time to time, in the election of 1975 the Liberal Party was a clear 12 per cent ahead of him and somehow or other the election did not work out on the basis of the Gallup predictions. There are those in the front bench of the party here, Mr. Speaker, who will tell you in private what happened, but we will not give them an opportunity to do so right now.

When we see that lineup of federal contenders, there is always that warm glow that diffuses through our bodies when we see Joe Clark speaking. According to the handicappers in the Toronto Star, he is a two-to-one favourite. As a matter of fact, he is my candidate. He is the one most of us on this side would prefer to be elected.

I find the others quite interesting. There was an article in the Toronto Star last week in which Keith Davey was reported to have been describing the candidates as similar to our bird friends, referring to the grosbeak from Newfoundland and certain others, which I thought was quite amusing but somewhat unfair, because they are all extremely capable and well committed to the public good.

Having participated in leadership campaigns myself, I know that at about this stage in the federal Tory leadership there are delegates everywhere asking, "Why does someone of stature not come forward?" It is a syndrome in every leadership contest. I have even heard that put to me as a candidate myself, and been expected to commiserate with the poor delegates because they did not have somebody better to vote for. So it is bound to happen.

This will come back to the Premier of Ontario through his rumour network. It has to be the best that has ever been established any time, anywhere, by a politician. There is nothing that happens anywhere in Canada that is not reported to him by one of his friends or employees in the very near future. You may be aware of that yourself, Mr. Speaker, from time to time. You have been involved in events here that were probably reported to the Premier without delay.

The Deputy Speaker: Speaking of that, I should tokenly observe that I am sure somewhere in your dialogue we are getting around to the throne speech.

Mr. Nixon: What could possibly be more appropriate than the leadership of the government of Ontario, particularly when we are talking about the very man who singlehandedly wrote the throne speech? I shall certainly try to abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I have a feeling that, even with your best efforts, you are not going to get me off this subject.

The Deputy Speaker: I said "tokenly."

Mr. Nixon: I agree with Mrs. Davis. I think it is his duty to run for the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party. Actually, it would do him good to sit in opposition in Ottawa for a while. It would do him good to face the leader of the present government there for a little while, because I think it is a completion to a politician's soul to have an experience in opposition. Of course, it is our aim to give that experience to a handful of our friends opposite in the very near future. We are working towards that goal and I believe we are going to be able to achieve it.

The question is whether the Premier has to resign his seat or even the premiership of the province if he declares himself a candidate. We are often told by the cognoscenti that it is not necessary to resign. There are all the antecedents in the Conservative leadership who went for that role without resigning their position. I personally think the Premier's better judgement will prevail and when he goes he will be gone, because there will be no way back. As soon as the decision is made for him to contest the federal office, the floodgate will be unleashed around here and Larry and Moe and all the rest of them will be working very hard for the succession.

I expect he has already whispered in the ear of the Minister of Energy (Mr. Welch) so that he could be persuaded, perhaps against his better judgement, to take over the premiership on an interim basis. He would have to make a commitment, naturally, that he would not be a contestant for the leadership itself.

There have been those who have said that perhaps the present government House leader (Mr. Wells) might be persuaded to become Premier on an interim basis. I, for one, would be very much against that, because I do not believe his options should be restricted in any way. As far as I am concerned, the Minister of Energy would make a great interim Premier and maybe a full-time Premier. He got his background at McMaster, which is not always one of the earmarks of political success, but in his instance I think it would be great if he were to take on the interim responsibility and give the Premier a free hand to move away from the provincial scene and any ties to the provincial scene so he could campaign all out for the federal leadership.

In many respects, if Joe Clark were going to do the right thing in the broad scene of Progressive Conservative politics, he would have been persuaded by now to come to Queen's Park, meet with the Premier and say, "If you are interested in doing this, I will not only step aside, I will nominate you." After all, without going over all the historical facts associated with that, Mr. Clark has had an opportunity to be Prime Minister. I think it would be unreasonable to assume that a secondary role, actually as the new leader's right-hand man, would be something he should spurn.

Mr. Conway: Somebody has to speak French.

Mr. Nixon: Oh, that is a lovely, lovely comment.

I am quite serious about this. If the people over there had any influence in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, and I happen to know they have little or none, they would persuade Joe Clark to get the Premier to go so they would stop tearing themselves apart. They would not have to have this kind of contest. They could anoint him. Joe Clark would be at his right-hand side. Some of them would perhaps remain to make it a fight, but he would go down there as Leader of the Opposition to face his fate.

An hon. member: With Crosbie on his left.

Mr. Nixon: No, Crombie has another destiny. Before the member gets too excited about David Crombie being on his left, it seems to me Crombie is a natural to come back here for the real leadership contest. After all, the member for St. George (Ms. Fish) could run his campaign. What would be better than David Crombie saying: "I am committed to the political life. I have offered myself as leader in Canada and I have fought hard for it. I came fourth out of seven, which is not too bad, but my true love is with the city of Toronto and its extension, the province of Ontario."

I think for the fellows lining up for the provincial leadership there is always a cloud the size of a man's hand in politics and, for those guys, it is Crombie.

Hon. Mr. Wells: What about Darcy McKeough?

Mr. Nixon: Darcy is coming into town tomorrow. I can probably tell the honourable member better on Wednesday morning, because Darcy is meeting with the Liberals. I do not know what his idea is, but maybe he is thinking the future belongs to a rather broader view of politics. He was never narrow in his approach.

Mr. Conway: On your primary thesis, you seem to have forgotten why Maureen McTeer, like Tom Wells, supported Bert Lawrence 11 years ago.

Mr. Nixon: Oh, I had forgotten. Thank God for the member for Renfrew North. He does not forget anything. He does not learn anything, but he does not forget anything. In that he is with the Bourbons. That is unfair.

Mr. Conway: Do you remember what Maureen said about Bill Davis in 1971?

Mr. Nixon: I would like him to tell us what Maureen said about the Premier.

The Deputy Speaker: It is rough enough as it is. How am I going to explain this to the second floor, to the guy in the corner office?

Mr. Nixon: If the Premier decides to go, I expect there will be a lot of blood on the floor. There is no doubt about that. Joe Clark should step aside but I have a feeling, having watched his career with care, he is not going to do that.

As soon as the Premier of Ontario's candidacy is established, he will have an opportunity to go across Canada with Joe Clark on the same platform and explain just where he was during the election of 1980, when he was in Fort Lauderdale for part of it, and why it was the Liberal Party actually used excerpts from the provincial budget, approved by the Premier and read by the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller), that were so destructive as far as Joe Clark's government and his budget at that time happened to be.

The real action we are going to get on the Davis candidacy is going to come from the west. I used to hear that the Premier of Alberta would run if the Premier of Ontario ran. I now hear he has stepped down from that a little bit; he just has not got the energy, but he is probably going to participate in a rather flamboyant way in expressing his view that there is something inadequate with the energy and other policies of central Ontario, as stated by the Premier of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Wells: He will nominate him.

Mr. Nixon: It has been mentioned by the government House leader that probably Lougheed would nominate him. If they really wanted to do the right thing, and this is advice from somebody who has their interests at heart, they should get Joe Clark to nominate him and the Premier of Alberta to second him; then they could go out and say, "Don't say we are not united in this."

That is the thing to do. The others would fall by the wayside. They would probably get on the bandwagon, looking forward, in the unlikely event that the new leader were successful in winning the government of Canada, to having certain places of importance and maybe even preferment. That is the way it could happen. Opposition parties often cannot organize themselves that well, with the exception of the official opposition in Ontario, which of course is well organized and which has never experienced those difficulties.

Now we come back to what is going to happen here. One thinks right now of all the little groups meeting in the law offices downtown, just slaving over the succession here in Ontario. What happens in Ottawa is one thing, but this is where it is at, according to some of our friends opposite.

I do not know. I made a quick list: the member for Muskoka (Mr. F. S. Miller), the member for Eglinton (Mr. McMurtry), the member for St. Andrew-St. Patrick (Mr. Grossman), the member for London South (Mr. Walker), the member for York East (Mr. Elgie), the member for Don Mills (Mr. Timbrell), the member for Scarborough North (Mr. Wells).

Mr. Kolyn: Bette Stephenson.

Mr. Nixon: The member for York Mills (Miss Stephenson) maybe. She ought to run, but I do not think she will. I think the government members have probably run her, she being a very tough and capable minister, through the wringer so often on the fine legislation she has presented that she probably figures she has had enough of it.

I have to add to that list—he is not really a dark horse; I would think he might even be the front runner—Crombie.

We do not know how that is going to be set up, but the government will be operated by Premier Welch. That sounds quite good. We are going to make that Kemp-Welch actually. He has a hyphenated name, and there is something about Kemp-Welch that has got a little more class. It can really happen; Premier Kemp-Welch will operate things here.

The budget will be like the throne speech, with not very much in it; maybe small increases of certain taxes, but very little of anything. It is going to be a stand-pat budget, as somebody said, dropped into amber so that nothing is happening, and the real battle will be under way. Some time late in September, maybe even about the middle of September, this will be settled and we will have a new Premier.

If there is a new Premier here—and if any of this comes true, there certainly will be—then I think we would be facing an election, my fellow members.

Mr. Conway: Oh, no.

Mr. Nixon: I can hardly wait.

Mr. Ruston: There are signs already.

Mr. Nixon: That is right. I would not even mind a winter election, but I would think some time next spring. This could happen. It will really depend on what sort of response the new Premier gets.

I would just say, from my own experience in leadership campaigns, the time to get organized is now. Those guys on the back benches who have been sitting there with the Premier not even remembering their names since the last election might as well pick their candidate, which will really kind of lay out their careers for the next 15 years. But I say to them, do not make a mistake; pick a winner.

Mr. Conway: Tom Wells didn't pick the winner.

Mr. Nixon: We can see what happened to him.

This is the time for them to pick their candidate and really make a commitment. They should not sit on the fence to see who is going to win. They should just be sure they pick a person they can work with, who they think is going to have a role to play in the remaining few months of the Conservative regime in Ontario, and they might get a very good shadow cabinet position when they are over here. That is worth pushing for.

5:50 p.m.

I felt I ought to give this kind of advice to some of the members present. I will not be participating as a delegate in that particular selection, but I have offered and will continue to offer my advice to both the front and back benches of the Tory party. They do not follow it, but they will eventually come around to realizing that my advice is correct in this. The time for action is now, particularly for the back-benchers. If they sit there waiting for the winner to look at them, then they are not playing the game properly. They should pick their person and get him or her elected. That is the way the system works.

Mr. Conway: What about the member for Wilson Heights (Mr. Rotenberg)? What is your advice for him?

Mr. Nixon: I do not know, but I understand the retirement age on the Ontario Municipal Board is 65, and we may have a Liberal candidate in that riding who will clean his clock—

Mr. Rotenberg: You have not been able to yet.

Mr. Nixon: Well, my friend has not run against this guy. I suggest one of the things he might do is extend the active age on the municipal board to about 80 and then he will be okay.

Mr. Rotenberg: Are you going to run in my riding?

Mr. Nixon: No, no. I have enough trouble in Brant-Oxford-Norfolk.

Speaking of that, there are one or two items I want to bring to the members' attention having to do, if not with my constituency, at least with problems that are evident there and shared by other constituencies. I want to speak very briefly about White Farm Equipment Co.

We in this Legislature have supported White Farm Equipment to the extent of about $7 million—$2 million in an outright grant and about $5 million in guarantees. The government of Canada has been even more generous, making available $11 million.

This company was sold to American interests about a year ago under circumstances that make an interesting story. I am not going to take time to tell it since we have discussed it in this Legislature before. The result was that the Canadian partner was bought out by American interests—given $1.5 million to get out of the way. It was wholly taken over by an American entrepreneur about a year ago.

At a public meeting in Brantford about a week ago, it was predicted by the New Democratic Party federal member that White would go into receivership within a few days or a very few weeks. This may or not happen, but I am sure it is a fact that White Farm Equipment is facing extremely difficult financial trials and tribulations.

They have not made a combine for something like 15 months and although their combine is considered to be one of the best, if not the best on the market, it is still difficult to sell since farmers do not want to buy a $100,000 item made by a company that may or may not be in business in the next few weeks. One can understand that.

When I went into the local White Farm Equipment dealer today to buy a couple of cultivator points, I was interested to note that there was a letter up there from the president of White Farm Equipment reassuring the dealership that their refinancing in the United States had been established and that they were confident the same sort of stability would be available in Canada.

It is interesting that governments at both levels have been somewhat more generous—even on a per capita basis, if that phrase applies—to Massey-Ferguson than they have been to White Farm Equipment. It is hoped the governments will continue to tide these companies over the next few months as farm prosperity, we hope and pray, regains some more momentum.

I should point out something the farm members are well aware of about the price of some of our products. Soybeans and corn particularly have gone ahead by 25 to 40 per cent in the past two months. This has been largely because of an initiative of the government of the United States which has resulted in reducing the acreage to be planted this year by about 20 per cent.

The US government has a very imaginative program called the payment in kind program. Farmers who make a commitment not to grow certain acres in corn and beans this year, corn particularly, have an agreement from the US government that they will receive not dollars, but the corn, free, that would have been grown on that acreage. This corn was bought by the government to maintain the price last year and has been in storage at high expense all this time.

Thus, the US government, without contributing—that is, it is not handing out dollars—is reducing its storage charge and giving the farmers corn in return for a promise not to plant the acres this year. This means the net crop will be reduced, and certain controls in that way will be advantageous to the American farmers. We in Canada get the advantage of this without participating in any way, and the price, as I have said, has gone up as much as 35 per cent in certain markets for corn, which is a good thing for us. As Canadians we tend to think of ourselves as really being an important part of the world market in grain, but we should remember that all of Canada produces only three per cent of the grain produced in the world; the state of Iowa grows more grain than all of Canada. It tends to give you a certain, let us say, factual basis when you are discussing this thing; I would not say humility. Instead of being sort of the breadbasket for the hungry world, we are not much more than simply an ancillary market, which must follow the American lead in the sale of corn, soybeans and other farm products to the world market.

This world market is expanding; there is no doubt about that. The population growth figures are familiar to all of us and to some extent are quite frightening. It is unfortunate that the population growth is largely in those parts of the world where the economy is extremely depressed and there is very little opportunity for those countries to participate in the world grain market in a way that is advantageous for them or for us.

But the prospects are improving for the farmers, particularly in the grain market, although the depression, particularly in the red meat business, is so serious in Ontario that we find our farmers who are engaged in that particular enterprise facing continued economic stress and a growing number of bankruptcies.

White Farm Equipment continues in operation. The minister, in answer to my question a week ago, indicated the government of Ontario is in no way dealing with the ownership of the company at present to maintain its operation. I intend to ask the minister further about this, since there is some indication the financing of the company is on a better basis, and we hope it can continue.

We must remember that even at the level of the economy four years ago there were 1,000 people employed in Brantford in the manufacture of these axial-flow combines, tractors and other equipment, and that for the past many months there has been only a caretaker staff available and a small group of people serving the dealership requirements.

There is no question that the quality of the implements is good and that the axial-flow combine itself is one of the best in the world. It would be a shame indeed if the ability and the technology to produce this combine were lost to Canada, and although we have an assurance from the company now owning White Farm Equipment that the technology will be maintained here, still in economic extremis the loss of that technology is a real possibility.

On motion by Mr. Nixon, the debate was adjourned.

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Tuesday, May 3, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.
Prayers.

ARTICLE IN NEWSPAPER

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: Twice in a column written by Claire Hoy in the Toronto Sun a statement in the chamber has been attributed to my honourable colleague the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio).

I would like the record to show that I in fact made that remark. I regret any embarrassment the comments may have caused this Legislature.

ORAL QUESTIONS

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I note again today that the Premier (Mr. Davis) is not here, and again it was on his schedule that he would be attending today. Again I have a question for him. You may want to address your mind, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that we are becoming increasingly a province without a Premier, and even though he may have his mind elsewhere—

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Peterson: —there are certain obligations and duties here in this House.

That being said, you will note the attendance of the cabinet ministers and the Premier over the last little while. It is not something that has done very much to elevate the parliamentary process in anyone's mind.

Mr. Speaker, I am casting my eyes across the House looking for the senior minister, and it is difficult to find one. That being said, I will go to the Deputy Premier (Mr. Welch), who is in his place today. It must inspire some fear in your heart that that man could actually be the Premier for a while in this province, Mr. Speaker.

DAMAGE BY TORNADOES

Mr. Peterson: Let me ask him a question. Would the Deputy Premier care to bring this House up to date on the extensive damage suffered in many communities in southwestern Ontario as a result of tornadoes? I would ask the minister for the government's assessment of the situation in those communities, particularly in the Sarnia area in the vicinity of Plympton township. Will he be recommending to cabinet that these areas be declared disaster areas eligible for special assistance?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that field staff of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing made a preliminary trip of investigation in the areas hardest hit by the storm yesterday afternoon. In fact, the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett) and the Provincial Secretary for Resources Development (Mr. Henderson) are in the Sarnia area this afternoon to learn at first hand the details of the damage.

It is also my understanding that an office has been set up in the area by employees of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing so that property owners can come in and give details of the extent of the damage they have experienced. I think it is early yet to share with the House any estimate of that damage. No doubt the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing will be in a much better position to share that information with members following his investigation this afternoon.

Mr. Peterson: The minister will be aware that we have had discussions in this House before about the type of special relief that should be going to hard-hit areas at the time of a natural disaster. Does he not feel it is time the government approached these matters, not on an ad hoc basis, but in terms of some permanent policy?

For example, my colleague the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk (Mr. Nixon) has suggested at various times in this House that we should have an emergency relief fund, perhaps even established with lottery funds, to provide loan and grant assistance to individuals and communities that are subject to extraordinary expenditures due to a natural disaster.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I can appreciate the position being taken by the leader of the official opposition. However, the record of this government in responding to need as it has arisen speaks for itself. It is a record I hope all members of the House want to share in.

The particular point is whether we have a policy to which we subject individual situations or whether we respond to individual situations once satisfied as to the extent of the damage. I am quite satisfied, in fact quite impressed, that officials of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing were on the scene yesterday, that a field office has been established today and that people are being urged to come in today to discuss with government officials their losses and the extent of the damage.

The minister himself is there today with the Provincial Secretary for Resources Development, indicating a personal interest and concern. I feel quite satisfied that once we have a complete understanding of the extent of the damage, this government, as usual, will respond in a very humane and responsible way.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would not agree that one of the advantages of having an established program is that the government, as soon as the news of a disaster reaches it, as happened yesterday, would be able to respond in an official way rather than simply responding in an ad hoc way as the crisis arises. We simply ask the Deputy Premier to have another look at this problem. It may give the citizens of this province a greater assurance that not only will things appear to be done, but they will be done in reality, and all the capacities of government will be put into motion right away.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I think the final assessment of a successful response to this is, in fact, responding to it. No one is going to fault us, and I hope the honourable leader will commend the ministry for moving in as quickly as it has. Let the member look at the pattern. Perhaps he has not been in the House long enough to assess the fact and study the history of this approach. We have responded in a fairly clear way, once the extent of the damage was known.

I am quite satisfied, with the minister there today, that there is no one in that part of the province who has suffered any loss who feels this government is not sensitive to and very sympathetic about the damage he or she has suffered and that it does not want to move in a responsible way according to established principles in that regard.

POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment relating to the matter of Swaru, the solid waste reduction unit, and the emissions of dioxin and furan from that plant. I am aware the minister has cut production some 20 per cent and changes in the boiler have been made so that emissions have been somewhat reduced.

That being said, does he not feel it would be an appropriate and reasonable response by his ministry, given the very wide degree of concern felt in that area by the people who may be affected by that plant, to engage in testing of the individuals who live nearby that plant and are thereby potentially affected by these emissions?
2:10 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the honourable member that I would not hesitate to do what would be appropriate in any such situation.

I have had rather extensive discussions with medical people on whether they feel it would be either necessary or advisable at this time. To date, the advice has been no, that it would not be productive—in part, I suppose, because the complex combination of things that might be present there would lead to no conclusion whatsoever with respect to the particular point the member is raising. Furthermore, in their opinion, there is no indication that there is any need for such a study.

Mr. Peterson: The minister will be aware that view is not shared by a variety of other people, particularly if one is living adjacent to that plant and given the amount of concern that has been exhibited locally. The minister, I know, is aware of all that. He is also aware of the Tricil report, which said afterburners could have some effect on the emissions from that plant.

Does he not feel, as Minister of the Environment, that he has an obligation to proceed with those plans? Does he not feel, as minister and as the guardian for those people, that he has an obligation to make sure every possible avenue is pursued to monitor and protect the health of people in that area?

Hon. Mr. Norton: With respect to the matter of the operation of the plant that the member referred to, I can assure him the work that is under way is very extensive. In fact, I believe contracts now have been signed—I have not personally been the signatory to the contracts—to the tune of some $300,000 for work to be done on the plant in terms of addressing ways in which its efficiency can be improved.

Studies are under way relating to the testing of the design of the plant, the operations and present practices there, to determine what improvements can be made.

In the interim, as the member has already indicated, the operation of the plant has been cut back by 20 per cent, and the advice I have received is that this brings the emissions within the guideline which, as I indicated in the House at the time of my original announcement of the findings, is a very conservative guideline in terms of the precautions that are implicit in its development.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Swaru incinerator has been operating for more than a decade and the readings his ministry got last summer were after a number of technical changes in the operation of that facility over the course of the decade, and in view of the fact that nobody knows what the emissions were in the past but it is quite likely they were much worse, on what basis is the minister saying there is no indication of a need to go in and test people in the community? Why will he not go in and find out what possible damage may have been done?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in response to the initial question from the Leader of the Opposition—in fact, I think I have addressed the honourable member's question; he is repeating the first question of the Leader of the Opposition.

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Norton: If I am not mistaken, the member for Hamilton Centre (Ms. Copps) asked essentially the same question back at the time of the announcement. I am sorry, I forgot about the hot competition between the two members.

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Norton: He is claiming credit. I am not sure. One or the other of the members asked the question.

Mr. Bradley: Anyway, answer the question.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I am about to do that if the member for St. Catharines will just give me an opportunity.

I think what the honourable member is asking for is an epidemiological study, and if he were to discuss the advisability of an epidemiological study with experts in that field, with medical people, I think he would probably get the same advice as I have. If he can get contrary advice, then fine, he can let me know about it.

But the purpose of epidemiology is not to go and look for symptoms, and there is no indication, I am told, of any particular problem relating to health effects in that community. If there were, then it would be an appropriate time to do an epidemiological study to determine what the causes of any symptoms might be. But the member has not presented to me or to the medical people, nor have they seen, any evidence of any aberrational symptoms.

Mr. Peterson: Surely the minister's responsibility is to move ahead of time, not after the fact. His entire approach seems to be that we will wait until someone gets very ill or until there is evidence, and then we will move on the situation.

The minister is aware, I am sure, that even with the cutback at Swaru, according to Dr. Frank Karasek, it is pumping 100 times the amount of dioxin that some of the more modern plants tested in France, for example, are pumping out; and he is aware that it is at a potentially dangerous level or else he would not be taking the action he is engaging in at the present time.

Surely, given the play of dioxin emissions in this province in a variety of—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will ask all honourable members to curtail their private conversations in the House please, and I would ask the Leader of the Opposition to place his question.

Mr. Peterson: It is obvious that bunch needs a little leadership, Mr. Speaker. The cat is away and the mice will play.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Peterson: I am back to the Minister of the Environment on this matter, with whose approach I fundamentally disagree. He is waiting for evidence of major health problems before he is prepared to move, and by that time it is going to be too late.

Given the evidence we have now in a variety of areas in this province—Niagara, the Welland Canal, the Detroit River, the St. Clair River, Swaru and a variety of others—of this deadly chemical sneaking into the atmosphere, the water and a variety of other places, surely the minister's responsibility is to develop the medical process to understand the potential effects of this chemical and not to wait 20 years, when it will be too late. Would the minister not think this is part of his responsibility?

Mr. McClellan: Yes or no.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Well, as with most things, it is not quite that simple. I do want to give the honourable member the fullest possible answer, and I do hope the Speaker will allow me that opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Norton: It is really not for me to try to pretend that I am a medical expert. If the member wishes to pretend that he is, that is fine. I happen also to have a responsibility to discharge on behalf of the public in this province that requires me to be responsible, thoughtful and careful when I am dealing with matters that may relate to issues involving human health, and that is the way I will continue to function. I will seek the very best medical advice that is available to me and I will take it into consideration in making the decisions I am responsible for making.

If the member has any evidence to the contrary, other than wishing, perhaps, to make this into an issue on which medical people would disagree with him, then I would ask him to be a little more thoughtful himself in his responses to this particular problem. It is not being treated lightly and it will not be treated lightly, but I will insist on proceeding responsibly in dealing with these serious issues that face us in our society.

Furthermore, the impression the Leader of the Opposition and his caucus are trying to create that there is "an epidemic of dioxin" in Ontario—I think that is the phrase his critic has used, or something of that nature—is fallacious. Really what we are seeing is the result of major advances in technology that have been implemented in this province, which are allowing us to detect very low levels of dioxin in certain areas where they have probably existed for a long time from natural sources such as combustion—natural to the extent they have been with us for a long time.

If the member has a fire in his fireplace, he is probably contributing dioxin to the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Thank you. New question, the member for York South.

SENIOR CITIZENS SERVICES

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Community and Social Services. I met today with a Mrs. Annie Hayes, a remarkable 89-year-old woman who is living at 51 Greenlaw Avenue in west Toronto. Mrs. Hayes told me she would be forced to leave her home in which she has lived since 1944 and move into an institution unless she continues to be provided services by the West Metro Senior Citizens Services centre.

What response is the Ministry of Community and Social Services going to make to the request from the West Metro Senior Citizens Services centre for the $17,000 that will enable it to stay alive this year? What response will come from the ministry so Mrs. Hayes will be able to stay in her home?

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised the leader of the New Democratic Party would ask a question like that. He knows we are going to meet it. Everybody knows that. I said that last week. Where was the member?

Mr. Rae: With great respect to the minister, he has not answered the question. May I say to the minister before he gets up on his feet in hysterical rage that, if he has certain information with respect to the West Metro Senior Citizens Services, this information is not being shared with that organization. I met with them at lunchtime and they are not aware of any plans by the ministry to provide them with funding.

Instead of forcing these groups across Metro and indeed across the province to rely continually on emergency funding and to face continually the prospect of having to close, what measures is the minister going to take to provide permanent funding, as called for in the Neighbourhoods Under Stress report last week, to make sure these organizations are able to survive on a permanent, stable basis, so the senior citizens and disabled people they care for will be able to stay in their homes and not be forced into institutions? That is the impact the uncertainty is having for those people.

Hon. Mr. Drea: First of all, I answered his first question. It is not my fault the leader of the third party cannot read a newspaper, is monumentally misinformed, appears disoriented here today and is asking me the wrong question.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Now to the question, please.

Hon. Mr. Drea: One of the honourable leader's problems at the moment is he is running as a front for an alderman who gave an interview last week on the west Toronto seniors matter and said that because he had not heard, therefore—

Mr. Rae: They have not heard either.

Mr. McClellan: Nobody has heard.

Mr. Rae: Nobody has heard.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Just a moment; if the leader will let me answer, they have.

Interjection.

Hon. Mr. Drea: No, there is not. I answered the first question. I would appreciate it if—

Mr. Swart: Talk about hallucination.

Mr. McClellan: Not everybody hears voices, Frank. You will have to speak up.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Fine, they do not want an answer.

Mr. Speaker: I think the minister answered the question.

Ms. Cops: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the report was also monumentally misinformed in what it pointed out about funding in Metropolitan Toronto ridings—Ontario funding, excluding projects of a provincial nature. I know the minister had a person from Community and Social Services at the meeting which launched the report. The report pointed out the difficulties faced by organizations like this compared with one that has Wintario funding, where $3 goes to every government riding for $1 spent in every opposition riding in Metropolitan Toronto, excluding projects of a provincial nature. I wonder if the minister might want to comment on that.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is supplementary.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I am a nice guy. I will answer it. I happen to believe there is a great deal of difficulty in trying to have necessary social services, such as the ones described here today, funded by lotteries. Any jurisdiction that has gone into the funding of necessary, ongoing social services by lotteries has got itself into very serious and very substantial trouble. I would have thought a supposedly in-depth study of many of the real or emerging social planning needs in Metropolitan Toronto would have been a little more creative than to ask for a pool of lottery money.

To return to the question of permanent funding, that is really something very archaic in social work. The whole thrust today is that there is core funding, then funding on a project-by-project basis. This allows the social organization, whether it is just emerging or whether it is long established, to be able to meet needs; and when those needs are met—indeed, in social work one of the central concepts is that one must be always trying to work oneself out of a job by meeting needs—it is not necessarily the end of the organization, because the organization goes ahead and pioneers on other needs.

In short, this is virtually the only way, using the fee-for-service basis or some of the imaginative techniques that have come about in the past decade, where new groups that want to tackle new problems are even able to get into the field.

In terms of the Metro situation, my staff has been meeting with the staff of Metro social services for some time, particularly dealing with agencies that provide services to the elderly.

Mr. McClellan: You have been meeting for five or six years.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, with all respect, my remarks relate to an earlier supplementary which I did not have a chance to answer.

Mr. Speaker: You can answer that in due time.

Mr. Rae: I just say to the minister that the executive director of the West Metro Senior Citizens Services centre knows nothing of any plans by the ministry to provide additional funding.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Rae: Since I know the minister is eager to answer, does he not think a funding formula that requires of groups, such as the West Metro Senior Citizens Services centre, that they raise 30 per cent of their funding from their own fund-raising activities is totally unrealistic in view of the kind of groups they are serving and the kind of groups they are drawing their funding from?

Does the minister not think it is time to develop a formula that will provide these groups with permanent, stable funding, instead of asking them to live hand to mouth, year by year, and exist on an emergency basis? That is the real issue in this case.

Hon. Mr. Drea: If that is the real issue, then I have already met it. That is precisely why two things are occurring. My staff has met with that organization. That organization, after meeting with my people, for some peculiar reason and probably with the assistance of the member's friend, the alderman, held a press conference last Friday stating it was going to go out of business at the end of June, when indeed it knew this ministry was most sympathetic to its particular problem.

If I had not been interrupted a moment ago, I could have saved the member asking this question. I have recognized for some months the particular problem faced by agencies dealing with services to the elderly, when they are forced to raise that 30 per cent from the private sector or from other than the Metro government and ourselves. I recognize that, and I do not know where the member has been in this House because I have said so.

Mr. R. F. Johnston: They have had to go to you every year for the past three years.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Drea: That is the very reason the social services staff of Metropolitan Toronto and my own staff have been looking, not just at the particular agency the leader of the third party discovered today but also at the one that was covered at some length in the Toronto Star last week by Miss Pigg. If he reads that story, he will see it was stated at the bottom that they never had to ask for money before, that they are the model.

The member need not wave his back hand at me. He walked into a trap today and he is going to get slapped around. He might as well sit there and like it. If he cannot keep his research straight that is not my problem.

2:30 p.m.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, it is a incredible performance by the minister who has not even had the courtesy to tell his plans to the organization he claims he is ready to fund. What kind of a fraud is that?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Drea: I want that word "fraud" withdrawn.

Mr. Rae: I will not withdraw it, because it is a fraud. It is a fraud.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The good intentions of a week ago seem to have flown out the window. We are almost at the halfway period in question period. I ask the member for York South to withdraw that unfortunate reference, please.

Mr. Rae: I will not withdraw that remark, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rae: I said the program that the minister claimed to be putting forward was a fraud, and I stand by those remarks. If the individuals who are running that service are not even aware of funding plans by that minister, and he gets up in this House and claims it is being done, I say that is a fraud.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I draw the member's attention to standing order 19(d)(11) and ask him to reconsider the use of that word.

An hon. member: Throw him out.

An hon. member: That is what he wants.

Mr. Speaker: All right. In the member's failure to withdraw—

Hon. Mr. Bernier: He needs help. Where's Elie?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rae: I ask you, sir, to consider very carefully the words I used—

Mr. Speaker: No, no. Order.

Mr. Rae: I am making a request of you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask you to hear me out.

The minister has called my integrity into question in his answer to me. He called into question the information that I have. I want the minister to know, and I want you to know, sir, that not only did I meet this morning with Mrs. Hayes but I also met with Beth Hoaster-Walsh, who is the executive director of the agency in question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The member for York South will please resume his seat.

I must point out, and I am sure all honourable members are well aware, that it is not just the specific language which is used but it is also the manner in which it is used.

Mr. Mackenzie: Doesn't it work both ways?

Mr. Rae: If I may say to you, sir, I did not at any time impute any motive to the minister. I did not at any time impute any motive with respect to his integrity. The only thing I said was with respect to a program that has not been communicated to the individuals involved. I think I am entitled in parliamentary language to describe that as a fraud. I will not withdraw that remark with respect to the program.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I said before, it was not the specific language, it was the temper in which it was used.

Mr. Laughren: Boy oh boy. Majority government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is plenty of precedence for that in May and in Beauchesne.

Mr. Bradley: Throw him out.

Mr. Laughren: That's the way to run it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the member for York South to give this serious consideration—

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, on Friday, when I was here listening to the vigorous intervention of the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) in response to a number of questions, I had occasion to review Beauchesne, and you are correct, sir, in so far as Beauchesne is concerned. It has been ruled in Ottawa on a couple of occasions that "fraud" is unparliamentary. I refer to page 107 of Beauchesne.

In my humble estimation, what the leader of the third party has said may be, according to Beauschesne, unparliamentary, but I do not think it is any more unparliamentary than what the minister said in some agitation when he referred to the leader of the third party as—I think I heard him correctly—“running a front for some alderman.” That, in my view, is an imputation of motive. I think, if we want the leader of the third party to withdraw the reference to “fraud,” we should also invite the minister to withdraw that reference, which is just as unparliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: Quite obviously, both honourable members have taken a very hard view of this. In the spirit of compromise, if both honourable members did get carried away, and to maintain the decorum and dignity of this House having regard to the language and the temper in which it was used, if indeed the minister did make that reference, I ask him to withdraw that reference.

Hon. Mr. Drea: Mr. Speaker, I did make the reference, and I will withdraw it. Also—

Mr. Speaker: That is all we need, thank you. Having done that, which I presume was part of the cause for the response from the member for York South, I ask him to reconsider.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, given that the word I used has been deemed by the parliamentary authorities to be unparliamentary, I certainly withdraw it. I would still like an answer to my question from the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Having said that, we will move right along with a new question.

Hon. Mr. Drea: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: It was also mentioned by the leader of the third party during some of his latter remarks, in attempting to deal with the point of order, that in his view I had made reference to his integrity. If that is his view, then whatever he considers were reflections upon his integrity—not his ability, but his integrity—I will withdraw them as well.

Mr. Wrye: Have you got another one to withdraw?

Mr. Rae: I do not know what else I can withdraw. I do not have any more bones to throw to the minister.

An hon. member: He still has not answered your question.

Mr. Rae: I think the answer to the question will have to await another day.

SPARTON OF CANADA LTD.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Industry and Trade. On February 15, the minister made a statement to this House with respect to Sparton of Canada Ltd. The minister advised the House that his information at that time was that 50 per cent of the people who were on indefinite layoff, or 34 people, would be recalled at the London plant.

Is the minister aware that not only have these 34 people not been recalled as of this date, which is some two weeks after the mid-April date on which he advised us they would be recalled, but also the seven people who were temporarily recalled at the time he made his statement have since been laid off as well? What is the minister prepared to do to restore employment at the Sparton plant in London?

2:40 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, to answer the question initially asked, the information I provided to the House at the time was simply the information provided as a result of an inquiry made by us to the company. That information was transmitted to the House. It was presumably right at the time and I presume there has been no difference since that time.

It may be that business conditions have altered, alternative steps have been taken in the industry and perhaps there have been other people laid off. I am not reflecting on that particular situation. I could relate to two or three other layoffs the honourable member might like to raise questions about and two or three other places where people have been recalled. So there are plenty of incidents of both.

Mr. Rae: At that same time, the minister also made a statement that the plant at Campbellford would be making what he called a new product. Information in January from both the Liberal Minister of State (Trade) and the Liberal Minister of Supply and Services in Ottawa indicates that what the Campbellford plant will be making is the same sonobuoy system that was previously made in London prior to the strike which led the company to ship much of its product to the United States.

Can the minister confirm that information for the House? Would he therefore not like to reconsider his basic judgement that the Campbellford plant is doing new work that was not being done prior to this time in London, when the evidence suggests overwhelmingly that what is planned at Campbellford is exactly the same production that was previously done in London? That again leads to the conclusion that what we have here is a company that is moving its operation to a nonunion plant from a plant where collective bargaining and a collective agreement have been in place.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I stand by exactly what I said in the House when I gave the information. I related at the time that I was merely providing the information supplied to me by officials of Sparton of Canada. If that information is incorrect then they are the ones who have made the incorrect observation. I happen to think it was probably accurate. I am prepared to write and find out whether it is or not, and I am prepared to report the details to the member.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, the minister will be well aware of the rather strong differences that were expressed when that particular operation took place. It may very well be that the information given to the minister by the company was accurate at the time.

I would like to know what mechanism is in place within the ministry to follow up and keep a continuing check on situations similar to this one, so that what the minister was told five or six months ago continues to be correct and he is not just being sold a bill of goods after which they walk away and do something quite different. How does the minister know what the continuing effect is?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, if the honourable member is suggesting that we have some kind of cross-examination process whereby we go in and examine every two months the verification of any information provided by the company, we do not have that. We would have to rely on any complaint that might be raised by other people in this House or by people who work within the plant. Presumably that is the way in which this matter has come forward.

I am prepared to check into the matter further and find out if the information I had then is accurate today.

Mr. Rae: What has happened here is that the minister has simply transmitted to the House, holus-bolus, basically self-serving information from the company involved and he has ignored the information that has been forthcoming from the trade union and former executives of the company.

In the light of that fact, why does the minister not make a genuine inquiry, rather than simply going to the company and then transmitting that information to the House, holding it out to be absolutely correct when the information we are getting now is that the information coming from the company has been less than the whole truth?

Hon. Mr. Walker: The leader of the third party may be indicating that the officials of Sparton are lying, and if that is the case, we will obtain more information. I am not prepared to say they are lying. The information I had, I took to be true on face value. I cannot imagine that people would be sending me lies, but they may be and I will check it out. However, if they are telling the truth, perhaps the member who has raised this question may be prepared to make an apology for having said that of the people at Sparton in London.

HYDRO RATES

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Premier-in-waiting, the Minister of Energy, regarding Ontario Hydro's proposal to increase electrical rates by some 9.7 per cent this year and by some 33 per cent over the next three years.

The report by the Ontario Energy Board stated two years ago: "It is recommended that an examination of capital expenditure and cost controls be undertaken by the board in the near future." Again last year the board stated: "However, the board must admit that system costs are heavily impacted by the capital program and that little can be done by the board in the way of economy measures to reduce costs without effective participation in the determination of the system expansion program."

In view of this, will the minister instruct Ontario Hydro and the Ontario Energy Board, as a first priority, to hold hearings to examine Ontario Hydro's system expansion program and its effects on driving up electrical costs?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member knows—in fact, I think the advertisements are in the papers today; they were in yesterday—the Ontario Energy Board now has established some dates for its public hearings to review the proposal for the 1984 bulk rate. Therefore, the only matter before the Ontario Energy Board now will be the bulk rate for 1984.

I think it is important that we get this in proper perspective, because the speculation with respect to what rates may be in other years is not unlike what happened a year ago when we had all sorts of speculation on that subject, only to find that the rate request for 1984 was much less than that people were talking about a year ago.

As we know, the Ontario Energy Board will start its hearings the end of May, I believe.

There will be ample opportunity for the public generally to make their representations with respect to the proposal made by Hydro for their rates for 1984.

Mr. Kerrio: The minister must be aware that they were not willing to allow the energy board to delve into these programs.

In view of Ontario Hydro's $3-million "Go Electric" media campaign designed to bring back the "Live Better Electrically" era and to increase consumption by 3.7 per cent this year and four per cent next year—although the actual increase last year dropped to 0.8 per cent—I wonder whether, in Ontario Hydro's desperation to find markets for its large and growing surplus of electricity, the minister is going to continue to allow this kind of advertising program.

In view of Ontario Hydro's capital expansion decisions, which now are made in private, as the minister knows, will he charge the Ontario Energy Board, or probably a select committee of this Legislature, to review the financial perils of Hydro's present course? Does he not think it is time we reconstituted the select committee, which was the only time we ever saw into the workings of Ontario Hydro?

Hon. Mr. Welch: I think the member would be reasonable and fair enough to agree that at this moment in the province, when we look with some cautious optimism in so far as economic recovery is concerned, we should be very pleased that we have the electricity resource that we have in this province on which to build. I think it is to the credit of those who have been charged with the responsibility over the years, in so far as the public utility is concerned, that we are in such a strong energy position with respect to our electrical capacity.

If the member reads his own Niagara Falls Evening Review, he will notice the economic impact the Darlington operation is having right in his home city of Niagara Falls; the jobs that are there because of the contracts awarded to Provincial Engineering. That newspaper carried a picture of equipment leaving that great city, part of that great riding, and going to that particular project.

That is jobs, and that is the language the people want to hear. The public utility has kept pace with this and in fact is building its capacity so there will be a great degree of predictability that as Ontario continues in its economic recovery, we will have this great energy strength in our electrical system. I think Hydro is being very responsible, in so far as its program is concerned, in making sure the electrical option is well and clearly known to the people of this province.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, is it not then at this time that the minister himself should refer Hydro's capital expenditure program to the Ontario Energy Board, as was done in 1976, so we can have a full understanding of the cost structure that goes into the rates and stop this ad hoc, year-by-year jacking up of the rates when everyone from the public who wishes to participate is working in the fog because not all the facts come to light at the Ontario Energy Board hearings?

2:50 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, I hardly need remind my learned friend of the history of this public utility in this province, charged as it is with the mandate under the Power Corporation Act of providing electricity to its customers in this province at the lowest cost consistent with good business practice.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Power at cost: that has been the watchword, and I think we should be giving this utility far more credit for what it has done. Just look at its history of rates, all up for public review starting at the end of May.

LAYOFFS AT ALLEN INDUSTRIES CANADA

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Industry and Trade. With the announcement late last week of the sixth plant in Hamilton to be permanently shut down and the loss of 200 employees at Allen Industries Canada, I wonder whether the minister was aware of the decision to close permanently the Allen Industries fibre production plant in Stoney Creek, which was leaked last Thursday? If so, why did he not inform some of the local officials, who were taken by surprise by this announcement?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, maybe I am missing something here, but it seems to me the plant closed last December with the loss of the employees and did not close just last week. What the honourable member heard last week, which was apparently leaked out—I was not aware at the time that it was coming forward—was the decision that the company had rejected the request that it reconsider its position and reopen the fibre products plant.

They have continued, of course, with the trim plant, but I wonder whether perhaps the member has made a mistake and missed reading the newspaper last December, when in fact this plant closed. He must have overlooked it, because my understanding is that that is when it occurred. The announcement of it was back in September 1982; the closure was December 31, 1982. Has he missed these 200 employees in that period of time, or what has been the problem? I wonder if he could answer that.

Mr. Mackenzie: The answer to that is very simple. The minister well knows we had a layoff and a temporary shutdown last September, but we now have a permanent plant closure.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Mackenzie: Can the minister tell us—

Mr. Speaker: That is better.

Hon. Mr. Welch: That was December 31.

Mr. Mackenzie: The minister should talk to some of the local officials.

In as much as the production of this plant that remains, plus the replacement production for the auto industry, is now being moved by Dayco, the Daytona, Florida, head office of this company, to a plant in Illinois, can the minister tell us what he is doing to see that the production, which might result in the protection of the jobs of the workers, stays here in Canada and does not add to our deficit?

If he is not prepared to do something about the production and the decision of a branch plant once again to move the operation out of Canada, what is he going to do for the workers at Allen Industries?

Hon. Mr. Walker: It is actually being moved to Richmond, Virginia, not to Illinois. But there is a rationalization going on. There is a bit of sketchy information.

I talked to our people this morning, and the information from the Hamilton office is that they still feel optimistic that something can be done relative to an application under the industry and labour adjustment program. There have been considerable discussions now, and even though the announcement last Friday appears to close the door, there is still some feeling on the part of our Hamilton office that something can be done relative to the ILAP application, and of course our people are continuing to try to promote that and to continue the operation.

While there are 200 employees who regrettably are lost in this situation if the closure from December continues—and obviously it is continuing, by the sound of the announcement from last weekend—nevertheless, the trim plant is still going forward with the employees it has; I think it is about 140 employees. So there is some continuance of the operation there.

We hope that somehow ILAP can be involved in the process to encourage this plant to continue its operations here. That would be our goal. Our people still think with some optimism that it can be done. However, I think it was certainly disquieting to have the information of the review that came forward as of last weekend.

Ms. Coppins: Mr. Speaker, I am shocked that the minister should be speaking on behalf of the company and saying rationalization has caused the company to move to the United States. Is he not the Minister of Industry and Trade for Ontario? Why is it every time we hear of a plant closing in this province the minister stands in the House and justifies it on the basis of rationalization when these are jobs going outside the province and the country?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, that is a totally ludicrous question posed by the honourable member and she should know better. If she would pay attention, she would know better than to ask that kind of question. I was not defending the company position. The question was asked of me. The information I had was that it was a rationalizing process. I was imparting the best information I have. What would the member rather have me do? Would she have me impart some other information to her? I suppose she would.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Treasurer. He will recall that my leader asked a question about the expenditure on Suncor earlier this week. I am asking the minister a question about his advertising budget. For the second year in a row, the Treasurer has not cut his advertising budget. The figures show that in the past year he spent another $40 million on advertising and related activities in a year of restraint.

Will he give an undertaking to the House, one he would not give me last year, that he will cut the budget for advertising by two thirds or advocate that within the cabinet in order that he can meet his obligations, for instance, in the fields of the implementation of Bill 82, assisting municipalities with welfare costs, properly funding the health care system, assisting farmers or providing relief to taxpayers in this province?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, normally the division of gross allocations to ministries is done internally, not by the Treasury. I set an overall target for the policy fields, and they in turn allocate them to ministers, who break them up into the component parts of their budgets. Each year, for as long as I have been here, Management Board and Treasury have been charged with the responsibility of reallocating as pressures build on spending, usually in health care. We do that successfully by finding offsets within government.

I suppose it is in that area that the relative need to disseminate information is weighed against the relative need for any other government spending. It easily may be the member's opinion that we spend too much letting the public know something about the availability of programs, but I suspect most members of the House will have some calls this week, either of thanks or inquiry, from the senior citizens of the province who read the ads telling them they are getting half of last year's taxes back—

Mr. Bradley: They say spend it on administration.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Just a second. Many of them still call. Had we not had the ads in the paper explaining things, I am quite sure the member knows his own personal case load would have been much higher last week. It simply said: "This is the way it is. This is how much you get. These are the rules, and you can expect it thus and when." I am sure the member also knows that many—

Mr. Bradley: Does that cost $40 million?

Mr. Speaker: Never mind the interjections, please. Time is running out.

Hon. F. S. Miller: We send out something like $400 million to $500 million through these programs. The public has a right to know where to expect its money, when to expect it and how the program is designed. That is not advertising. It is too bad that, because we run a good government, every time we put any notice in the paper the members over there get all upset because they think we are beating them.

Mr. Cunningham: Mr. Speaker, surely the Treasurer is aware that in the course of one year the total advertising budget went from $26 million to more than $40 million. How can he seek to justify that? Could he and would he not be in a position as Treasurer to implement a restraint program with his ministries and suggest that each and every ministry cut its budget by 20 or 25 per cent? Is he not aware that General Foods spends only $23 million nationally and General Motors spends $24 million?

Does he not think his advertising expenditures are somewhat obscene?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I would only need to compare them to those of the federal Liberal government, which is the biggest single advertiser in Canada.

3 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question was, "Would the Treasurer not implement a restraint program?"

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, he was able to use the word "obscene." He asked, did I not think they were obscene. Was that not a question?

Mr. Speaker: No. The first question is the one we have to answer.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I thought I had my choice.

Mr. Speaker: No. The question was, "Would the Treasurer not implement a program of restraint?"

Hon. F. S. Miller: The spending in 1981 was $40 million. The spending in 1981-82 was $40 million.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, does the Treasurer not feel just a little bit embarrassed? Does he not feel—

Mr. Wrye: No. New question.

Mr. Foulds: Then he knows no shame at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Foulds: Does the Treasurer not recognize, if he knows no embarrassment, that there is a very real difference between self-serving advocacy advertising, which this government and the federal Liberal government have wholly and totally endorsed, and legitimate advertising which the public of Ontario needs about its government programs? Will he not at least cut back totally on his advocacy advertising?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, there were three questions. I do not feel the least little bit embarrassed to be a part of this great team over here under the leadership of the Premier (Mr. Davis).

PROCLAMATION OF ACT

Mr. Charlton: I have a question for the Minister of the Environment, Mr. Speaker. It has been three and a half years since the spills bill was passed and the major reason for the holdup in terms of proclamation has been the regulations.

Last fall, the draft regulations were widely circulated. His ministry has been receiving comments from industry and from environment groups. Can he give us some kind of an indication of his intentions in terms of the proclamation of that piece of legislation?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I would hope to do it as expeditiously as possible. There is one factor which is delaying it somewhat at the moment.

As the honourable member knows, we have received responses from quite a wide variety of people. One of the most prevalent concerns is related to the availability of insurance to provide adequate protection for haulers. We have retained an expert consultant in the insurance industry who is examining that for us. As soon as that information is available, I will make it available to the people who have responded to the material that was circulated. I would hope we could resolve the outstanding concerns and proceed with it quickly this spring.

ARTICLE IN NEWSPAPER

Hon. Mr. Gregory: Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege: A little earlier, the member for Erie (Mr. Haggerty) rose to his feet on a point of privilege to say that he had made certain statements that caused some controversy yesterday.

I had spoken to a reporter late yesterday afternoon and gave to him what was my opinion of what actually happened. In view of the statements by the member for Erie, I would like to offer my apologies to the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) for any embarrassment I may have caused.

Mr. Brandt: Mr. Speaker, I too was involved in the situation that was just described by the chief government whip. In the light of the clarification made today by the member for Erie, I would like to offer my unqualified apology to the member for Niagara Falls and indicate to him that it was a clear case of mistaken identity.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I too was involved in a discussion about that matter with the reporter and I too would like to offer my apologies to the honourable member.

Mr. Speaker: The co-operation is overwhelming.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, this whole series of apologies proves one thing: many of us here thought these people did not hear well and now we are convinced that they not only do not hear well, but they also do not see well.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

SMALL CLAIMS COURTS AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Norton, first reading of Bill 28, An Act to amend the Small Claims Courts Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, the amendments I am introducing today will cure a number of problems in small claims court practice which have come to light in recent months.

The bill will provide for interest to run on small claims court judgements in the same manner and at the same rate as interest currently runs on judgements of the Supreme Court and county and district courts.

The bill will also clarify the right of a small claims court agent to file an execution against land in the sheriff's office as a step in the enforcement of the judgement.

The bill also makes provision for claims to be served, where necessary, by a combination of service on an adult member of the defendant's household together with mail service. This new method of service has been tested in the provincial court, civil division, in Metropolitan Toronto and has proved to be effective and time saving.

The bill also makes several other minor amendments.

ESTATES ADMINISTRATION AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. McMurtry moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Welch, first reading of Bill 29, An Act to amend the Estates Administration Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reintroduce today a bill to amend the Estates Administration Act. This is substantially the same bill that was introduced two years ago, but due to a shortage of legislative time I was unable to proceed with the legislation at that time.

As I indicated to the Legislature earlier, and I think most of the members are aware, during the past few years certain problems have been encountered in attempting to deal with the estates of persons dying in Ontario who leave beneficiaries in the Soviet Union and these concerns have been brought to the attention of my ministry.

It appears that exorbitant charges by the Soviet government or its agents and a low exchange rate for conversion of dollars into roubles result in a beneficiary receiving less than the amount he should receive.

While it is clear that Ontario legislation cannot by any means completely rectify such problems, we should attempt to prevent, if not substantially alleviate, such abuses.

A private member's bill, Bill 8, has also been introduced recently by my colleague the Justice critic for the Liberal Party, the member for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt). Although Bill 8 is an attempt to alleviate these problems, its confiscatory nature makes it impossible for me to give it my support.

The Estates Administration Amendment Act 1983 contains a provision whereby a court order is required before money can be paid out of an estate in Ontario to a beneficiary in certain countries to be designated by regulation.

The provision is based on legislation in the United States, such as subsection 22(18) of the Surrogate Courts Procedure Act of New York, under which a surrogate court may withhold payment of money unless it is satisfied that the claimant will have the "benefit or use and control" of it.

Money can properly be withheld if it appears that its full value will not reach the beneficiary by reason of various fees and taxes and an unrealistic exchange rate.

A further provision in the Estates Administration Amendment Act 1983 requires a person who receives property in respect of which an order has been made as agent, solicitor or signee to file a report to the surrogate clerk for Ontario in a form and containing such information as will be prescribed by regulation. If the property is transferred directly to a foreign beneficiary, the personal representative must file such a report.

3:10 p.m.

POLISH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Ruprecht: Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the very significant day of May 3 in Polish history and the subsequent celebrations that will take place today.

The Constitution of 1791 brought in many new reforms, such as the elimination of class distinctions, the protection of the individual under the law, parliamentary representation and freedom of religion. The Constitution of 1791 is regarded as one of the most progressive and advanced constitutions of the time in Europe. It is considered by Poles as marking the political and moral rebirth of the Polish nation.

Tonight the Polish flag will be raised at Toronto city hall as a symbol of the continuing struggle for the freedom and independence of Poland. I would hereby like to give notice to every member who would like to attend tonight's flag-raising ceremony to lend his or her support to the struggle for freedom and independence for Poland.

THRONE DEBATE SCHEDULE

Hon. Mr. Gregory: Before the orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, the House leaders had agreed to divide the time equally during the throne speech debate up to the time of the final speakers, which will occur on Thursday. At this point Mr. McFedries, the Assistant Clerk, tells me that the time remaining will allow everybody a total of about six hours and three minutes to six hours and five minutes.

As it works out, the Progressive Conservative Party has two hours left, the Liberal Party one hour and the New Democratic Party two hours. The whips have agreed to go by this schedule, and I ask the clerks to co-operate in that timing. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it would be in order to ask the Clerk or you to intercede when the time has been used.

Mr. Speaker: I think there is something wrong with the arithmetic.

Hon. Mr. Gregory: Those were the total times as supplied by the Clerk.

Mr. Speaker: Okay.

Hon. Mr. Gregory: It would be plus another 15 minutes, right?

Mr. Speaker: Right.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. Conway: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: For the record more than anything else, my colleague the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk (Mr. Nixon), who was in the midst of a rather lively and, many of us felt, quite interesting intervention yesterday, is unfortunately not able to be here with us to conclude it this afternoon. I just wanted to have the record indicate that he is with the other two House leaders, dark in the recesses of this building, contemplating ways and means of altering the rules.

So on the member's behalf I just wanted to clear that for the record, lest anyone who reads the proceedings of this place wonder why he concluded his remarks as he did last night.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the throne speech debate and I extend to you my courteous greetings on your continuing in the chair of this assembly during this session.

I intend today to limit my remarks entirely to the topic of what has become known as the Norcen affair. Mr. Speaker, I know you will recall that last Friday I tried unsuccessfully to persuade you that this was a matter of urgent public importance, so I rise now on the first occasion available to me to pursue my concerns with respect to that affair.

There are two questions in the Norcen affair. Was a false issuer bid circular issued by Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. on October 27, 1981? Did Mr. Conrad Black influence the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) or the Ontario Securities Commission in their consideration of this question?

Conrad Black and his brother Montegu Black can be safely said to control Norcen. The report of the investigation by staff of the commission says, "Conrad Black has stated that if the criterion of control is the power to control the policies of Norcen if he wished to do so, then he does control the company." Mr. Black has brought his influence to bear in private meetings and conversations and in public comment. I am speaking of influence, not—and I repeat, not—of corruption or bribery, or money changing hands, or promises of future benefits for present favours or anything illegal.

The Norcen board on October 16, 1981, authorized the purchase by the company of up to 4.99 per cent of its issued common shares through the facilities of the Toronto and Montreal exchanges. The issuer bid circular was dated October 27, 1981, mailed to its shareholders on October 28 and 29 and filed with the commission on November 4. It was signed by Edward G. Battle, president and chief executive officer, and certified in paragraph 8, "There are no material changes or plans for material changes in the affairs of Norcen which have not been generally disclosed."

In paragraph 7, under the caption "Material Changes," the circular stated, "Norcen has no present plans or proposals for material changes in its affairs, including no plans or proposals to liquidate, sell, lease or exchange all or substantially all of the assets of Norcen or to amalgamate Norcen with any body corporate or to make any other major changes in the business, corporate structures, management or personnel of Norcen." The circular contained no reference to Hanna Mining Co. or to the ownership by Norcen of shares of Hanna Mining Co.

On October 26, 1981, Norcen owned 203,700 shares of Hanna. On October 27, 1981, Black was informed by Jim Connacher of Gordon Securities that a block of 580,000 Hanna shares was available. On October 28, 1981, Norcen bought these shares, bringing its total ownership to 783,700 shares, or 8.8 per cent. The securities commission has mishandled its consideration of the first question by the illegality of its proceedings and no longer has any jurisdiction to determine whether misrepresentation took place.

Moreover, the conclusion reached by the commission raises serious concerns. The charge of misrepresentation under the Securities Act cannot now be laid. The act provides that every person or company who makes a statement in any issuer bid circular required to be filed or furnished under the act or the regulations that, at the time and in the light of the circumstances under which it is made, is a misrepresentation, is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to a fine or imprisonment or both.

"Misrepresentation" means an untrue statement of material fact or an omission to state a material fact that is required to be stated. "Material fact" means a fact that significantly affects or would be reasonably be expected to have a significant effect on the market price or value of the securities.

The first question continues to be investigated by the Metropolitan Toronto Police with the advice and assistance, and indeed under the direction, of the crown law office of the Ministry of the Attorney General to determine whether charges should be laid under the Criminal Code. The answer to the first question must, therefore, await the conclusion of that investigation, now entering its second year, and the report of the Attorney General to this assembly. The Attorney General advised me by letter dated March 17, in response to a question I asked him in the assembly on February 21, that the police investigation may be finished by mid-May, but it may well take longer.

Why did the second question ever arise? It arose because of an ill-advised meeting in mid-May 1982 of the Attorney General and his senior civil law advisers with Mr. Conrad Black and Mr. F. A. M. Huycke, QC, a partner of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt and a director of Norcen.

3:20 p.m.

It was ill-advised because if an audience with the Attorney General was to be given he should have been properly briefed. Had he been properly briefed and had he asked for a pre-meeting memorandum or a letter from Mr. Black or Mr. Huycke about the serious allegations which were going to be made at the meeting, the meeting would not have taken place.

The meeting disclosed a police investigation under way by the Metropolitan Toronto Police. Indeed, a search warrant had been executed shortly before the meeting at the offices of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt.

Serious allegations were made about a lawyer in the ministry, Mr. Brian Johnston, who had been advising the Metropolitan Toronto fraud squad officers who initiated the police investigation. This reflected on the police officers conducting the investigation.

This meeting precipitated a flurry of activity within the Ministry of the Attorney General. In the event, Mr. Johnston was removed from the investigation and Mr. Harry Black, no relation, was assigned to the investigation. Mr. Roderick McLeod, then head of the crown law office and now Deputy Solicitor General, had a series of meetings with officers of the fraud squad and officers of the Ontario Securities Commission, as well as internally.

These serious allegations, which were not put in writing, were found to be groundless. This flurry of activity raised apprehension that the Metropolitan Toronto fraud squad was being told to lay off. It was as a result of this activity and these concerns that I questioned the Attorney General and his senior advisers during the consideration of his estimates before the standing committee on administration of justice on December 15, 1982.

My own information substantiated the response of Mr. Roderick McLeod at that time that no pressure was brought to bear on the Metropolitan Toronto Police to back off and, as I have said, the police investigation, of which we await the results, continues.

Mr. Huycke and Mr. Conrad Black should have been required to make their allegations formally in writing and whatever internal investigations were then required could have taken place. I accept that the Attorney General had no further meetings with Mr. Black. I await a full explanation at an appropriate time about the removal of Mr. Johnston from any role in the investigation. While there were questions of propriety about what Mr. Black and Mr. Huycke did in seeking the meeting, they did nothing wrong.

I turn now to the securities commission and its role in this affair. I have said the commission has mishandled the affairs by the illegality of its proceedings and there now are serious questions about its conclusion.

On Friday, April 22, in the debate on interim supply, I referred to the relevant parts in sections of the Securities Act and there is no need to repeat them.

The commission is charged with the administration of the Securities Act. That act lays out a broad scheme for the regulation of the securities industry implementing the two purposes of the Kimber commission to which the minister referred on Thursday last in his statement to the House. The day-to-day administration of the act is carried out principally by the director by delegation.

There are, however, two separate and distinct functions which the commission cannot delegate, which only it can discharge and which it can discharge only in accordance with the precise prescriptions of the statute, part V, administrative proceedings, reviews and appeals, and part VI, investigations.

There is an investigation by the commission into allegations that anyone has broken the act or the Criminal Code in relation to trading in securities, and the decision whether or not "it appears to the commission that any person or company may have" done so is a judicial proceeding—quasi-judicial in the language of administrative law—not an administrative proceeding.

This distinction is the single most essential distinction known to administrative law. In the Securities Act, this assembly granted the commission wide investigative and inquisitorial powers. These are the powers set out in part VI, investigations. They are not—and I repeat, not—available to the commission in any other part of the act. These powers may be exercised only upon the basis of a sworn statement.

The commission is a creature of the statute. It is a creature of this assembly. It is accountable to this assembly. This assembly has said clearly and unequivocally to the commission: "The special circumstances of the integrity of the securities markets so far as they are within the jurisdiction of this assembly requires you to have extraordinary powers. These powers shall be exercised as the statute requires and in no other way." We have said to the commission, "The public interest requires that you have these powers." We have said to the public that these powers can only be exercised in accordance with the code of procedure we have established.

The commission did not so act. It ignored part VI of the act which is its sole authority. It acted illegally in its investigation.

The commission has no prosecutorial discretion. If the evidence is there, the commission must so report to the minister. It is mandatory. Prosecutorial discretion, as the Attorney General well knows, having expressed it in what has now become a classic statement made in this assembly in his decision not to prosecute Francis Fox, is a discretion exercisable after there is the evidentiary basis to proceed. The commission has no such discretion.

In the case of a charge of misrepresentation, only the minister has prosecutorial discretion. The minister has prosecutorial discretion after a report is received by the minister from the commission that an offence under the act or the code may have been committed.

If the commission had followed the procedures laid out in part VI, then I would not be speaking in this assembly today about this matter. It would be doubly so if, in following those procedures, the commission had dealt with possible offences under the act and the Criminal Code.

I have respect for the statutory procedures provided and for the integrity of the commission collectively and individually. The collective and individual failure to understand the commission's mandate is not a failure of the statute, it is a failure to understand the essential elements of administrative law.

The statement by the minister last Thursday and the correspondence tabled at that time now also raises serious concerns about the conclusion of the commission. There is obviously a serious difference of opinion between the crown law office and the commission staff on the one hand and the commission on the other.

The commission has stated in its letter to the minister of April 26:

"In the commission's view, there was not a 'material change' in the affairs of Norcen or a 'material fact' in relation to securities of Norcen within the meaning of the Securities Act until the board of directors of Norcen or the senior officers, in the belief that their decision would be confirmed by the board of directors, decided to implement a specific course of action.

"Thus in the view of the commission the material change occurred only when Norcen decided on a course of action: in this case, to make a tender offer for 51 per cent of the outstanding Hanna shares, disclosure of which was made in accordance with the act."

Mr. Conrad Black, Mr. Edward G. Battle and Mr. Montegu Black are the senior officers of Norcen. Mr. Black and his brother, Montegu Black, control Norcen. By virtue of that control, the senior officers would believe that a decision they made would be confirmed by the board.

We come back to the events leading up to and surrounding October 27, 1981. Did the commission direct its attention to whether, before or about October 27, 1981, these senior officers had made a decision to implement a material change in the affairs of Norcen in relation to Hanna? What was their intention when, at the time the issuer bid circular was signed and being mailed on October 27 and 28, 1981, they increased Norcen's holdings from 203,700 to 783,700 shares of Hanna?

3:30 p.m.

What light does the report of the investigating counsel of the commission shed on this question? The report is a lengthy one and is stated to be "informal." It consists of an index, a chronology of events from January 1979 to July 1982, the report itself of some 38 pages and in the form of a memorandum from investigative counsel G. W. Curran and David Knight to John F. Leybourne, deputy director, enforcement, of the Ontario Securities Commission, and a series of exhibits.

The investigation was instigated by the complaint of Davies, Ward and Beck, Canadian counsel for the Hanna Mining Co., on April 13, 1982.

The report recommended that charges of misrepresentation and other charges under section 118 be laid under the act. It contains the following extended comment:

"Reasons for believing the Securities Act and its underlying policies have been violated: An undisclosed intent and misleading statements.

"In August 1981, when Conrad Black and Battle commenced Norcen's purchase of Hanna shares, they told a representative of Dominion Securities that among their potential long-term objectives was an exchange of their Hanna shares for Hanna's holdings of Iron Ore—that is, Iron Ore Co. of Canada Ltd.—"or Labrador"—which I think is Labrador Mining and Exploration Co. Ltd.—"or both.

"At this time, Conrad Black had already discussed with the Humphrey family, the major Hanna shareholders, the possibility of allying with them to increase the Norcen position in Hanna on a friendly basis. He had spoken of a 'reciprocal relationship' between Norcen and Hanna (Hanna then owned 20 per cent of Labrador)," a company that was also controlled by Conrad Black and his brother, Montegu.

"Slightly less than one year later, Norcen had acquired 20 per cent of Hanna and Hanna's 20 per cent interest in Labrador. In a number of public disclosures during that period, Norcen stated only that its purchases of Hanna were for investment purposes: there was no mention of becoming the major shareholder of Hanna or of relieving Hanna of Labrador.

"In interviews with us"—that is, the investigating counsel for the commission—"the principals of Norcen have, no doubt sincerely, maintained their and the company's innocence of deception. We believe that they maintain this position because they are fixated on the two principal issues of the Cleveland litigation: whether Norcen intended to acquire 51 per cent of Hanna prior to announcing its tender offer in April 1982"—the actual report has made an error in saying it was April 1981—"and whether Norcen ever wished for anything other than a friendly entry into Hanna.

"We do not believe that these are the issues under the Ontario Securities Act. For us the questions are (1) whether Norcen and its officers intended their ultimate result of significant ownership of Hanna and of Labrador long before they attained it and (2) whether they made the disclosure of such an intention required by law.

"We are of the view that a strong case can and should be made in an appropriate forum that Norcen and certain of its individual officers broke the law by making false statements about, and omitting to disclose, an intention which constituted a material fact, and decisions which constituted material changes, within the meaning of the act.

"The case to be made is this: Conrad Black, some time prior to August 1981, concluded that Hanna was an appropriate subject for planning by Norcen. The company was somewhat known through its involvement in Iron Ore. Its major shareholders were apparently discontented with its new, nonfamily management; they were acquainted with Black and seemed favourable to him. Hanna's involvement in natural resources held potential for assisting to attain one of Norcen's admitted goals: the derivation of 25 to 33 per cent of its earnings from assets diversified in the United States by the end of this decade.

"Black undoubtedly wanted Norcen's arrival to be friendly; he told us he was well aware of the dangers of a contested fight for control of a US company. But after George Humphrey was taken on to the Hanna board, Black was told he should deal directly with Hanna management. We suspect that Black was aware how unwelcoming management would be. Immediately after his referral to the board by Humphrey, he began Norcen's Hanna purchases.

"We would argue that at this time the Black brothers and Battle intended to acquire about 20 per cent of Hanna, quite possibly in part from the Humphrey family (three Humphrey estates were then thought by Black to be selling off Hanna stock for succession duties) and hopefully with the acquiescence of management. We cannot see any value to Norcen in the original 4.9 per cent position, whereas 20 per cent ownership offered Norcen the advantages already set out, plus the benefits of Canadianizing one or two resource companies and equity accounting for the Hanna holding.

"The reference by Battle at the September 9 meeting"—I interpolate that as a meeting of the executive board of Norcen which took place in Calgary on September 9, 1981—"to an eventual possible 51 per cent position, while admittedly not a plan or intention at that point, indicates that the 4.9 per cent program was always seen in a context of acquiring a bigger stake; it was not a modest experimental investment but a step on the road to 15 or 20 per cent.

"The unexpected availability of the large block on October 27 provided an opportunity to accelerate the program. In spite of taking them public earlier than they wished (as Montegu Black said), and requiring them to exceed the authority given them by the executive committee, the Blacks and Battle quickly picked up the shares. They depicted this purchase to us as simply overshooting the 4.9 per cent mark but did not explain why, when they originally had anticipated taking several months to reach that point, they decided to jump far beyond it, at a price approximately $3 per share overmarket.

"We can see this decision as a step towards the larger goal, a concrete act in furtherance of an existing intention—which intention ought to have been disclosed in the notice of intention," or, I interpolate, issuer bid circular, "of October 27," in a press release and a form filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States, "and in all subsequent disclosure documents.

"The hostile reaction of the Hanna board on November 4 appears to have prompted both the commissioning of preliminary research into US takeovers prepared for Norcen in that month and Conrad Black's calling Louise Humphrey to sound her out. We suggest that Norcen would still have preferred quiet growth with the assistance of the Humphreys but was considering then that a tender offer might be necessary to prompt meaningful dialogue: as eventually it was. The Norcen people maintain that they always had an uncertainty about their ends; the evidence, however, is more consistent with an uncertainty only about the particular means to their ends.

"As we have indicated above, we are of the opinion that there is evidence for a respectable case that Norcen and certain of its officers have given to the public information with respect to Norcen's proposed investment in Hanna which was untrue and which was known to be untrue by the parties involved at the time it was disseminated.

"In brief, Norcen could be said to have disclosed through its spokespersons only an intention to acquire a modest investment in Hanna when its actual intention (at least of some of its principals) was to acquire possession of at least 20 per cent and possibly as much as 51 per cent of that company, and as well to acquire a significant—if not a control—position in Labrador or Iron Ore or both."

3:40 p.m.

The questions remain—and these are my questions: Was there a decision by the senior officers of Norcen on or before October 27, 1981, to take a significant position in Hanna? Was that decision a material change which, if disclosed, could reasonably be expected to have a significant effect on the market price or value of the common shares of Norcen?

The commission did not appear to confront or answer the question of evidence credibility. It is for these reasons that I have serious concerns about the conclusion of the commission.

It remains entirely and solely the responsibility of the Attorney General to restore public confidence that there is no such thing in our society's administration of justice as "influence in high places."

I do not underestimate the difficulty of the decision which the Attorney General will be called upon to make, whether or not to proceed with criminal charges. We are all aware, as Mr. Justice Martin said recently, of the stigma which attaches to any person charged with a criminal offence and the personal anxiety which this causes. I do not envy the Attorney General his responsibility.

Mr. Kennedy: Mr. Speaker, once again I am pleased to have an opportunity to make a few remarks in response to the throne speech.

Mr. Conway: Like Uncle Tom, do you think you will be Premier?

Mr. Kennedy: I have no plans to make any plans in that direction.

The throne speech was one that covered a wide variety of provincial issues. The underlying essence of it was the major thrusts towards recovery of the economy in putting people back to work. There are some interesting things going on out there in our economy.

I do not think there is any question that the major issue in Ontario and in Canada, and one could easily go beyond our borders as well, is economic recovery. The federal budget is a step in this recovery. I had some difficulty in leaping for joy the way certain people in the business community have, though I give credit for the incentives and encouragement that are provided to business in the short term, which I hope will turn into a stabilizing recovery that will continue in the years ahead.

What worried me was the increase in the federal deficit of some 26 or 28 per cent. Somewhere along the road this has to be paid off, although we have been saying that for years and we seem to keep going merrily along with increasing deficits. It has always been my understanding that when one has a debt, at some point along the way one has to account for that.

I have certain reservations about the technique used, but we will certainly applaud the incentives that have been given to business and hope they will provide the spark and incentive to turn things around.

In the federal budget speech the issue of jobs was addressed. The provincial government recognizes that this is an area of great concern, which is why our own throne speech made reference to it.

I have had some words of encouragement from people in business and industry. For example, last Thursday the Ontario Research Foundation held a seminar in which I had the privilege of participating. People in both small and large businesses in Mississauga were invited to come. There was a response from 70 or 80 people who came from a wide variety of small businesses, and a note of optimism permeated the meeting. This was encouraging.

I know things such as this—there are others I will touch on in a minute—are cold comfort to the person who simply does not have a job. But if there is this encouragement, this expansionism in industry, the end result and the spinoff from these various industries make for more jobs.

Another interesting event, held at noon today, was an announcement by Xerox at Ontario Place. They unveiled some new photocopiers and other products. They have a plant in Mississauga, it so happens, at the research foundation location. I note in the press release that Xerox Canada embarked on a vigorous Canadian value-added program nine years ago. At that time, there were only 14 employees in the manufacturing division. Today, more than 450 are working there. These are some of the additional jobs that have been created in Ontario and are mentioned from time to time by the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) and the Premier (Mr. Davis).

These are in the area of high technology and the production of computers and so on. One of the things I have been advocating is a program of training people in high technology, the software industries and so on. Such a program would be one of the best hopes for the future in training and retraining.

In the past I have mentioned the need to take a very hard look at matching the need for jobs with those jobs that are available, training our young people and retraining others who are out of work because of the changed economy and production so that these jobs will be available to them. This would seem to be one of the best hopes for our young people and others today.

I want to address a very sensitive problem that has been discussed in this House from time to time, the question of nuclear disarmament. It is not really within the ambit of provincial jurisdiction, or it has not been, but we are people too. We are Canadians. We are most interested in this.

There are very vocal activists in our western democracies who demonstrate in various ways and publicize their great concern over the nuclear weapons buildup. They, of course, advocate disarmament. That is all very well, and I agree with that, but not in any unilateral fashion. A call by these demonstrators for disarmament by the west, seems to me to be missing in what I hear from demonstrations by those deeply concerned individuals.

3:50 p.m.

There is no doubt, if a void is made, the Russians will move in. There is an interesting quote from an article in the Sun regarding Valentyn Moroz, who spent nine years in Soviet prisons: "Anti-nuclear protesters are naïve if they believe the Soviets won't take advantage of western disarmament, a former Ukrainian political prisoner says." That, to me, is the key. If we can get the same message across in the eastern bloc of countries, then perhaps there would be some meaningful progress towards arms reduction.

The article quotes Moroz as going on to say that "demonstrators should picket in Moscow as well as in Toronto for peace and if they did, 'they would be arrested like I was.'" He also sends out the warning that "the Soviet Union would use western anti-nuclear sentiment to gain the upper hand."

There is a warning there. It is a concern I certainly share. I have as great a horror as anybody of nuclear war, or any other kind of war for that matter. One can think of the horrors of napalm flame-throwers and other conventional weapons and the horror and tragic cost of wars in general. With a nuclear war, obviously no one will win.

It was of some concern to me last fall when this question was placed on a municipal ballot. The vote came back at around 75 or 80 per cent support for disarmament. As I read a few reports, which were not all-encompassing or deeply researched, this seemed to be the overview of what transpired. The question must have been placed in some context that confused the voters who responded to it. For instance, I would have thought that 99.9 per cent plus of the respondents would be opposed to nuclear war, although that was not the question, and would be supportive of nuclear disarmament. It did not come through that way.

If the question included disarmament by all nations, I cannot conceive who would oppose it. I do not think any sane person either in an eastern or western nation would be opposed to that. I do not think citizens of any nation wish for war. If their leaders could get together and respond to what the people want, certainly we would be in for an era of peace and harmony.

As I have mentioned, there is no question that Russia has expansionist and imperialist ideas.

We know that. The Russians have demonstrated them. Afghanistan is one of the latest examples, as well as the mid-European countries. They make mischief in Africa and so on.

If they really want to give evidence that they are non-aggressive, why do they not pull out of Afghanistan? That would be an encouraging sign to both east and west, if it were verified and if it were not done in some fashion that such a withdrawal was simply a ploy to cause us in the west to let down our guard, because one thing the Russians do understand is strength and firmness. But the west must show integrity and honesty in negotiations.

I am reminded of when they moved into Cuba with their missiles. Jack Kennedy demonstrated the effectiveness of a policy of firmness and integrity when they placed those rockets there. He laid it on the line and as a result, they pulled out.

Think if those armaments were in place there today, 90 miles off the coast of the United States. Firmness was shown and it was obvious to them that this was not going to be allowed to go on. When they were withdrawn, the possibility of war diminished.

In my view, it is somewhat sad that right now the best possibility of preventing nuclear war or any other kind of war is to maintain military strength, military capability and a balance of power. I am one who advocates disarmament, but it has to be on a bilateral or multilateral basis. That is the message we have to get through to Moscow. We do not want to find ourselves with a modern-day Munich. We simply must match strength with strength.

Maybe it is a little naïve, but our own town of Mississauga has a twinning arrangement with a city in Japan. I guess it is encouraging that other cities in Canada do that. There is at least one in Alberta; there may be more. If we can do that, citizens of each nation could then get together.

Maybe it is a hopeless pipedream but, on the other hand, maybe it would be a small step towards showing some faith. The fact that we have the abhorrence of war that I am sure they do could be a small step towards harmony between east and west. I do not know, but these thoughts come to one who has a deep concern for our own nation and our own people, for this generation and for succeeding generations.

In any event, I am closing these few remarks to say that we must keep our western strength at a high level, because it is a time to remember who our friends are while we continue to work for peace on a bipartisan, sincere, genuine, verifiable basis.

I want to turn back for a moment to a subject mentioned earlier, the economy. I believe the recession has bottomed out, but it is going to be a long, hard pull to get back to a satisfactory employment and economic plateau.

As has been indicated, the unemployment rate may run at a higher level than we enjoyed during the so-called good years of the past decade and more. I do not need to say these difficult times disfigure our economic stability and, accordingly, our social stability, but I see signs of a turnaround in housebuilding. I believe, despite reservations about the federal budget and its large deficit, it will help give the thrust it should. It should be the leading effort towards recovery.

I had a gloomy forecast from an individual about so many young people out of work—and that is where the high rates of unemployment are—that possibly some young people never will be able to acquire jobs. Things have changed. It has been mentioned by some leading economists and politicians that instead of having an unemployment rate of three, three-and-a-half or four per cent, our way of life now is going to see six or seven per cent unemployed. That is cause for some despair.

With so many people coming on to the social programs, on public or social assistance, could we not move into an area where, through existing agencies, we could assist some of the elderly people who wish to remain in their own homes but who find the daily duties of home maintenance, the care that might be needed both within the house and outside, too onerous? This could be done on the basis of something like the foreign student programs, but this would be domestic. They might serve these elderly people and be paid for it and receive some benefits, some training and some experience in working in social areas.

This would have a two-point thrust. One, it would give meaningful responsibilities, work and duties to persons who otherwise are idle. There is nothing worse than idleness. Two, it would enable people to stay in their homes longer, rather than having to go into our overcrowded rest and retirement homes.

Mr. McClellan: Decent jobs with decent wages.

Mr. Kennedy: Relatively decent wages, whereby those who are attracted to it could combine it with work and work experience. Anything one learns can often open a door. The more experience a person has and can show on a résumé, the more opportunities may come about. It might be just that small, little extra that will get a young person into a career.

There is another suggestion I would like to put forward. As I travel along Highways 401 and 400, I note there is a very limited number of service centres. This is not the first time this matter has been raised in this chamber. We should get more competition out there and I think more opportunities should be provided. Such competition would be of benefit to tourists, to our tourism industry and to motorists.

It would start construction projects going and the spinoff from construction is tremendous. It would also be of great benefit to consumers. It could have a great appeal to tourist traffic coming into the province. There should be such facilities adjacent to more of these interchanges. I would like to see a forecast, some study or survey done, which would project the number of jobs that might spin off from that. I think there would be a considerable number.

We would have a response to the free market—that draws some attraction from the opposition. The free market would be at work. The competitive spirit would be at work. There would be benefits from the materials used in construction, ongoing jobs, the provision of consumer products such as accommodation and so on to the facilities.

There is one other subject I want to touch on and that is the provision of parking for handicapped persons. Last week I introduced, for the second or third time, a bill which would put in place some authority whereby parking for the handicapped would be provided across the province on a mandatory basis.

I did not know I had such empathy with the opposition party member for Halton-Burlington (Mr. J. A. Reed). The member made reference to the fact there is now a special licence plate.

Interjection.

Mr. Kennedy: I will not overdo this. I don't want to have remonstrations from our own whip, so I promise him I will not get carried away. It was a very good move by the Ministry of Transportation and Communications to provide licence plates for those handicapped who drive cars. That is very good, but what it does not do, of course, is ensure a parking space for those persons who want to park. There is a need to define the issue of parking spots. Right now it is done on a municipal basis and some shopping centres provide this service on a voluntary basis, but I have had complaints about spaces being taken up by other cars.

There is also a problem if, for instance, one of us were to drive a handicapped person in our car to a shopping plaza. The car is not designated as being owned by a handicapped person. I would like to see each person who is eligible for such a parking facility have a form of identification which can be placed on the dashboard or visor which will give access to such a space to the person rather than the vehicle.

I hope the minister responsible, the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett), will take a look at this with a view to adding that extra bit that will mean so much to the people who are in need of those facilities. These facilities should be provided when the need is there for them. Not having them there, having them occupied by someone else, or having a limitation on them because when the handicapped people are being taken to whatever activity they are attending they are unable to be brought out at the proper door, does not help the people who have a need for these facilities.

With those few remarks I will close out by returning for a moment to the throne speech. On page 7, it says of the upcoming government programs, "Measures will be introduced to contribute to an enduring economic recovery which will create the jobs necessary to allow all Ontarians to lead productive lives, to strengthen the management of the province's affairs, and to respond to the critical concerns and needs of Ontarians."

Our throne speech is about our economic programs and I hope they will run in sympathy and empathy with the federal budget, which they describe as a national recovery program. I would like to be excused for a little cynicism, but halfway through the handouts that Mr. Lalonde was offering it occurred to me that maybe it is a Liberal recovery program. Perish the thought.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to say a few words on behalf of the province and the great city of Mississauga.

NOTICE OF DISSATISFACTION

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Before I recognize the member for Windsor-Sandwich, I have an announcement of great interest to the House. Pursuant to standing order 28, the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) has given notice of his dissatisfaction with the answer to his question given by the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea) yesterday.

This matter will be debated at 10:30 p.m. this evening.

4:10 p.m.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks I would like to congratulate you on your promotion from the chairmanship of the standing committee on members' services to the chairmanship of the standing committee on social development. I trust your onerous task as chairman of that committee will be conducted in the same great, nonpartisan manner as in your previous task.

Mr. Conway: Where did Mr. Shymko go?

Mr. Wrye: He went to members' services and I have asked to be removed from that committee.

I want to suggest first, in making my remarks, that I appreciate the remarks of the previous speaker from the Conservative benches in so far as they gave proper praise and attention to the budget of my federal friend the Minister of Finance.

I wish I could reciprocate by saying I could find something of value in the speech from the throne. I have heard many as a journalist and this is my third as a member of this assembly. I regret this speech from the throne is perhaps the worst I have ever heard, either as a provincial member or a journalist, coming either from a provincial assembly or a federal assembly. There is absolutely nothing in this speech, just as there appears to be absolutely nothing this government has to offer the people of Ontario.

The months of neglect and negligence are turning into years. As my leader has suggested, it may turn into a decade of decline. As I stand in my place on this Tuesday of what some believe may be a momentous week in terms of the political climate of this province and this country, it seems to me one of the reasons the speech from the throne was so lacking in initiative is that there has been little initiative by this government as it awaits a decision by its leader, which I hope will be taken soon so that we can get back to the business of getting some progress in this province.

I want to speak on a number of issues in my remarks today. Perhaps a good place to start would be the bicentennial, because it is something the government has certainly not neglected. It is something which I think has added to the level of cynicism a great many people in this province feel.

Rather than use my own remarks, I want to plagiarize and read to the members a letter I received from a constituent of mine. It says it so much better than I could. The letter is dated April 20.

"Dear Sir:

"It has come to my attention that in 1984 the provincial Conservative government intends to celebrate a bicentennial—to the early Loyalists who came to Canada to escape the American Revolution—and to spend $11 million to have a party.

"They had better get their facts first. The Loyalists did migrate to Canada during 1789 to 1791. Those wealthy gentry, 3,300, purchased their passage back to England, leaving the others to live prudently within frugal means. A United Empire Loyalist association was formed in Upper Canada in 1897. Therefore, this provincial government is historically incorrect in advising this event for 1984."

Now we get to the pertinent part. "Question: Is this a political ploy to have this happy party one year before an election, a coincidence?" I leave that to the members to answer. "It is appalling for any government to spend $11 million for such a reason during these poor economic times. It has no justification whatsoever."

As I said, I am just reading this nice lady's letter.

"Eleven million dollars could be put to better use in establishing 11 factories in 11 financially strapped communities in Ontario, by building up a 100-man work force, taking people off unemployment and making them taxpayers, and putting commemorative brass or nickel plates on the doors or walls of these factories saying, 'In memory of the early Loyalists,' etc."

This lady has more ideas than this government.

"Question: Is the present government going to borrow this $11 million from the Bank of Canada to have this party? If this is true, then the residents of Ontario have a right to know about this future debt. Lord, even a minted coin would be sufficient and much easier to swallow." It is signed, "An ordinary homemaker" and she has underlined "Eleven million dollars!" This is not in my riding, but I certainly endorse and understand the reasons for her frustration and the reason she would write that letter in the first place.

I want to address a variety of issues, and I will start with the issues I have direct responsibility for as the Labour critic for the Liberal Party and as women's critic for the party. I will not address all the issues, but I will touch on three. The first is the promise in the speech from the throne—and it was perhaps the only substantive thing that came from the throne speech—that we are going to get a senior minister responsible for women's issues with a complete mandate to review, initiate, direct and promote policies favourable to and in support of women in Ontario society.

Since the throne speech, we have had no indication that such a minister is about to be named, but I will wait in breathless anticipation to see which of the progressive Tories over there will be handed this task of burying and obfuscating issues that are of so much concern to so many.

Mr. Laughren: Either Henderson or Gregory.

Mr. Wrye: I will not even speculate on names. It would be unfair to speculate on names. I might suggest some minister who would be in some way progressive and that would immediately rule out that minister.

When that minister is named and when that legislation is in place, let me suggest that the new women's minister could start by having a little look at the annual report of the women crown employees office. It points out that in 1982-83 the wage gap for women crown employees was reduced by 1.6 per cent. The minister has taken considerable pride in pointing out that the gap has now been narrowed to the extent that women get 73.6 per cent of men's wages within the Ontario civil service.

What is a more important number, and I will explain why in a minute, is the number of female executives within the Ontario civil service, which has increased by a much smaller proportion, from 6.3 per cent to 6.9 per cent. The total number of women who fill senior executive positions in the Ontario civil service numbers a grand total of 40.

I suspect the reason we have had something of a narrowing of the gap is not so much because of the affirmative action policies of this government, and of each ministry within this government, but because the collective agreements the Ontario Public Service Employees Union was able to negotiate, and which were implemented during the year just past, allowed for some narrowing of the gap. The collective agreements that were negotiated presented fairly substantial wage increases.

I suspect we will find in this coming year there will be a significant slowing of the narrowing process. I suggest that because there is no indication from any of the figures I have seen in the report that the narrowing of the gap had anything to do with women moving up within the civil service structure, which is the goal the government ought to have established some time ago.

If I were to suggest just a couple of matters for the senior minister who is ultimately appointed to handle women's issues within this government, the first matter that must be addressed is equal pay legislation. That has been promised for some time and yet no legislation has come forward. Quite significantly, there was no mention of it in the speech from the throne other than as one area this minister might look at.

A second area that ought to be of great concern to the minister, whoever he or she may be—and I will just use this second one briefly—is the government's dismal record in its voluntary affirmative action program. I remember speaking at length on this last fall during the estimates and addressing a number of questions to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay), and I urged the new minister to look at the updated figures.

The figures that were presented to us indicated that in the 850 largest companies in Ontario, after six or seven years this grand affirmative action program that the government has put together has managed to attract some affirmative action initiative from some 225 firms. Indeed, the worst offenders—and it really quite appalled me—are the so-called public firms which are receiving a great deal of their money from the taxpayers, and I would include among them municipalities, school boards and the like. I thought it was a particularly dismal record and it is a concern that the new minister of women's issues must address right at the outset.

I want to return to the throne speech of a year ago and see if I can refresh the memory of the House by reading a brief excerpt from it. This is the throne speech of March 9, 1982.

"Ontario will continue to seek fairness and balance in management-labour relations throughout the province. As a result, in consultation with the ministries of Labour and Industry and Trade Development, measures to provide protection for employees under the Employment Standards Act will be advanced in such areas as unjust dismissal and protection of severance pay."

I think those who were expecting this legislation should get that aspect of the speech framed. Significantly, this year that promise was not even mentioned, yet all of us know that in these very difficult economic times there has been an increased need, not a decreased need, for tough new legislation to protect employees throughout the province, particularly those who are not given the protection of the trade union movement, from unjust dismissal.

Too often constituents who are not covered by collective bargaining agreements have come to my office with very sad cases of unjust dismissal, and the amount of money that can be garnered from the employer in these cases is, as members of the assembly know, minimal.

I want to offer the House some specific numbers to show the inadequacy of the present severance pay legislation. I should point out that I have introduced a private member's bill that addresses one small aspect of it; I hope to introduce other bills as the session progresses. I introduced the legislation, as most honourable members do, not so much to pretend that we on this side are playing government as to signal to the minister that there is a problem and a very grave concern that needs to be rectified.

Figures we received from Harry Shardlow, who is in the plant closure and adjustment section of the Ministry of Labour, indicate that between January 1, 1981—and the legislation we passed in 1981 was retroactive—and September 30, 1982, in regular cases, which I would describe as being nonbankruptcy, nonreceivership cases, the number of employees who were terminated according to the current severance pay legislation was 4,540. Of that number, under the government's current legislation only 1,865 were eligible for severance pay, and those cases came to a grand total of 35.

I will point out—and I want to be fair—that the number of employees who actually received benefits was 3,196, so clearly some employers chose in spite of the legislation to be more generous. It is very interesting that the business community would recognize in some way the inadequacy of the legislation but that this government will not.

Even more bothersome was the number of employees terminated in bankruptcy and receivership cases. There were a total of 20 of those which fell under the purview of this legislation. The number of employees who were terminated in these instances totalled just over 3,000—3,012, to be exact.

The number eligible for benefits under the government's program was only 1,700, again just barely over half. The number of employees who actually received benefits, and this is truly disturbing, was zero. Not one employee. It seems to me it is high time this minister and this government sat down and re-examined the severance pay legislation and brought in the appropriate changes. Clearly the legislation that the former Minister of Labour said would establish a floor of protection for all employees across this province has certainly not done that.

I want to turn to some health issues, if I might, for a minute. I want to do so in the knowledge that the budget will be coming down about this time one week from today. The first issue I want to touch on is the issue of user fees.

There has been some talk emanating from this government, talk which is accompanied by the usual fed-bashing, that perhaps we will have to bring in user fees for those who are unfortunate enough to go into the hospitals of this province, and the reason we will have to do so is that Ottawa is strangling the health care system.

I always find it rather humorous that this government, which has strangled the health care system itself, which strangled the post-secondary education system, now accuses Ottawa, which simply wishes to get things back into balance, of strangulation. I mean, after all, 55 cents out of every dollar is really quite adequate.

I wanted to read a brief comment from Mr. Gordon Cunningham, the executive director of the Ontario Hospital Association, because I thought it was very enlightening. He says, in a very recent For Your Information, dated April 20: "At our liaison meeting with the Minister of Health yesterday our president pointed out that to be cost effective user fees would need to be very substantial. Obviously this would have the potential of generating social and political backlash"—you had better believe that—"i.e. taxing the sick, the disabled, poor and the aged population. However, unless hospitals could charge a substantial amount, we do not see any justification for collecting user fees.

"On the other hand, modest user fees would produce relatively little revenue and have little or no impact on decreasing utilization. Except for emergency visits, patients do not decide whether or not they will be admitted to hospital. Further, imposition of modest user fees could raise collection and administrative costs. Hospitals do not need additional costs thrust on them at this time."

I would hope that the words of Mr. Cunningham would have reached the ears of the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) and that he will have managed to talk his friend the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) out of any suggestion that we will follow the very ill-timed and ill-advised lead of Alberta, which also has a Conservative government, in bringing user fees into our hospital system. They are simply unfair. They are regressive and they speak to everything that would be mean in terms of our system of health care. It would be another gigantic step back in a system which has seen too many steps back in the last few years.

Mr. Cunningham: It is also a dumb idea.

Mr. Wrye: As my friend from Wentworth North suggests, it is also a dumb idea, but then again that is what bothers me about this government. Dumb ideas appear to be ideas which they have entertained in the years I have been here.

I also want to make a couple of comments on Ontario health insurance plan premiums. I want my friends to my left to understand the position of our party, since they so conveniently fail to understand the position of the party on this matter.

My leader pointed out very clearly—because once again, unlike our friends to my left, we do not try to play government; I know they do—there would certainly be some question in our minds, given the present restraint legislation, as to whether the government of Ontario would have any right to increase OHIP premiums by more than five per cent.

Those remarks and questions were asked after the Treasurer, once again verbally wandering through the course of his budget deliberations, suggested there might be OHIP premium increases far in excess of that amount. But it would be my view, and it is a view of our party, there should be no increase whatsoever in OHIP premiums in this budget. It is very clearly on the record that the view of our party is that we would gradually phase out premiums in this province, premiums which are now by far the highest in Canada, and would move those over to the more progressive taxation system.

On a number of occasions I have dealt with people in my riding who have needed assistance with premiums and I find the level of premiums which they are asked to pay on a very modest income, somewhere in the low teens in thousands, is really quite disgraceful.

I would hope the Treasurer would begin to understand it is absolutely unfair and, again, totally regressive to increase OHIP premiums. I for one would hope that we would not hear the Treasurer stand in his place and increase OHIP premiums because he needs to pay for the doctors' fee increase. He knows full well what he could have done with the medical profession. He could have done with them what he did with every other public servant in Ontario. It is a profession that is getting support from public tax dollars. One can call them independent businessmen, one can call them anything one wants, but the fact is, with the vast majority, their income is from the public sector and from the public purse. As such, they should have fallen under the restraint program.

There is absolutely no reason that they should have been exempted from the rollback considering that this government chose to roll back a number of other increases.

I understand that. I supported that very, very reluctantly. I understand that ultimately in my vote I obviously have a very honest difference of opinion with my friends to my left. But it seems to me that this government has—and I would suggest to some extent my friends on the left are being consistent as are we. The only inconsistent group is this present government.

While dealing with health issues, I would be remiss if I did not raise again an issue that has bothered me ever since I first ran for elected office. I promise this government I will raise it until they are out and we are in and then we will act on it. It is the need for a chronic care hospital in the city of Windsor.

I just want to read from a report in the Windsor Star, Wednesday, April 27, 1983; less than one week ago.

"It is now or never for a new chronic care hospital in Windsor," frustrated officials of Windsor Western Hospital said Tuesday.

"In an emotional appeal at Tuesday's hospital board meeting, board chairman J. E. Fettes said the Essex County District Health Council"—that appendage of the ministry—"has failed to understand the need to replace Riverview Hospital and he has little hope for support from the other four area hospitals.

"Every major community in this province has got a chronic care hospital either under way or already built. We don't."

And further on, "It seems that chronic care is relegated to second class or third class citizenship.” That remark is from the executive director of Windsor Western, James Broderick.

The chronic care facility in Windsor we have talked about, the 296-bed facility, has been on the drawing board and has been approved in principle for 12 years. Yet this government cannot find the funding necessary to give us that very long overdue and important facility.

It has gone on so long, the price tag has gone up to between between $25 million and $35 million. A lot of money, it is said. That is correct. It is a lot of money. Let me give two indications why it would be money well spent.

The old Riverview facility has no business being a hospital at all. It is a disgrace. It is one of the most disgraceful facilities this ministry has any jurisdiction over. That hospital will need $1 million in the next year just to upgrade fire and safety standards. Is that not wonderful in 1983?

If Riverview is to be used much longer, it will need at least another $7 million in renovations. That is almost one third of the cost of building a new building. Why do we not get on with the job of getting a new chronic care facility?

The other reason we should get on with the job is Riverview has only 150 beds. We are talking about a new facility which would have some 300 beds. By doing that, we could get rid of the great burden that has been placed on all the hospitals in Windsor of having improperly placed patients, chronic care patients in active treatment beds. That is a problem which the minister himself acknowledged in a letter to me. He acknowledged it has resulted on a number of occasions in patients lying for up to 72 hours in hallways or emergency wards, a situation that is surely intolerable.

As this board chairman said, and he is absolutely correct: “I do not accept there is a higher priority item in the province of Ontario than a new chronic care hospital for Windsor. I just do not accept that.”

He rejects the idea the province has no money for new projects, pointing out that three major hospital projects in Toronto went to tender in the last few days. I say to this government it is about time we got on with the job of giving Windsor the chronic care hospital this government promised 12 long years ago.

I want to speak briefly about the cancellation of the Ontario home renewal program. I learned about it not through any announcement by this government because, boy, when it cancels programs, it does not tell anybody about it. I learned almost by accident, through the municipality in which I reside and which I represent, that a program the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett) concurs in a letter to me has been a very effective program, was cancelled last year and $10.5 million of funding was taken out of the program.

In my letter to the minister, I pointed out this program is important for those in my community and all across this province, a goodly number in my community alone. There is a total of 300 applications now on file from those who need their houses brought up to minimum standards. We are not talking about Casa Lomas here. We are talking about houses that lack even the minimum standards designed by our community. It is important those houses be brought up to a minimum standard.

As well, we could put hundreds and thousands of people back to work if we were to restore this program. Yet this government blamed the cancellation of the program on the restraint program. The Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, in his letter to me, had the gall to say: “I understand Windsor now receives $10,000 to $12,000 per month in OHRP repayments. As you see, OHRP can continue.”

It certainly can, for one and a half applications a month. We have 300 on file. There are 175 of an emergency nature and the minister says that $10,000 a month will suffice. Maybe he ought to give up a few of his advertising bucks and start putting the money where we can create jobs.

4:40 p.m.

I just want to read the end of an editorial which the editor of the Windsor Star wrote on this matter.

“The government cites restraint as the justification for axing the program, but already it looks like a false economy.

“If substandard housing cannot be brought up to the minimum standards because the owners cannot afford it, and the construction industry is deprived of a healthy chunk of its business, it is inevitable that sooner or later there will be greater demands on provincially-funded social services.”

The only people this government, the great friend of business, of the small independent businessman, cares about are its advertising buddies who get more from this government.

I want to deal very briefly with two final items. The first is a problem which has been brought to my attention in my community, but it is a problem all members ought to be aware of and sensitive to. That is the fact this very generous government is not generous enough in terms of the welfare and social assistance areas. I am speaking specifically about the special assistance program now in place in so many municipalities.

I will read from a background report about my own municipality:

"Special assistance covers such items as special diets, cost of care and maintenance in a nursing home, prescribed drugs, surgical supplies and dressings, dental services, prosthetic appliances, vocational training, travel and transportation, moving and funeral and burial."

The list goes on.

In my own community, the social services department has been very understanding and very sensitive to many of the needs of my constituents—needs to literally put food on the table. The only problem with this is that this government, which has so much money for so many other things, has no money for special assistance.

Fifty per cent of the money is sent to the municipality under subsection 15(5) of the regulation under the General Welfare Assistance Act. The funding for special assistance is such that municipalities are reimbursed 50 per cent of the amounts paid to or on behalf of a person in need of special assistance by Ontario.

Conveniently, that is the amount Ottawa gives to Ottawa in the first place. How many dollars come out of Ontario's pocket? Not one dollar comes from this province. How can that be important? In the last three years, payment by the city of Windsor for special assistance items has totalled $1,903,000. Because of the great recession we have had in my community, and I am sure it is the same in so many others, that has increased annually, until last year the total amount paid was $877,000. Of that, the actual cost to the city has been $951,000.

Just to put it in dollar terms, in terms of the estimate of what it will cost for special assistance this year, if the province were to pick up its 30 per cent share and leave the municipality with its 20 per cent share, with the general revenues and the much wider scope the province has in collecting taxation, they could save the city of Windsor—which is already strapped and very desperate for money—$260,000 this year alone.

I urge the government to do this. This special assistance is a program which is so very important in these difficult economic times.

I want to give members one small, personal example about the head of a family in my riding who, because of the very poor economy, has not been able to find employment. The family is on welfare. They have had an enormous amount of tragedy in the family, including deaths of their parents on both sides.

They have a young lad who is nine years old and he suffers from a rare chronic lung disease, the name of which I cannot even pronounce. He gets protein fluid in his lungs which then must be drained. That operation can only occur in Toronto at the Hospital for Sick Children. On a regular basis and, indeed, the most recent occasion was just last week, that little boy must come to Toronto. His mother or his father come with him, because it is a very critically dangerous operation at any time.

Because of the family's financial situation, every time he comes down the people at social services in my community, through special assistance, pay the cost of transportation to and from Toronto. They have also paid for the modest cost of boarding that family while they are in Toronto, at Ronald McDonald House, I believe. That is just one example of why that program cannot be cut back. There is simply no money elsewhere for that young lad. I hope the government will take a very serious look at fulfilling its responsibilities in the field of special assistance.

I will close by returning to a subject I raised last year. I see my friend the member for Oshawa (Mr. Breaugh) is here. On many occasions last year he raised the problem of those who have families with or who have Alzheimer's disease. To refresh the memory of the House, I will put it on the record that we have in this country an estimated 200,000 Canadians over 65 who suffer from the disease, including 73,000 in this province and 3,000 in my own community. It causes some 10,000 fatalities a year, and is believed to be the fourth most common cause of death.

The disease was initially diagnosed 75 years ago. For those who do not know, it attacks the brain cells, impairing memory, judgement and intellect. Related to these effects are anxiety and depression.

I note that the Alzheimer Society—and I believe there is now a full Ontario chapter—will be here at Queen's Park later this month, I believe on May 17, two weeks from today, to meet with us. I urge all members from all parties to get together with them. I also at this time want to urge the government to take some action. The ministers well know that the society, particularly our local chapter, has been urging action for some time.

I will read a brief letter the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) wrote to Mrs. Marilyn Brown, who is co-chairperson of the local Windsor and Essex county Alzheimer chapter. It is dated June 29, 1982. In that letter the Minister of Health says:

"Ministry of Health staff have attended meetings of the Alzheimer Society where concerns such as those of your membership were raised. When the Mental Health Act is open for amendment, this issue will be among the first to be considered for change."

I will leave it at this. I hope that act will be open soon for amendment. The disease is a great tragedy that is visited upon too many people throughout this province, and it is a tragedy that is compounded by a real problem that the government is well aware of. It seems to me it would be appropriate for this government to move and perhaps bring to the attention of these people when they come to Toronto on May 17 the happy news that there will be appropriate amendments to the Mental Health Act.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to speak in this throne speech debate. I regret that the throne speech contained so little. One can only hope that the budget one week hence will contain a little more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cousens): I thank the honourable member, and recognize the member for Lincoln.

Mr. Andrewes: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the co-operation of the member for Lake Nipigon (Mr. Stokes) in deferring to me and allowing me to find my way to another event later on this afternoon. I am proud, as a member of this government, to speak in support of the speech from the throne.

I was particularly pleased to see the appointment of a senior minister to be responsible for women's issues proposed in His Honour's address. I was glad to hear the member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Wrye) make his comments with respect to that issue, and I hope I can perhaps expand on some of his earlier remarks.

It is a necessary and important step. It proves something very fundamental about the attitude of this government. The number and proportion of women in the Ontario labour force has increased dramatically over the past decade. In 1960, women made up only 28 per cent of the total work force, and by 1982 this figure had increased to 42.6 per cent. The fact that women now make up such a large part of the entire labour force represents a profound social change, which calls for a change in traditional thinking about the role of women, jobs and careers.

4:50 p.m.

Although the participation rate of women has increased significantly, many misconceptions persist. Misconceptions about the role of women in the labour force can be either directly or indirectly connected to the assumption that women are secondary workers. It is suggested that the contribution made by working women to the economy and to their families is less important than that of working men. A further misconception is that working women are not truly dependent on such income and therefore do not suffer unduly if unemployed.

I ask the honourable members to consider the following facts. Over 40 per cent of married women in the Canadian labour force in 1978 had husbands who earned less than $15,000 a year. Obviously, these working women are making an important and essential contribution to their family income. It is estimated that the number of poor families in Canada would almost double if women in two-partner families left the labour force.

In 1980 almost 40 per cent of working women in Ontario were either single, widowed or divorced, and these women are working to support themselves and, in many cases, dependants as well. So without question, women are making an important contribution to our society and a very tangible contribution to family income.

An example that comes immediately to mind, a situation that is very close to me and to my constituency, is a group known as the Niagara Grape Growers' Action Committee. This group was established in 1976 by the wives of grape growers in the Niagara area. The action committee was formed during a period of surplus grape production to promote the sale of Ontario-grown grapes and grape products. This group of 300 women has been most successful in promoting the consumption of Ontario grapes, wines and grape juice in the home, in schools, at community functions, at grape and wine festivals and at conventions both in Canada and in the United States.

By the way, the action committee also paved the way for Ontario wine to be introduced as one of the house wines at the parliamentary restaurant in—where else?—Ottawa. That, I would suggest, is in direct contrast to the rather enlightened and progressive spirit of our own Queen's Park facilities, and I would suggest that perhaps at this time it is appropriate to remind all honourable members of the opportunity this evening to sample those products at a very pleasant and social event that we will participate in later on.

There are many serious and immediate issues that will have to be addressed by the new minister responsible for women. Inequities exist in the occupational and salary status of women. In 1979 women working full time earned on the average 63.3 per cent of what men working full time earn.

Mr. McClellan: What are you preaching for, Phil?

Mr. Andrewes: I had never thought of it that way, but it is not a bad idea.

Child-bearing and child-rearing responsibilities have been one of the major factors inhibiting the participation and advancement of women in the labour force. The new minister will need to re-evaluate the availability of accessible and affordable quality child care.

More than two thirds of all female workers in Canada are concentrated in just four occupational categories: clerical, service, medicine and health, and teaching. Emphasis will have to be placed on greater opportunity for women to enter nontraditional and higher-paying job sectors. In addition, an issue of increasing importance that will have to be addressed, not only by our government but also by industry and labour, is the impact of new technology on our labour force, particularly its effect on women.

I am pleased, therefore, that our government has taken the initiative to undertake an extensive and serious study of the impact of new technologies, so that we can respond in a positive and effective manner to technological change. It is fair to say that Canada, and more specifically Ontario, finds itself lagging behind most western industrial economies in the diffusion of new technologies.

It has been estimated, for example, that Canada is four or more years behind its major competitors in the use of CAD/CAM technology. In robotics, Canada and Ontario trail all major industrial nations in both installation and manufacturing. There are approximately 200 robots in use throughout Canada today, compared to about 5,000 to 10,000 in the United States and over 25,000 in Japan.

The effect of these technology gaps would in itself be serious enough in the technical expertise loss to our nation, but the real consequences of such a situation show up in our declining productivity and ultimately in our ability to compete. Given Canada's declining tariff levels, the consequences of a widening technology gap with our major trading partners become painfully obvious.

Two major short-term limitations impeding the diffusion of technology are ignorance, fear of the technology, and a simple lack of interest in its potential uses. Concerned with overcoming this handicap, Ontario has set up five technology centres to assist key sectors of the economy to become aware of the advantages of new technologies, such as microelectronics, CAD/CAM, and robotics.

I strongly believe that a key requirement in accelerating the use of these new technologies will be an understanding of the effects on the labour force. Ignorance often leads to fear, and there are those who fear technology because they can only think of it in terms of sophisticated machines, thus mistaking the shell for the snail, or the web for the spider.

We must remember that technology is not always machines but it is knowledge, knowledge that is stored in hundreds of millions of books, and in hundreds of millions or billions of human heads. Technology is knowledge of how to do things, of how to accomplish human goals, in order to achieve and improve the quality of life. Technology as stored knowledge enhances our abilities to accomplish individual and collective goals, such as providing the information to combat disease, or to discover new techniques in detecting and controlling pollution.

Our goals will be achieved through the application of more technology, not less. Ignorance of the implications of high technology has also been largely responsible for generating fear of massive unemployment. To understand the problem of unemployment and labour adjustment, we must appreciate that technological change is a two-edged sword. On the one hand it leads to the creation of completely new industries and occupations, and on the other it can lead to the displacement of labour through increases in efficiency in existing processes and in producing and delivering goods and services.

The spectrum of prediction about the possible impact of the new technology upon employment runs from the optimistic view that in the long run the new employment generated by new technologies will balance, or exceed, that which it will displace, to the pessimistic view that by the end of the century the majority of the labour force will be displaced by robots and automation.

The truth is that no one can be absolutely certain about long-term employment trends. However, in the next five to 10 years the effects of technology in reducing industry's demands for labour are unlikely to be any more dramatic than those of many previous examples of technological improvement.

5 p.m.

Alvin Toffler describes the great waves or flows of economic forces. The current transition from a goods-producing economy to a service or information-producing economy is equivalent to the 19th-century transition from an agrarian-based economy to an industrial one.

Today more than 50 per cent of the labour force in the western industrial countries are classified as information handlers. The new technology, particularly microelectronics, is geared directly to reducing the labour required to handle information. Studies done in Europe estimate losses of 30 per cent of the work force over the 1980s in sectors such as banking, insurance and the postal service.

Such negative predictions are also borne out by recent studies in Canada. The Public Service Alliance of Canada reports that two jobs are lost for every one created in technology-related administrative positions in the federal government. Heather Menzies in her book Women and the Chip concludes that unemployment among women could reach 35 per cent by 1990 if information technology is allowed to impinge unhampered on the office environment.

Increasingly there is a recognition that women will be affected most by the changes brought about by technology. The areas in which women have come to be employed are going to be the areas most affected in the future, because the office of the future, for example, will be expected to be composed of a wide range of computer-based equipment. Word processing equipment is now capable of retyping, filing, addressing and typesetting as well as providing electronic mail, messaging and agenda planning with on-line communication links.

The new office equipment will require a quantum leap in the talents and the skills required; and instead of people to process information and follow procedures, the new office will need to invent new ways of processing and applying processed information and to create new procedures for computers to follow.

Some analysts have argued that the effect microelectronics will have on women is paradoxical. First-generation office machines such as the typewriter and the telephone switchboard gave women the opportunity to enter the working world, and now computers have made these machines obsolete and have closed off traditional jobs. Hardship will be inevitable for many now employed in office jobs. But in the longer term, microelectronics will diminish the physical advantage of male muscle, opening up more occupations to females, and in the final analysis there is no agreement about what effects new technology will have on jobs.

So the various sides in the debate have been promoting their own interests and have made little effort to dispassionately analyse what will happen to jobs as a result of the introduction of new technology. There is not enough evidence to show a great displacement of labour in the information sector, and most figures are extrapolated or manipulated to confirm a particular set of hypotheses.

On the other side of the labour issue is the shortage of skilled labour. The Ontario Manpower Commission estimates that for the next five years we could suffer a shortage of engineers, computer operators, programmers, technicians and technologists. Education and training are the most universally accepted solutions for women and men whose traditional jobs become obsolete. Women will be encouraged to take courses in mathematics, science and technical skills.

Last year only 8.2 per cent of Canada's 34,155 undergraduate engineering students were women, and in the small but faster-growing sector of computer engineering only three of the 85 students of the 1985 graduating class are women.

Our government has taken the first step in responding to the challenge of technological change by undertaking to understand the effects such technology will have on our people. The study will seriously address the impact of technology on quantity and quality of employment; sectoral consideration, that is, which sectors of the economy are likely to be most affected; and, most important, retraining, the retraining of women currently in the work place and the training of those who wish to enter.

In undertaking to study the implications of technology, our government does not dismiss the fact that the loss of employment can be devastating to individuals and society, because work is the main means by which we relate to each other and acquire a sense of dignity and purpose, regardless of how hard or boring the work is.

Finally, it is the attitude that women have towards themselves and their role in the work place that will effectively determine the success of these programs since for many years these attitudes have been dominated by a male influence. Women should not attain positions merely because they are women and there is a quota to fill, but because they are best qualified for the job. In understanding the challenges that are facing us, we can effectively plan for the future.

In closing, I urge all honourable members to support the policies and programs outlined in the speech from the throne. They reflect our government's genuine concern and commitment to the wellbeing of our people.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, I want to be kind of parochial, and some might even say insular, in my comments in the throne speech debate. I want to remind all honourable members that the only reference to the north in the throne speech, however vague, however oblique, was some brief mention of the government's concern for one-industry towns in northern Ontario.

We have heard that song before. We know there are a good many one-industry towns based on a primary resource in the north that have had the boom-or-bust mentality for many years, given the nature of an economy so inextricably tied to one of the three primary resource sectors, namely, forestry, mining or tourism.

I am glad there are three northern members on the other side of the House, namely, the member for Timiskaming (Mr. Havrot), the member for Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Lane) and the member for Cochrane North (Mr. Piché). I would like their attention over the next little while in coming to grips with a problem that has emerged since a letter was sent by the Minister of Northern Affairs (Mr. Bernier) to the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. Pope) on December 14, 1982, dealing specifically with what could be mildly referred to as a slap on the wrist from the old crow, the Minister of Northern Affairs, to the relatively young and inexperienced Minister of Natural Resources. The Globe and Mail characterized that impasse, that hiatus, that difference of opinion, that parting of the ways, as a Tory tussle for a northern fief.

5:10 p.m.

It seems to me, as a member who has represented the north for almost 16 years, that for most of those years the Ministry of Natural Resources and its predecessor, the old Department of Lands and Forests, have had an ongoing road show or circus dealing with strategic land use planning. They have had that exercise going in various forms for most of the past 15 years.

They have had advisory committees to district foresters, regional directors, regional staff and the minister himself. In a more intensive way over the last five to six years, they have embarked upon this strategic land use plan in general terms for the entire province. They have refined that to where we now have district land use plans covering all the activities on crown land and water wherever they exist throughout Ontario.

The Minister of Natural Resources has fine-tuned this. He has even got involved himself by having his little road show across the province where he lays claim to having talked to well over 3,000 people, getting their input and consulting with them as to the nature of strategic land use planning throughout Ontario.

In tandem with the land use planning process and exercise throughout the province, we have had a special task force dealing with planning for future parks across Ontario. Most members will know that we have about 134 provincial parks in a variety of sizes, kinds and uses. In the candidate options that now are being studied by the Ministry of Natural Resources, if all those candidate options were exercised, it would increase the number of parks in the province from 134 to something in the neighbourhood of 240.

We have lobbyists, environmentalists and wilderness people on one side of the issue and timber interests, mining interests and tourist interests on the other side of the issue. In the middle, I think it is safe to say, we have the Ministry of Natural Resources. Now the Minister of Northern Affairs is jumping into the fray, saying we must have a multiple-use concept in Ontario if we are going to maximize the benefit of the wise use of our land and water resources in the province.

What does the Minister of Northern Affairs have to say about this process that his colleague the Minister of Natural Resources has been involved in ever since he has become the minister? As a matter of fact, the present Minister of Northern Affairs, in a previous incarnation as the Minister of Natural Resources, was involved in the same process. He, along with the former member for Leeds and the former member for Cochrane North, who were also either Minister of Natural Resources or Minister of Lands and Forests, in a very personal and a very direct way was involved in the very process that is now the responsibility of his colleague the Minister of Natural Resources, now the member for Cochrane South.

I want to quote from a letter that was sent from the Minister of Northern Affairs to the Minister of Natural Resources: "Plans or Guidelines: During the current discussions about land use plans, the question has come up as to what exactly they are intended to be. They have been described as catalogues of resources, guidelines, blueprints for decision-making and as plans in the sense of official plans setting out very precise rules and prescriptions of what can and cannot be done.

"The word 'plan' today carries with it the connotation of something that is etched in stone and very difficult, if not impossible, to change. Unfortunate, but true. This frankly is the case with most officials in most ministries I know. Presented with a plan to administer, the provisions become iron-clad rules that have to be applied according to the letter of the law. Occasionally they become reasons for not doing things. Proposals that are at variance are looked at suspiciously at best.

"In the coming years in the north the major emphasis must be on the creative and inventive use of our resources for the benefit of northerners rather than on the custodial nonuse side of the ledger. To do this, we in government are going to need the ability to respond flexibly to rapidly changing circumstances and to take advantage of unforeseen opportunities.

"A rigid plan will not permit this. I strongly recommend, therefore, that whatever documents come forward be called guidelines and that the administrative system within MNR be geared to dealing with them as such. This shift"—and I emphasize this, Mr. Speaker—"would provide greater flexibility for the government, would project publicly a sense of flexibility, would create a much better public image in the north and would frankly be much more consistent with what I understand the intent of the plan is supposed to be."

The Minister of Northern Affairs obviously is trying to intercede with his colleague the Minister of Natural Resources to say, "You must shift your whole emphasis of structured, rigid plans for a design for development and for strategic land use planning across the province to something that can loosely be referred to as guidelines so that we keep our options open with most of these things and it is a lot easier to justify than something that is etched in stone by way of a strategic land use plan or a district land use plan in Ontario."

The Minister of Northern Affairs talks about the multiple use concept; that is where everybody has a kick at the cat, perhaps in sequence at different times, at different stages of the growth of the ecosystems.

I think the minister would have us believe that if we have a forest that is there for the cutting we let the timber companies go in there, clear-cut and do what they have been doing for the last 50 or 60 years. Then, when they are finished, we have a sort of a sequential use where we will give it to birdwatchers or photographers or backpackers, hikers, canoeists or whoever wants to use it after we have taken the primary product, that is, the timber resources.

In terms of the multiple-use concept, if I had the time I could go into very great detail about what is wrong with the present government's concept of multiple use. In theory, if it was done in such a way that if a timber company went into a given area, regardless of what standing timber was on it, if it was harvested in such a way that we would minimize the effect of that mechanical harvesting, it would in theory be possible to have a multiple-use concept. But in actual practice—I wish we could have a tour of northern members within the next couple of weeks or so, so I could take them up to areas that have just recently been cut and are in the process of being cut, to see what the forest industries concept of multiple use really is.

I could take them to Lake Savant, just north of the north line of the Canadian National Railways, where Great Lakes Forest Products Ltd. has its operations, and show them areas where, notwithstanding the fact that we have under the Crown Timber Act, under the manual of management, guidelines not only for personnel within the Ministry of Natural Resources but guidelines which are supposed to be incorporated into multi-year management plans for a given area, as well as actual year-to-year operation plans, that is not being done.

There will not be clear-cutting. At the time they plan to harvest an area they will set in motion a plan on not only how it is going to be harvested but how that particular stand is going to be managed, whether it will be cut selectively or whether it will be block-cut or strip-cut, whatever way professional foresters in their wisdom decide, even before harvesting, is the best way of planning for the natural regeneration of that forest. If it is not possible for that particular forest, that particular stand, that particular species, to regenerate itself naturally, one sets in a motion a plan as to how one does that with human and financial resources to regenerate it by artificial means such as planting, seeding, that kind of thing.

That is not being done, notwithstanding the fact we have signed eight or nine forest management agreements with major licence holders across the north. Now the dialogue seems to be turning around and they are starting to talk about the recommendations that were contained in the Armson report in 1976. That is the basis for a turnaround of the years, the decades, of neglect of what should be considered a renewable and infinite resource of Ontario, as opposed to the neglect, the indifference, the way in which we have mined rather than managed our forests and treated them as an agricultural crop.

You will know this, Mr. Speaker, with your background in the area of the province you represent. If a farmer treated his farm in the way we treat an area of land that is dedicated to the growing of trees in Ontario, in the way we treat this most important resource—a renewable, infinite resource, if it were done properly—he would be out of business in five years. If he continued to take something out with no thought of ever putting anything back, if he harvested every fall and went away and neglected the farm, he would not have a farm for very long. But that is what we have been doing.

We could go back into history, dating back to when C. D. Howe used to be quite active in the forestry school of the University of Toronto in the mid-1920s, and see what he said about the need to treat the forest industry as a renewable resource. Members should read the recently released book by Dean Sisam of the forestry faculty of the University of Toronto. They should go back and read what Colonel Kennedy said in 1948, what a chap by the name of Brodie said in 1968, what the Ontario Economic Council said in 1969, what Hedlin-Menzies said in 1970 and what Armson said in 1976.

I would like every member of this Legislature to go with me to areas like Savant Lake and a good many others where I can show them they have clear-cut right down to the water's edge on lakes where literally hundreds of people rely on the wilderness, the fish and game resources, and all the things that tourists travelling to the north expect to see when they get there; I could show how this so-called multiple-use concept works with regard to the way we manage our forestry resources.

A lot of people in this assembly are not aware of how important forestry is, not only to northern Ontario or Ontario as a whole but to the whole of Canada. I am sure a good many members, if they have been following the dialogue, will hear pronouncements made by the Honourable John Roberts, who is the Minister of the Environment and responsible for co-ordinating any activity of the federal government in forestry.

We talk about agriculture here on a daily basis. If one added up the economic impact in terms of export dollars, the balance of payments, of agriculture as well as mining and all of those activities where we earn foreign dollars and doubled them, one still would not match the economic impact our forest industries have on the Canadian and our provincial economy. Most people do not understand that.

If one talked to farmers, whether they are in mixed farming in southern Ontario, in beef farming, or in grain farming on the Prairies and put all of those forms of farming into the statistics, they would not come close to matching the economic impact that the harvesting of our forests can have and will continue to have on every living Canadian and on every Canadian yet unborn, if we were to play our cards right; but I see no evidence of that.

5:30 p.m.

I see this dialogue between the Minister of Natural Resources and the Minister of Northern Affairs. Those two people at least should be responsible for the sane and wise use, not only of our lands and waters—strategic land use planning and district land use planning—but of something that is so key, so pivotal to the future wellbeing of northern Ontario, Ontario as a whole and Canada as a nation. We have frittered away over the last 50 years an opportunity to be world leaders in forest management.

Let me get to some more particular aspects of forest management. Most members will recall we had an honest, sincere, dedicated and professional forester who, because he was interested in the kinds of things I have been trying to say over the last 15 or 20 minutes, was fired for his trouble.

What has happened in the interim? We had the Crown Employees Grievance Settlement Board that is responsible for looking into such matters. It recommended this honest, sincere, dedicated, youthful and professional forester should be penalized one week's wages for having acted in a different way. They said there was nothing wrong with what he did, but they found some minor fault with the way he did it.

That young, professional forester is now back on the payroll of the Ministry of Natural Resources and has been, except for that one-week period around April 1. He is being paid $2,100 a month and they will not even let him inside the office. He is being paid $2,100 a month to stay at home and not bother his district manager, his regional director or the Ministry of Natural Resources at all. They told him to stay away.

I know Mr. MacAlpine and how dedicated he is. He goes out on a regular basis in the unit he was responsible for and carries out on his own initiative silviculture treatment of the area that presumably he is being paid to manage, although he is not allowed to do it; but he goes out and he does it.

Since distance is a consideration, he asked his district manager, who will not let him inside the office, if they would consider paying him his time to commute back and forth in his own truck to the place where he has chosen to work to put something back for the $2,100 he is getting. They will not even do that. He has written to the Minister of Natural Resources explaining his plight, his own particular circumstances, saying: "I am still a professional forester. I am still committed to managing the forests." The ministry will not allow him to do it.

Mr. Bradley: Is this Mr. MacAlpine?

Mr. Stokes: Yes. Why did he get fired? It was because he could not get the interest and the attention of his district manager. He could not get the interest of the regional director. He could not get the attention of the assistant deputy minister in Thunder Bay. He could not get the interest of the deputy minister in the Whitney Block or the minister himself. He made the mistake of telling me what was wrong. He said, "Give me time and give me the necessary resources to do an operational cruise on the area you want me to make recommendations about in terms of the inventory of timber, the age classes, the species and how we can allocate those timber values to maximize the benefit not only for local users but ultimately for the economy in Ontario."

He knew he was working with data, a forest resource inventory that was 20 years out of date. He said, "Let me do an up-to-date operational cruise, and whatever comes out of it I will make those recommendations and you can make the ultimate decision as to how you want to dispose of those timber values." I said: "Never mind that. Just give me a recommendation that there is sufficient timber to satisfy the traditional users."

We have 30 or 40 traditional users between Nipigon and Thunder Bay and we want to satisfy the needs of Buchanan Forest Products Ltd., which had just acquired a sawmill in Thunder Bay to add to the one it has at Hudson under the name of McKenzie Forest Products Inc., and the one Mr. Buchanan owns in Sapawe that he acquired two or three years ago from Domtar.

This is what he was attempting to do. They would not let him do it and they fired him for his trouble. Since then they realized they had to have that information, that data, before they could realistically allocate any of those timber values to traditional users or any additional users whom they had hoped to satisfy.

They put a tender out for the notice of professional foresters saying, "We require the services of professional foresters to do"—guess what?—"an operational cruise", on the area that was the responsibility of our friend Donald MacAlpine. He and another forester bid on it, because at that time he was without work. He was the lowest bidder and the most competent, but what did they do? They cancelled the contract.

That is not the end of it. They still had to have somebody do that. What did they do? They got a bunch of technicians, some forestry students from Lakehead University, and they said: "Go down there and do that inventory. Give us some data that we can reach some conclusions on."

About a month ago the Ministry of Natural Resources unveiled a 10-year operating plan for the Port Arthur crown management unit. Essentially they said, and I am quoting from memory, there were about one million cubic metres of wood on that crown management unit available for harvesting over the next 10 years. I attended the open house and I said: "Break this down for me. Tell me how many of those cubic metres of wood are on the Black Bay Peninsula." They said, "Just a minute now."

The forestry supervisor and a student put their heads together, got out their little pocket calculator and said, "Roughly about 195,000 cubic metres of wood are available on the Black Bay Peninsula over the next 10 years." I said, "That is about just under 20,000 cubic metres of wood a year to be divided between the traditional users and these others like MacMillan Bloedel and Buchanan Forest Products." They said, "Yes, that's it." So I said, "Fine, thank you very much," and asked them several other questions.

When the traditional users went to look at the particular stands or plots that were allocated to them under this 10-year operating plan, one of the stands was one that one of the traditional users had planted five years ago. Now we know in the boreal forest how long it takes to grow a tree. If one planted something five years ago and if one got a good catch, it would be about as high as this desk.

Another chap was quite happy. He had been allocated a 55-year-old stand of jack pine. They were about six to eight inches in diameter and there were a good many stems per acre and he could make a good living. He went, unloaded his bulldozer—there was still snow on the ground—and started pushing in a winter road to gain access to this area that had been allocated to him. He no sooner got the bulldozer off the flat-bed when they said: "No, no, we made a mistake. You cannot have this. You are going to have to look for another area." He asked, "Where is the other area?" I can see it out my window. In Nipigon, they have a cluster of trailers and right in the background there is a hill. He was told that if he went on top of this hill, that would be the alternative.

He cruised it that weekend. He thought that at best it would be eight or 10 cords to the acre. Of course, anyone who knows anything about harvesting of small-dimensional mixed stands in the north would know one cannot make his living on it, but he went in and had a look at it. Before he got a chance to even tell them that it was not economically feasible, they withdrew that from him.

This is a plan that is three weeks old, so what have we got? We have a reduction on the Black Bay Peninsula of 195,000 cubic metres of wood over the next 10 years, reduced by one quarter to 145,000 in just three weeks. We have one fellow who was asked to harvest an area that he had planted five years ago. We have another chap who was given two areas that have since been withdrawn and the only alternative offered was another one across the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks, and through a swamp in the middle of summer, so he does not have the resources to harvest it.

Now the ministry is saying, "Well, if we can stir up the money from Toronto, we will try to assist you in building a road so you can continue with your traditional livelihood of harvesting timber." What a hell of a way—if you will pardon the expression—to manage a resource.

When I started talking—I guess I have driven them all out—the member for Cochrane North was here, the member for Timiskaming was here and the member for Algoma-Manitoulin was here. How do they feel about the way in which the Minister of Natural Resources, the member for Cochrane South, is administering the most important primary resource in Ontario?

This gets me to another thing. The members will all recall the furore that was created here just before Christmas over the fishery agreement. The Minister of Natural Resources said he had conferred and consulted with the Northern Ontario Tourist Outfitters Association, that he had consulted with the anglers and hunters across Ontario, that he had discussed it with a lot of people who he thought would be concerned about the ramifications of signing a tripartite agreement among the federal government, the provincial government and our native people in Ontario.

I happened to be at the cabinet meeting that was held over in the Whitney Block on that fateful day, when the public got to hear about this fishing agreement. The Minister of Natural Resources claimed he had undertaken realistic consultation with anybody he thought would be concerned, and the Minister of Northern Affairs almost denied any knowledge of the existence of an agreement.

I had never attended a cabinet meeting—and I do not think you have either, Mr. Speaker—but it would seem, if the Minister of Natural Resources had been charged with the responsibility of negotiating on behalf of Ontario with our first citizens and with the federal government, it would be with the knowledge and approval and endorsement of cabinet. One would think that would be a reasonable way to approach it.

I happen to know a cabinet committee met last August in Sault Ste. Marie where that very topic was discussed and where the Minister of Natural Resources was given approval in principle to enter into an agreement with the federal government and the native people. When the minister unveiled the plan, everybody denied any knowledge of it. They said the content of the plan may have some merit and be worthy of support, but the process surely left a lot to be desired.

One hears from time to time about two cabinet ministers having a mild difference of opinion. One may hear about the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) having a difference of opinion with the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea), or the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) having a mild difference of opinion with the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Elgie), as we did hear in the last few days. We now hear, out of the mouth of the Minister of Northern Affairs, a very basic and fundamental philosophical approach to the way we should manage our resources.

We have a young Minister of Natural Resources, a little green, a little wet behind the ears, but trying to change things, trying to turn things around. Where are his cabinet colleagues when he needs them? One wonders when this government and its ministers are going to take seriously their responsibility to manage all our resources, whether they be finite resources like our mineral wealth, or infinite resources like trees if we play our cards right; and infinite resources also, again if we play our cards right, with regard to tourism, fast becoming the second largest industry in Ontario.

The people in southern Ontario think of tourism from their own perspective. If it is in Ottawa, the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) knows what tourism means to our national capital and to the people who look on that as their livelihood. The member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) can tell us what tourism means in his community and the people who depend on it for their livelihood.

Most members know what tourism in northern Ontario is all about. It costs a little bit more to get there; it takes a little more time; it takes a much greater commitment if you are going to go up there and enjoy what we have to offer by way of tourism in the north.

5:50 p.m.

But, generally speaking, if somebody is going to spend the number of dollars, the amount of time and the amount of energy to get up there to enjoy those resources, fight the mosquitoes and the blackfly and the sometimes inclement weather, it is going to be because he wants to hunt, he wants to fish, he wants to attack some wild river canoe route, he wants to rough it and get away from the rat race down here in southern Ontario. Well, if you want to fish, you have to find a lake with fish in it. If you are going to hunt, you are going to have to find some moose.

We have a program in Ontario called strategic planning for Ontario fisheries that has been in existence for five or six years. Under it there was an undertaking by the Minister of Natural Resources to begin to ensure that if we play our cards right there will be fishing from now until kingdom come to support our tourist industry.

If you go into a good many of those areas, and the member for Niagara Falls will tell members this, remote lakes where he once fished are becoming badly depleted, particularly the prime species. In some areas it is pickerel; in other areas it is lake trout. We have even had to close down fishing in some of those lakes because of the inability of that resource to withstand the pressure on its own—sometimes from commercial fishing, sometimes from the ordinary angler like the member for Niagara Falls, but sometimes because of excess pressure as a result of tourist operations in the north, where we are attracting people in ever-increasing numbers, a lot of them from beyond our borders.

It does not matter whether you are talking about trees, about fish resources or about wildlife resources: you cannot continue just to take it out as if you have an endless amount of resources. If you want to continue to take it out, you must one day make the decision to start putting something back; and I wonder when the day will come when we will truly manage the resources.

The government can talk about their strategic land use plans, their district land use plans, their park plans—they can talk about all of those things; but unless there is a commitment to manage and husband the primary resources around which the economy in Ontario rotates, they will reach the day when it is no longer there and they will have to look for something else.

The government know what has happened with the world economic recession, the impact it has had on our big neighbour to the south, the United States, and they know the impact it has had particularly on our manufacturing sector here in southern Ontario. In order to have a manufacturing sector you must be competitive, you must have a marketable product and you must have a natural resource that you can turn into a manufactured end product that is available for sale at competitive prices, not only in our domestic but also in our foreign markets.

It is so basic, unless we want to be like Japan, where we would bring everything in from offshore, whether it be steel, coal, aluminum or petroleum products, all of those things they bring to their shoreline. They manufacture them into something that is saleable at competitive prices and ship it out to world markets.

We know what has happened to our automotive industry in Ontario and in North America generally because of our inability to compete. Part of it is because our expectations are far too high. We have been living high off the hog far too long. We have to get down to reality. If we do not manage the resources I have been talking about over the last 40 or 50 minutes, that is going to be the end of the road for this province of opportunity.

I could go on at great length and talk about the closing of a town such as Nakina because of the announcement by Canadian National Railways that it is no longer going to operate out of Nakina. It is going to run through from Hornepayne over to Armstrong. That is primarily the responsibility of the federal government.

I could talk about Via Rail's cutback in passenger service in the north where we no longer have a daily passenger train on the north line, the transcontinental line of Canadian National Railways. The members will probably doubt this, but I can tell them there are communities such as Ferland, Mud River, Auden, Collins and Allan Water that no longer have daily passenger service. They have a little jitney that goes through in the middle of the night three times a week and they are supposed to use that because there is no road access.

There we are, in this year of our Lord, 1983, in the most affluent province in the richest country on the face of the earth, and we cannot even provide road or rail access for people who actually live in those communities and provide a service. If it were not for people living in those communities, we would not have anyone to maintain the line that joins east and west. They provide a very useful service.

We just ignore them. We say: "Well, if you take sick, you will have to wait two or three days until the next train comes along and you can get out to see a doctor. If you have a toothache, you will wait two or three days to get out to see a dentist." That is the way we treat people in Ontario.

It will be said that is primarily a federal responsibility. The federal government is responsible for railroads and Via Rail, but surely there could be the co-operation that is necessary to provide for everybody in Ontario regardless of where they live.

We had a task force set up a year and a half ago to study the high cost of transportation and the high cost of consumer goods in the far north. That is in places like Fort Severn, Big Trout Lake, Fort Hope, Kasabonika, Wunnummin Lake, Kingfisher Lake and all those communities that are off the beaten path. There are no roads into them. We have a network of air strips, thank God, so they can get in, weather permitting, but the costs are unusually high.

We have a community in my riding where they pay $6.17 for a gallon of gasoline. That is about $1.40 a litre, as opposed to what I pay, 53 cents in my home town, and what I paid for it in Thunder Bay as recently as last Sunday, 21.9 cents a litre.

I have asked for a study. They have said: "No. We will just disregard that." We have had this task force studying the high cost of living and transportation in the north for a year and a half now. I have been told for the last two months it is still at the printers. This is the kind of thing that turns people off.

I could go on at considerable length, but I think I have gone on long enough to indicate that I am not too happy with the indifference, the neglect, the turning of the head on problems in the north. I do not think it is sufficient to have a one-liner in the budget saying, "My government will look at the problems of one-industry towns in the north." That is just not good enough.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Tuesday, May 3, 1983

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Resuming the debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. Bradley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to address the House this evening on what I am afraid will be a very limited basis. I was looking forward to a two-hour oration with the galleries as full as they are. Actually, they are unusually full this evening; I think the whip of the Liberal Party indicated to the population that there would be some good speakers tonight, later on in the evening at least.

I did want to offer to the House a few remarks about the speech from the throne, particularly as those remarks would relate to the problems that confront my constituency but also touching on some with a province-wide implication.

Any representative who sat in the Ontario Legislature representing the provincial constituency of St. Catharines would be remiss if he did not mention the unemployment problem that has confronted not just our community but also the surrounding communities in the Niagara Peninsula.

At one place this winter—I believe it was in the month of January—the St. Catharines-Niagara region, as it is known for statistical purposes, recorded an unemployment rate of almost 22 per cent. It was exactly 21.7 per cent, which placed it the highest, not only in our province but also in our country, in those centres that are surveyed.

Needless to say, those of us who are political representatives in the area, regardless of our affiliation or whether we are provincial, federal or municipal members, are expressing a genuine concern about this and advocating some useful programs on the part of government to assist in the bouncing back of our economy to what it was in previous days.

Mr. Speaker, I believe your constituency is around the other end of the horseshoe. We are referred to as the Golden Horseshoe, and at one time that was probably a valid designation for the area from Niagara Falls around to just past Oshawa.

The Deputy Speaker: I just want to bring my understanding to your attention, if the table would correct me. My understanding is that at six hours and 10 minutes the Liberal Party time has expired. Are you aware of that?

Mr. Bradley: Yes, thank you, I will watch the new digital clock. I have not found it an affront, by the way, to have a digital clock in here. I notice the lighting of the numbers has been toned down somewhat, and that should make even the member for Sudbury (Mr. Gordon) accept this innovation, which is of use to all of us in this chamber.

But back to the problem of unemployment. In our area it has been chronic unemployment. We have had a situation where we were up to 22 per cent this winter. We have been very high compared to other communities, but it is not a new problem. It is one that has been with us for a few years now and it is not simply related to the automotive industry, although we recognize that when there is a downturn in the automotive industry in any of those areas in which the automotive industry is a large industrial component, then we have circumstances where the spinoff in an adverse way is certainly quite pronounced.

In our community we have fortunately had an effort that is involving a number of segments of that community to confront the problems of unemployment. Those of us who are in the legislative chambers are advocating certain measures that I will deal with briefly in a few minutes.

We have also had the unemployed themselves attempt to form an organization that is constructively doing something about the problem. It is called the Unemployed Action Alliance. Mr. Allan Cronkwright, who has certainly not had political experience in the past or been associated with any protest groups or anything like that, took it upon himself to assume the presidency upon being elected at a meeting, along with David Young, who is the vice-president and working in conjunction with the president of the St. Catharines and District Labour Council, Mr. Len Harrison, and the president of the United Auto Workers, Mr. Gerry Michaud.

Those are all people with the community at large in mind, as opposed to simply those they represent, who got together to provide some direct assistance to the unemployed by counselling them on their rights as they relate to receiving assistance from the government and by establishing a drop-in centre, which is now located at 145 King Street in St. Catharines, where people can obtain that kind of advice, share their problems with others and receive some counselling on other matters of a moral or ethical nature when they are experiencing problems that are confronted by those who face unemployment.

I must continue by saying that it is not the community alone or the people themselves alone who can benefit from action that is taken. The government and its revenues can also benefit from this action. I have advocated several measures that would be of assistance to those of us in the Niagara Peninsula as possible for review and implementation by the government. Some of those suggestions, of course, relate to alleviating the burden on those who have been directly hit by unemployment.

As you would be aware, Mr. Speaker, many regions across this province have had welfare bills that have been very high indeed. Of course, we recognize that 20 per cent of the cost of welfare is assumed by the local ratepayer in the property tax burden, that being the main and only significant source of revenue for municipalities. They are being hit with what I call a double whammy when the government of Ontario refuses to take a more interventionist role in assisting these municipalities.

Let us take the Niagara region, for instance, where there is almost 22 per cent unemployment. Many people are off their unemployment insurance benefits and many have had to go on welfare or accept some other kind of assistance that might be available from the government; so there is an impact on the local municipality. That municipality then faces a Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett) and a Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) who both are advocating restraint because of the inflation problem that is confronting the Ontario government, the lack of revenues and the deficit, which is increasing. These people then are forced to go back to the local ratepayers, many of whom have lost their jobs, to extract more funds to pay for the cost of welfare.

For a person who has been unemployed for six or seven months the tax bill at the municipal level does not change. That person still has to pay $1,100, $1,200 or whatever the assessed cost is based on the mill rate that is struck by the municipality. That, of course, is the unfairness of the municipal property tax: it does not take into account a person's ability to pay.

On the other hand, those same individuals do not have to pay as much in income tax, because income tax is related to the amount of money a person is making; so it seems sensible that the more progressive taxes should be used to alleviate the burden on the local people.

The Treasurer has accepted some of the suggestions that we in the opposition have put forward for stimulating the economy but certainly not all of them. We have mentioned that a number of projects are already on the books. We are not asking that people go out and look for useless projects that are going to be a burden on a municipality in years to come. We are looking for projects that are on the books of the provincial government. We would like the government to advance the schedules for some of those projects. In some cases, that has been done. I commend those who are responsible when that has been done.

In addition, some municipalities have undertaken the same type of program and that is beneficial. Generally speaking, what we need to assist communities such as mine and all the communities in Ontario is a budget that stimulates the economy, not one that retrenches or restrains expenditures at a time when unemployment is substantially high. This does not mean those of us in the opposition are advocating that the government squander millions of dollars on useless projects, but it does mean we are understanding when the provincial deficit increases.

It is the prerogative of the opposition to point out that there is a deficit or that it is increasing, but one would find far less criticism of a provincial deficit that has increased, but not substantially, at a time of high unemployment than one would if the economy were booming and there were no excuse for it. The Treasurer need not fear that those of us in the opposition would be overly critical of a budget that entertained increased expenditures and perhaps revenues that are not going to grow sufficiently to bring the deficit down and may result in an increase in the deficit.

We are looking generally for a stimulative budget. We saw a little of that in the federal budget. Some of those measures will be helpful to the economy, more of them in the long term than the short term. We are looking for even more of an impetus from the provincial government in stimulating our manufacturing and other sectors in this province.

Mr. Conway: Has the Chairman of Management Board (Mr. McCague) given an undertaking?

Mr. Bradley: I notice nods of approval from the two ministers across the way, who recognize the wisdom of what I am advocating. I certainly commend these measures to them to take back to their cabinet colleagues.

I also want to look at the expenditures of this government, because in certain areas, for instance, hospital and health care spending, education and where we think it could be most productive, we have advocated and we are quite pleased to see the government playing its significant role. There are, however, areas where the government could cut spending and free funds for other areas. Some of them are obvious.

I think I strike a responsive chord in many of the members on the government side when I mention the ill-considered expenditure on Suncor, the $650 million spent on shares of Suncor. Of 70 members across the way, I am sure I could find 64 members who could give me 64 better places to spend that $650 million than on shares for Suncor, a corporation that is not going to be of direct benefit to Ontario simply by the expenditure of that money on shares that do not produce any jobs that Suncor would not have produced in any event without the government component.

I hear certain people on the other side stand and extol the virtues of Suncor, pointing out, "Do you realize in Renfrew, Ottawa East, St. Catharines and so on, all the jobs that are created?" We recognize those orders were placed before the government had any direct stake in Suncor. We see that as a wasteful expenditure of money which could be channelled in better directions.

I touched on the advertising budget this afternoon with the Treasurer. There are some programs—for instance, the compulsory immunization program—which must be brought to the attention of the public. I commend the government when it undertakes that kind of information campaign so people know what is required and why.

That kind of expenditure should be commended by the opposition, but not some of the advocacy advertising that goes on such as the extolling of the virtues, indirectly or directly, of the Ontario government using the taxpayers' money, as we saw particularly in advance of the 1981 election when we heard: "Life is good, Ontario. Preserve it. Conserve it."

We heard that the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Norton) was pleased with the environment. I recall raising in the House the matter of $20,000 being thrown into the Globe and Mail on five big advertisements when only about one of them had any hard content. I advise the Treasurer to cut his advertising budget by two thirds and free those funds for other areas or to give the hard-pressed taxpayer a break.

We have heard Minaki Lodge bandied about in this Legislature. Those of us who are critical of it, of course, are said to be opposed to northern Ontario or something of that nature. What we are opposed to is throwing all kinds of taxpayers' money, in this case $45 million, into this one project, which is going to benefit essentially those in the upper middle and upper classes who are staying at the lodge.

That money could have been used more productively. I am sure the member for Sudbury would agree in his own mind—I do not expect he is going to interject that he does—that money could have been better spent in the Sudbury basin to alleviate some of the problems there.

I also think of the land banking schemes that have been undertaken in this province. What I want to say, without getting into a lot of detail, is that there are areas where this government can cut its spending and channel the money in other directions.

As a member from the Niagara Peninsula, I also want to take the opportunity to express my concern, as many of us have in the peninsula over the years, about the state of the Niagara River and, most particularly, the poisons that are going into the Niagara River from both sides but predominantly from the American side.

Mr. Conway: Do you drink bottled water?

Mr. Bradley: I certainly do not drink bottled water. I drink, believe it or not, the water that comes out of the Welland Canal.

I am prepared to tell the House some of the signs that are placed in public lavatories in Welland indicating why it is important to flush the facilities, but I do not want to get into the details of that. I notice we have guests in the galleries who might not appreciate it. But it is indicated in Welland and in Port Colborne that flushing should take place because St. Catharines needs the water. It does, indeed, make its way down through Lake Gibson and into our drinking water. It is suitably sterilized, I guess.

Mr. Conway: If real men should not and do not eat quiche, can Premiers drink bottled water?

Mr. Bradley: A question which is probably relevant in some way to my remarks.

When am I cut off, by the way, Mr. Speaker?

The Deputy Speaker: You still have 12 minutes.

Mr. Bradley: I still have 12 minutes. Good.

I want to express my great concern about the Niagara River and not just about the dioxin. We focus our attention on dioxin because it is a catchword. It is the most dangerous chemical, we are told, and the media people are interested in that. They listen carefully when we talk about dioxin.

Let me tell members that the concern of those who are aware of the problem in the Niagara Peninsula revolves around the cocktail of harmful chemicals that is seeping its way into the Niagara River and eventually into the drinking water of the people of the Niagara region.

We are also concerned about such things as the Love Canal and the other dumps on the American side, chemical dumps where seepage is obviously taking place. We are concerned about the infamous Niagara Falls, New York, pollution abatement plant—and that is probably a poor word for it—where many of these chemicals are filtered through. That plant has never worked properly, as long as I can ever recall, in the Niagara region.

What we in the opposition are suggesting is that, because of this difficult circumstance, because of this alarming situation, the government of Ontario should fund as a pilot project—my colleague the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) has advocated this on many occasions—an activated carbon filtration system, which would allow the people in Niagara Falls and the surrounding area who are served by that plant to be a little easier in their own minds as to what they are drinking.

If the minister were prepared to stand up in this House and make that announcement, we would applaud him. We would also applaud if he were to fund around the Niagara region, where we have had other problems with these chemicals, the implementation of the activated carbon filtration system, or a system of equal value in terms of its technical value but of less cost, as has been discussed by the chief engineer, Mr. Con Eidt, in the Niagara region. We are looking for that kind of activity.

We also look for another kind of activity. If we are to be critical of the Americans—and let members make no mistake about it, there is a lot of room for criticism of what is taking place on the New York state side—it seems to me to be essential that we must make every effort to clean up our side.

We have two sewage treatment plants, one in Niagara Falls and one in Fort Erie, which are at the primary stage only. If we were to have a commitment on the part of the federal government with its assistance and that of the provincial government and the municipal government to implement at least secondary sewage treatment and, if possible, tertiary sewage treatment at those two plants, we would once again be demonstrating to our American friends that we are prepared to be an action group as well as a group that is prepared to talk about the problem.

If we are also prepared to be diligent in looking after the liquid industrial waste in our part of the province, this places yet another ace in the deck, another ace we can play.

The only way we are going to get the Americans to move, unfortunately—they are good friends of ours, and there are many on the other side who are just as concerned—is to embarrass them into moving by showing what a good job we can do on our side and what a bad job they are doing on their side in cleaning up this problem. That can work, particularly if we can interest the American news media at the national level.

We recognize that the American president does not have the same commitments as other presidents have had, but we recognize as well that there is a Congress there with people with consciences in it and that there are people who represent that local area who are willing to take this kind of action. Indeed, it has been Marguerita Howe in Niagara-on-the-Lake of Operation Clean Niagara who has led this fight, not any of us who are the politicians. We have been prepared to play our role as well in supporting her, and I hope the various levels of government will support her group and others who are fighting to clean up that part of the environment.

My time is limited, at least in this speech, but I want to deal also with the problem of looking at the Speaker's gallery, where no television cameras now sit. Members of the New Democratic Party, members of the Liberal Party and, I suggest, some members of the governing party recognize the wisdom and importance of having an electronic Hansard in this House.

Yes, it has worked to the advantage of the government for 40 years not to have the people of Ontario know what is going on. There may be some on that side who would still like it to be that way. But I suggest that there are some fair-minded people over there who recognize the need to allow access to our main legislative body in Ontario—I call it the main legislative body; the place in Ottawa is second-place and this is first-place as far as I am concerned—for an electronic Hansard.

With an electronic Hansard, the people of Ontario could see the wonderful answers that are provided, for instance, by the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch), who sits here this evening, and they could see the scintillating questions that are put by the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy), by the member for Welland-Thorold (Mr. Swart) or, once in a while, by the member for Sudbury when he has an issue of great importance.

I am sure CKSO-TV in Sudbury, if that is still in existence, would like to be able to have access to the electronic Hansard so it could show the speeches that are made so eloquently on the nationalization of Inco by the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel). At present it cannot do that.

Let me remind members of the reason we do not have television on a continuous basis in this House: those who are in control on the government side deem it to be in their own vested interest to keep television out. We think there is a new order coming in Ontario and that members such as the member for Brantford (Mr. Gillies) must be pressing for an electronic Hansard, for access by the people of this province to what is going on at Queen's Park.

One of the best examples I remember was a conflict of interest allegation made in Ottawa. I turned on the six o'clock news on the Canadian Broadcasting Corp., and what did they have but a live vote from the House of Commons on it. Each member was standing and bowing, and the table officers could even remember all the members' names, believe it or not, in that particular case, as I am sure they do here. The Clerk always remembers, but some of the others sometimes have difficulty with names in this House. It is understandable. I will not mention names, but some remember better than others. Anyway, I am being distracted.

What happened was that while that was going on, we in this House had questions directed to the government about what we in the opposition saw as a possible conflict of interest. There was no coverage on television, little if any coverage on radio and a little in the print media.

I am not suggesting they are not doing their job. I am suggesting that if there were an electronic Hansard here and if there were direct access to this House, in that case it would be more likely that kind of story would be picked up, played and judgements made. We do not have that kind of continuous coverage of what is going on in the House. That would be very important.

Mr. Hennessy: The comedy hour.

Mr. Bradley: The member for northern Ontario—

An hon. member: The former Liberal.

Mr. Hennessy: Don't do me any favours.

Mr. Bradley: The member for Fort William (Mr. Hennessy), who almost ran for the Liberals and who almost singlehandedly on that side sunk the jet, or I guess one shoots down a jet, voted for my resolution, for which I commend him. He would be among those who would advocate televising the proceedings of this House, because he would want the act of all us, and I take equal responsibility, cleaned up for the public at large.

I am sure this would at least moderate some of the interventions each of us makes in this House, myself included.

Mr. Roy: And the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea).

Mr. Bradley: The Minister of Community and Social Services, bombastic as he is, might even tone down some of his interventions in the House with the television cameras looking at him, although with his character somehow I do not know whether we could ever tone him down. Perhaps we do not want to tone down the Minister of Community and Social Services. I hope the members over there, including you, Mr. Speaker, will agree we should have television in this House.

At the conclusion of my remarks, with about two minutes left, I want to say that what we in this party and the New Democratic Party have advocated, the New Democratic Party since 1978 and we since about 1972 under the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk (Mr. Nixon) as leader, is the striking of a select committee on education to deal with a number of education issues. As Education critic for this party, I think it would be of great advantage, not only to us but also to some of the members I see up there who have a particular interest in education, to be able to review some of the trends in education before we actually get into them.

We all got hit with the computer education announcement. It was not even made in the House; it was made at a press conference. We all have to digest it to determine whether it is useful. It would have been of great advantage for those of us interested in education to have direct access to those who have an intimate knowledge of this.

The secondary education review project report became the Response on Secondary Education report, which is now OSIS, Ontario Schools Intermediate/Secondary. Would it not be nice for those who have a particular interest in education to be able to sit down in a select committee, in a relatively nonpartisan atmosphere, and listen to the representations made by those who are in the front line and who must implement that kind of report?

There is the whole issue of funding, the issues surrounding Bill 127 and Bill 100, the issue as to whether there should be increased discipline or less discipline in education. What I am pointing out is there are so many issues that are close to the people in this province it would be a great advantage to have a select committee on education to deal exclusively with them; not a group that is going to have members floating in and out who are just assigned to a committee because that is their job for the day, but people who are committed on a long-term basis to listen to education issues.

In conclusion, I urge the government to look at all the suggestions we in the opposition are making and to implement them on a progressive basis. The government will find that, instead of being the critical cranks it thinks we are, we will be standing in applause at its generous offerings.

8:30 p.m.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, while it is always a pleasure to speak and say a few words in this House, it is not a particular pleasure or happy time to have to address the speech from the throne that was brought down a couple of weeks ago. Given the economic circumstances we are facing in the province, I have difficulty in understanding the lack of real initiatives when I know that currently in Ontario we have some 230,000 unemployed.

The Deputy Speaker: I just want to point out that we are now counting down, as opposed to what happened with the Liberals, which was counting up. The member has 43 minutes and 12 seconds left. I wanted to point that out so that it would not be confusing.

Mr. Mackenzie: I have difficulty in understanding why there were not more positive and direct measures in the throne speech dealing with the fact that we currently have 230,000 women and 233,000 young people out of work in Ontario.

I do not know how directly any of the members are involved in this, but I see it with my own family at home in their efforts to go to university. There are four of them trying to handle university and also find jobs and they are having a difficult time doing it. It is not easy for them and it is not particularly easy for the parents who are watching their efforts to make their own way in this world of ours.

When one takes a look at 782,000 people in Ontario out of work, the total unemployment in the province as of the last Statistics Canada figures, it certainly says to me that our problem in this province is providing jobs for people. We are not providing those jobs. We are not even setting the climate for those jobs.

We have a cry that comes constantly from the government benches for more investment, and I know it is a position basically supported by the Liberals. They do not care whether it is local, offshore or foreign investment. They say it is what we need to start to stimulate the economy and start to create jobs in Ontario. I do not have any difficulty with offshore or foreign investment if we have some control over it, but this government has never seen fit to set any guidelines or any rules. That is why we do not have content legislation in this country. That is why we do not have specific requirements before one is allowed to set up a branch plant.

We have become a branch plant economy in Ontario. We do not have specific requirements that say they have to do so much research and development if they are going to operate, that they have to do more than just use whatever incentives they have been able to get out of government to set up that branch plant, and that they also have to have the right to bid on overseas markets. I am amazed at the number of companies, branch plants in Ontario, that are really restricted from bidding on overseas markets. That is the prerogative of the head office. The branch plant was set up specifically to handle an operation and supply a need here in Ontario.

I do not happen to think the kind of deficit we are running into in financial terms—I am talking about interest, principal, dividends, royalties, management fees, you name it, which is in the billions in this country—is a particularly healthy situation. I do not think the kind of deficit we are accumulating as a result of relying on a branch plant economy in Ontario is going to benefit us in the long run.

I think we have to start getting tough in terms of what we suggest is an obligation on these firms before they are allowed to operate in this province. I do not think we should tell them how to run their business, but what kind of corporate behaviour and what kind of responsibility we expect in terms of Canadian workers and in terms of the financial situation in this province that we are going to run into.

I find it difficult to deal with a company such as Consolidated-Bathurst, as we did the other day. When we are dealing with Consolidated-Bathurst, the words that are being used, the buzzwords such as corporate rationalization, are what we are getting from almost every single plant that decides to close down.

To sit there with Mr. Stangeland, the president of that company, as a number of us did, including the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay) of this province—and I know they were a little embarrassed—and be told by this company it would not even consider meeting with the employees to look at an offer of purchase, and they had done a fair amount of work on it at that particular plant, after the company had clearly said they thought this plant was no longer a real viable operation. But not even to sit down, let alone consider an offer of purchase by the workers, to me raised serious questions.

The questions were raised because of his entire statement. What was it? First, they would not consider sitting down to discuss selling this plant to the workers, based on the fact that a good chunk of the market was a local Hamilton-area market for that particular plant, because it would be competition and nobody in the corporate sector is going to accept that kind of competition. As the president himself said to us at that meeting, "You would not allow Texaco to take over a key corner location, or Imperial Oil would not sell it to Texaco."

I always thought, in the context that I hear it from my friends across the way, that competition was the basic principle of the free enterprise and private enterprise system. But he made it very clear that they would not consider it because it would be competition and they were not about to accept that.

He also made it clear to us, and I think his actual statement was: "We have an obligation and a right to move our order books around. We have a right to move our operations and plants around."

When I asked him, in a bit of anger—it was one of the few times at the meeting that it got a little bit heated—if he did not also think he had an obligation to the 160-odd workers in that plant, who averaged better than 24 years' seniority and which by the company's own admission was a pretty skilled work force, he very brusquely pushed aside the objections I made—and incidentally that were made by the Minister of Labour, my colleague the member for Hamilton Centre (Ms. Copps), the regional chairman and the mayor of Hamilton, who were quite upset—by saying, "We have met every requirement of the collective agreement or that is required in law in terms of severance pay."

We then pushed him as to whether he would consider special consideration for those workers in one of the other three plants that are now putting on a third shift in Ontario. He said no, they would not. They would recognize that they had been employees of Consolidated-Bathurst but there would be no special consideration.

To get off the hook, the Minister of Industry and Trade (Mr. Walker) said that while he was not happy with the situation and the way they had done it, the only criticism he made was of the way Consolidated-Bathurst had actually handled the plant closure. Mr. Stangeland did say he wanted to make it positive. He wanted to talk about Reid Dominion Packaging, the plant next door, which had actually purchased the Consolidated-Bathurst plant. We did not know it until that moment.

Because that plant might employ 75 to 100 workers, we asked if he would then consider interceding with this other plant on behalf of his employees in the course of the finalization of the sale. He said: "No, we really would not appreciate it if, in the course of trying to sell an operation, somebody were to dictate to us who we should hire. They have to go to the marketplace for employees just as we do." That is when it was crystal clear that in the final analysis those workers were nothing but a marketplace commodity to that corporation.

I have gone into a little detail in this case because what has happened there is really what is happening in almost every one of the closures that have hit us—the six in Hamilton—in the last few weeks. I suggest they are symptomatic of what is happening across Ontario.

We have the issue we raised today of Allen Industries in Hamilton. They produce a fibre material used under the hoods of automobiles and a number of other spots on the dash in the cars. They have been slowly cutting back on the production of that material. The company is now telling us, and we could have deduced it ourselves, that actually there are some new products coming on the market that are going to replace the need for all of this fibre matting that is used in automobile production.

Once again, this is a branch plant that is making decisions outside of Canada. Did we get consideration for that product, or for as long as we are going to carry the current fibre matting material? No, we will need this material manufactured for a couple of years but it is apparently going down to a plant in Virginia. They are now setting up a plant in Illinois to produce the new replacement material. Once again, 200 workers in the Stoney Creek plant are out of work and we are going to be importing what we used to manufacture.

8:40 p.m.

Mr. Munro, the federal Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, made it clear that the company had not talked at all to the federal authorities about any assistance or any chance of doing something about this as near as I can tell, except they are now involved in an industry and labour adjustment program discussion as related by the Minister of Industry and Trade in this House today; nor have we been involved in any serious discussions with this company.

The result is that by a corporate decision outside of this province we have 200 workers down the tube. We are now going to be importing that product. We were not even considered in terms of the replacement product for a variety of reasons, most of which involve corporate rationalization. That is going to help the company, just as the closure is going to help Consolidated-Bathurst in the closure of the plant in Hamilton.

We have the same thing going on to a lesser extent in True Temper Canada Ltd. and the same situation in H. and R. Johnson (Canada) Inc., which makes ceramic tile in Hamilton. They have a good, productive work force in that plant with some pride in their skills. They have now reached a situation where for the last couple of years most of the clay has been coming in from England, from the head office of the company. They have also slowly been bringing in and taking a look at some of the tiles from Italy and Spain. The company has now made a decision—and it also called it corporate rationalization—to shut down the Hamilton plant. Once again, 40 or 50 long-service workers are out of work. We are going to import the tiles from Italy, Spain and the head office in England. It is the same effect.

The Deputy Speaker: Order. We seem to have an unusual sharpness of other people speaking. I find it distracting.

Mr. Mackenzie: It is not unusual.

In the H. and R. Johnson case we have another example of where we are going to be totally importing the product we manufacture.

I got a bit of a laugh out of the shenanigans of our federal member Mr. Munro, who is the federal side of my riding. He has jumped in on every single one of these closures to date. He made a lot of noise in the H. and R. Johnson case and what he was going to do about it, but he has not produced one job or one plant remaining there or one new contract.

Indeed, for about the third day in a row he made a major story in the local press over the fact that he had worked out with Mohawk College a special six-week training program for the workers at H. and R. Johnson so they could upgrade their skills in installing ceramic tiles. Let me tell the House that I suspect most of that would have been worked out in the normal course as the people took advantage of the skills they had and as we try to put people into retraining programs.

I could change these plants to other plants across Ontario, but because I have been very closely involved in these particular operations in the last little while I want to use Flavorite Poultry Ltd. as an example also. It is only a year and a half ago that the United Co-operatives of Ontario purchased the plant. It had been modernized. It was supposedly capable of doing the entire small broiler chicken operation for that company in Ontario. They predicted great things for the Flavorite poultry plant.

One and a half years later the plant is sold. Once again, the minimum notice was given as far as the workers are concerned. We are told the operation is going to move to the Petersburg plant near Kitchener, which has the capacity not only to do the larger birds and turkeys, but also all of the small broiler chickens, and there is no future for the other plant and the 100 workers. In addition, there was a quota attached to that plant when they bought it. I am bloody well convinced that was the reason they did purchase the plant. That quota now goes with it to the plant at Petersburg.

Rationalization is a funny game in the way it is rolling over in Ontario. Not only did they close down that plant with the idea of moving the quota and the production to Petersburg, but only two weeks later we find that Maple Leaf Mills has bought the entire poultry operation from United Co-operatives, including the hatcheries.

When the workers asked, because they are just winding up their employment at the plant, they were told they have no intention of opening up the Flavorite plant. They had bought the package with the plant closed. They got the plant. What they will do with it I do not know, but they had bought it on that basis. It is pretty obvious there were some nice little negotiations going on in that situation and that it was closed deliberately by United Co-operatives to assist the sale to Maple Leaf Mills. Once again, though, in a corporate rationalization which is probably going to be better for Maple Leaf Mills in terms of their efficiency and their operation, there is no consideration beyond the basic consideration for the 100 employees who were in that plant.

I have mentioned just a few plants in my area. The fact is that this is going on generally and the question that has to be asked is when that is happening to the workers—and I suggest to the community in a very major way as well because of the costs that are involved—considering the effect on the workers if a company is able to rationalize to make its operation leaner, more efficient, more able to survive, when is part of the cost of that rationalization going to be more serious responsibility for the workers who are involved and for the community?

Do they not count, or are they strictly a marketable commodity? That sure shows this is the attitude we are taking; the total superiority, if you like, in terms of this government's thinking, of the capital side of the equation. They can say what they like; it is not the workers that count.

I want to go a little further. I want to mention what is happening in a number of other operations. Economically I do understand them to some extent, but once again I am asking, when do workers start counting in Ontario?

We are meeting this coming week with the 45 women, almost entirely Portuguese, who were part of the cleaning staff over at the Eaton Centre. We are meeting with them and their parish priest. They have been talking to us. They have been really upset because they had worked hard to organize and to get a union. They had worked hard to get a contract and in getting that contract they were told that they had better settle pretty cheaply or they were not going to be able to hang on to their jobs because somebody else would bid on the job.

I will probably get nailed for saying this, but they accepted what, even in the union's mind, was really a substandard contract. What happens? Two months later that contract is sold to another outfit in Toronto. When these women, most of whom have been working for a number of years in that cleaning operation, ask if there is something there that at least allows them to hang on to their jobs—because there is sure not going to be much more money involved—they are told no; they are out in the cold. I presume the wages that will be paid to the new group will probably be back where these women were before they started trying to organize. As I say, it was not a wage that would make any of us proud.

Or take the nursing home example used in this Legislature by my colleague the member for Scarborough West (Mr. R. F. Johnston), where we had eight of the women sitting in the gallery. I am pretty sure when we got a couple of rather crazy answers from the minister and some of the other interjections from the Tory side of the House they did not realize those were the women involved. They also had between eight and 14 years' seniority and the top wage among those women was $7.05 an hour after 14 years in that operation. Most of them earned considerably less than that—they were down around the $6 range in wages—and their contract was sold out.

We have a wide open free enterprise system in this province, in this country. Their contract was sold out when they made a desperate effort to hang on to their jobs. The company that bought out the contract finally said: "Okay, we will take you. But we will take you at $4.50 an hour." "Will you take all of us?" "Well, as we need you."

Significantly, the eight women who sat in this gallery the other night had the longest service and were really the instigators of getting the union in there a year or two ago to begin with. What has happened? Five of them have not been called back for one day in the two months since this agreement was worked out. The people who had just come on, and had much less seniority, are working at $4.50 an hour. Of those women, one of them had one and a half weeks, one had three days and one had two days that they were called in to work. They now understand the system a lot better.

When we talked to them after the session in the House, and there was an angry exchange between myself and some others and the Minister of Labour at the time, one of them said to me, and she was not an Anglo-Canadian: "Mr. Mackenzie, I could not understand what I was hearing in the House. I could not believe it." She also said, although it does not seem to bother the Tories: "I have voted Conservative since I have been able to vote in Canada. I won't do it again."

Unfortunately we are dealing with ones and twos. I wish we were dealing in this House in those kinds of situations in tens and twenties and thirties. But I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, and I am warning this government, that kind of message is getting across in Ontario, and the workers do not have very many benefits or very many rights.

8:50 p.m.

I want to go into another situation for just a moment. It is a tight and tough economy and one does not exercise one's rights in collective bargaining—the final right, the ultimate right, and that is the right to strike—very easily today. I know that the opinion of some of the more hard-hat members of this assembly is that workers are nuts and they go out at the drop of a hat. I have been involved with too many of them and servicing too many locals in my life to believe that, particularly with the situation as it is today.

I want members to know what happens when they finally do exercise that right. The case we have used in this House time and again in Central Precision Ltd. is a first-rate example of it, and just to drive the point home to some of the people who sit in this Legislature, somebody should take a look at that work force: 100-and-some employees, mostly Portuguese, some Italians, a handful of Anglos in that particular plant, with 11, 12, just short of 20 years of heavy labour in that plant.

They have gone through the mill. They had a very rough strike 11 years ago when they organized that plant. They were set upon literally by Grange and the Canadian Driver Pool Ltd., people with all of the strikebreaking tactics that are known, and they survived.

There had not been a strike since. But finally, 10 years later, the workers once again feel compelled—I will not say driven; it is a decision they made, but it was not an easy decision. Once again, if I can digress, I was surprised at the extent of the pride in their country, especially among the new Canadians in that plant. I was impressed by the sincerity and the number of those who held pretty close and pretty fundamental religious convictions. We sensed it when we talked to some of the women on that picket line.

Finally they were forced into a strike. The day the strike starts, we have Securicor, this great outfit in Ontario, called in by the company. I do not know what the cost is, but I suspect it is thousands of dollars a week and I suspect the figure that was given to some of the employees on the picket line, whom we brought in and had tell the Minister of Labour personally what had been said to them, was accurate.

What do we get on that line? We get the company trying to hire the strikebreakers. In the universal language of people who have to go on strike, they are the scabs. We get them crossing the lines in vans. We get these vans driving up at 7 a.m. or 7:15. Maybe it would be a good idea if some of the Tories joined us out there this coming Friday morning, when a good number of our caucus and most of the leadership of the trade union movement in Ontario will be on that line.

But we get them coming in; we get the Securicor cars inside the plant, driving up to within a few feet of the picket line. The cameras start whirring, and then as the scabs go through we get the obscene gestures, the remarks, the "up yours" and all the rest of it from the people inside the cars. Is it any wonder why people who are on strike—and it is their job, they are trying to better themselves, they have made that decision consciously, they have worked there for a good many years—get uptight and excited?

When we get that kind of confrontation, I do not know when there is not the odd side of a car kicked and maybe occasionally a headlight that gets smashed. I make no bones about it; I think they lay it out on the table. It is a minority of them. But it is also because of the harassment, the intimidation and the anger that is built up at people going in and taking their jobs that this can happen.

We have one of the officials of that security company coming up on the picket line after one of the confrontations and saying to the secretary of the local and the two or three people who were walking with this young lady: "Keep it going as long as you want. We don't care if the odd car gets scratched. It is all on our bill. The longer you keep this place closed, the longer we are collecting $20,000 a week." That is exactly what was said, and the people who heard it came in themselves to say it to the Minister of Labour.

That is the kind of intimidation and harassment we get.

Then we get Securicor—not the police, but the police being used in this province, I am sorry to say—one, two, three, four or five days later down at the local justice of the peace saying, “We have had a good deal of trouble with this gentleman,” swearing out arrest warrants for workers. We conveniently get the police arriving on that picket line two or three days later, right at the time the scabs are going to go into the plant, to serve those warrants, arrest those people and pull them down to the station.

Sometimes they are held overnight, as the first batch of four were, and go through all the processing and fingerprinting, one or two of which we know will be thrown out when we finally get to court because they were totally innocent. One or two are probably going to end up with—one case already has—a $23 mischief fine. The charges were only mischief, but they hauled them in. Now 27 of those workers have been hauled in and they have conveniently picked the time. In one case, they arrested four of them almost two weeks after the charges had been laid with the justice of the peace.

What happens to those workers? I can tell members what is happening to them. I can tell members what happens to Joe Periera, when he found out. He did not even know there was a warrant for his arrest. He was the 27th person to be picked up. The local union president called him and said, “You had better come to the station,” and he went. He went with his family. The first thing they did in the station, for a mischief charge, was to put the handcuffs on him.

I have talked to some of the wives and families of those strikers and I want the members to know what they are saying to me. I want to put one more equation into it. After they have had the morning confrontation and things have settled down for an hour or two and the scabs are in the plant, one of the Securicor cars drives out and goes across the street where a police car is parked for a good chunk of the day.

They move up side by side, roll the windows down and trade cigarettes back and forth and have a little bit of a talk. The workers on the line watch that. They are saying to me, some in good English, some in broken English: “Mr. Mackenzie, how can this happen? Where is the justice? We have struck the company. We are fighting Securicor. We are now fighting the police. When we have gone down to lay charges the same justice of the peace will not accept them. Where is the justice in Ontario?”

That is only one case, but unfortunately it happens in all too many cases. That one is just an outstanding one and an obscene case. Does the government not understand why workers in this province feel that way when they see the plant closures and no positive attempt is made to do something about that closure. When they see the decisions being made outside the province, does the government understand that they try to get whatever they have been able to gain in collective bargaining or the law allows?

Members know, I do not have to tell them. I do not have to dig up the figures here. We are now into the tens of thousands in plant shutdowns in Ontario. When one sees workers who do still exercise their rights and run into what one runs into on some of the picket lines, one can understand why these people were saying to me: “Where is the justice? How can this happen? This is Canada. I am a citizen. I am proud of this country. One of the reasons I came here was so we would not have this kind of thing happening.”

Most of the people in this Legislature and most in the public, if they are not directly involved in one of these confrontations, do not have an idea of what is happening and what is going on. My concern is not that these things are happening. If one has been in the trade union movement as long as I have, one gets to accept some of the confrontation and understands that it would be nice if we had another way and maybe we can look at it, but at the moment it is the last resort and the only real defence or argument workers have.

We cannot understand why we get sloughed off—that is the only word I can think of—so totally by this Minister of Labour and this government when we suggest legislation such as they have in two or three provinces to control or eliminate professional strikebreakers. I would go much further than that suggestion. Bill 12 that is filed in this House would go much further for the first time.

My bill is one that will do nothing more than control professional strikebreakers on a picket line situation, and for the seven and a half years I have been in this House the government has said, “No way.” It says, “No way,” in terms of the suggestions that we try to make in this House.

Neither the Tories nor the Liberals can get out of responsibility for this. Three years ago when the plant shutdown committee took a look at 13 plants, before we had the recent influx, the big increased unemployment and a situation that has worsened, there was only one of them in Ontario, the Heintzman plant, that was not a classic, that did not fit the mould.

Most of them were making money, some not as much as they had made. Some of them were doing very well. All of them were closed by decisions of the head office outside of Ontario, outside of Canada. All of them were closed without any real consideration other than what they had gained, in most cases themselves, through collective bargaining of the workers. The cost to those workers and to their communities, I suggest, is a pretty substantial cost to the province.

We looked at them. We were surprised at the number of them not doing any real research and development. They were not trying to supply an offshore market, in some cases because they were not allowed. We tried to make a number of recommendations. Of course, members all know that the realities of March 19, 1981, which the Tories love to speak of, meant that committee has never been reconstituted and it never reported.

We had one brief interim report on a few minor matters. I can recall well, with my colleagues on that committee, arguing and fighting and trying to convince the Tory and the Liberal committee members to agree to much earlier notification, to agree to a community adjustment fund and, probably most important of all, to agree to a public justification procedure. That might not stop what was happening, but it would at least require a corporation to go before a review board, to open up its books, to give its justification for the closure. It may very well be that we can make even more money by closing, regardless of what is happening here.

It would also allow some input from the workers in the particular plant and from the government, because it just might not be—never mind the workers—in the government's interest to see another several million dollars of imports coming into the province where we were currently producing. The Bendix plant in Windsor is a classic example of that. It might have made sense, certainly in the Consolidated-Bathurst case, if the company had had to give notice six months in advance of what it was going to do to that plant.

If the company had been required to go before a public justification procedure, the workers would have been alerted, and the package they pulled together with help from some other financiers, as well as a pile of their own money they were ready to put into it, would at least have been a viable option that the company would have had to consider. If they are in private enterprise, why does the competition worry them, especially when it is coming from an old plant they do not really think is any good any more? I cannot understand that and I have not had a Tory in this House give me a clear explanation of why.

If we had had the public justification procedure, we would have bought some time. We would probably have forced that company, through the pressure of public opinion, if you like, at least to take a look at the workers' offer to operate the plant.

I want to make it clear I have a lot of sympathy with more worker control. I have no difficulties with crown corporations, with joint ventures or with private entrepreneurs, but I think there has to be some responsibility. If there was a better way, or another buyer for the plant, that would not bother me either. I am talking of the private market. On the other hand, I think if the workers decide that is the route they want to go and nobody else wants to purchase it, they should have that right.

With the public justification procedure, we would have bought some time. None of the Liberals would support that in the committee, as some of them will remember. That is one of the reasons I get a little ticked off when I hear John Munro talk about what we can do for workers. I tell him, "Darned little, my friend." I ask him, "Why are we in Ontario reduced to begging?"

As I have told most of these workers—and I was not happy doing it—that is exactly what we are doing when we are faced with an after-the-fact announcement of a closure of an operation that means hundreds of jobs. We are begging the company to stay open or to let us purchase it or for some help from the federal or provincial governments. We are literally begging. Why should we be?

There is only one answer at the moment. Barring a miraculous turnaround of the economy that takes care of everything and everybody involved, the only answer is by setting some rules or some legislation. Every time the press gets after the Minister of Labour after we have had a hassle in this House over the latest plant closure and the latest injustice to workers, he says he sympathizes every bit as much as we do. I grant him that.

I respect the fact that he personally feels strongly about it, but I wonder how long he is going to continue trying to resolve every one of a hundred problems a week that are coming across his desk, rather than taking a look at what we could do with legislation that might reduce the number of problems we are facing, that might give some clout, some rights to workers in Ontario.

I also wonder why we do not have some kind of justification procedure, longer notice, some kind of community adjustment fund. Are these things so totally out of line? If they are, all I am asking the members opposite and the members on my right is that they give us some clear, workable alternatives that answer the problem, because they are not doing that.

Do not talk to me about the bills, do not talk to me about the industry and labour adjustment program or the temporary and minimum-wage jobs we are creating. When we are in trouble, no one knocks any jobs the government creates. But we are not taking a look at the basic structure of the branch plant economy we have in Ontario. Until we do and until we stop relying on being able to put up a few more branch plants that will close down when the parent office decides they are going to close down and that do not have any real commitment to this province, we are not going to solve our employment problem in Ontario.

We have to take a serious look at protecting some of the existing smoke-stack industries, as they are now called by some people, the basic industries where the jobs are in this province. It is not good enough to accept, as some members in this House seem to have done, that there is no future any more in any long-term period in the basic industrial structure of the province, that our future has to be in high-tech industries, chip technology and in moving into that new field.

There is no one in my party on the benches in this part of the House who will disagree and say we do not have to move into this field in a hurry and with some planning. What we do wonder, and I have to raise it in all seriousness, is how long it is going to take us to get into this high-tech industry. What kind of jobs are going to be there? Do we not realize every industrial country in the world, as well as the Third World, is trying desperately to get into that same field?

What makes us think we are going to be able to corner the market in that field? What are we going to do in the time it takes to get it moving and going in terms of the tens of thousands of workers we still have in traditional industrial plants in Ontario, and if we continue the bash-the-worker syndrome we seem to have going on to downgrade wages?

One of the things the government's Bill 179 has effectively done is exactly what it wanted. It may have been directed at only 14 or 15 per cent of the people, in the public sector, but it has had exactly that effect in the private sector and wage settlements are running at considerably less than six per cent. There was the industrialists' plea to the Premier (Mr. Davis) when they said: "Do not back off in terms of Bill 179, but make sure you do not impose it on the private sector because we can do better. If you impose it at nine and five, that is what we will have to pay." In fact, they are paying less in the settlements now coming across the bargaining table.

If we continue to depress wages, put 782,000 people out of work in Ontario and do not come up with the jobs and the programs to answer that problem, and if we do get lucky and move into and corner a bit of the market in terms of jobs in the high-tech industries, what are we going to be doing it at? Instead of the current, traditional heavy industry wages of $10, $11 or $12 an hour, a little better in some cases and a little less in others, are we going to move into this new industry at $6 and $7 an hour?

We see a deliberate suppression of wages and benefits in this province—and I think it is deliberate; I do not think it is happening just as a result of what is going on. I think, and forgive my cynicism, that it is a deliberate attempt to do that kind of downgrading.

The argument used, of course, is we have to be more competitive in world markets. That is a lot of nonsense. We have to decide we are going to protect some of our industries. We have to decide that one of the ways we do it is probably through content legislation. We have to decide that where we can do something well, and we in this party in this House have all given examples, that is probably an area that is worthy of some subsidization.

We should keep a good chunk of the industrial jobs we currently have in Ontario and pick up whatever we can, both in the service sector, which has been the big growth sector until now and is also getting cut back because of restraint programs, and in our attempts to get into the high-tech area.

If the pundits are correct, we are faced with further mechanization and robotization of our industries and even of many of the service industries whether banks, offices, insurance companies, etc. If they are correct, one of the benefits of this high-tech industrial revolution that is going on is that we are going to be able to do even more with fewer people and we are going to be able to program the entire assembly operation in a plant with a chip an inch square.

If that is true, and I happen to believe it is and the evidence is increasing that this is the case, where is the income going to be? I veritably believe we no longer have a basic problem with production in the western world. Our problem is consumption. Where is the money going to be for people to buy the goods we can produce? How are we going to do a redistribution?

That is another area. I am not going to take the trouble now to dig into the figures, but the facts are that the income of the top 10 per cent in this country is growing and has been growing steadily. In the bottom 40 per cent it has been shrinking. I am simply saying I have seen nothing in that throne speech, absolutely nothing, that speaks to any kind of income redistribution.

9:10 p.m.

It sure as blazes does not help the really low-income people. It sure as blazes is not going to help a heck of a lot of workers who all of a sudden find, because of the plant shutdowns and transfers, they are knocked back from their current, reasonably paid jobs, at $10, $11, $12 per hour, to anywhere from minimum wage up to $7 or $8 per hour. I have talked to an awful lot of people who have had to make that kind of drop, 30 and 40 per cent in their wages, when they finally did find a new job.

If we are going to go into this Valhalla of tomorrow, this chip technology, are we going to go into it at a $6 and $7 wage level in this province, in this country? Where is the purchasing power going to be?

I suggest we in this House have not taken that question seriously enough. We really have not taken a serious look at it. Not only is there nothing in the throne speech to really protect jobs, there is nothing about any meaningful restructuring. There are a few million dollars for some short-term and minimum-wage jobs, and a few maybe at a little bit better than that, but no real restructuring of our economy, no effort to gain a little more control, no effort to come to grips with the branch plant economy from which we are suffering in this province, no effort to deal with income redistribution so that, if we can produce these miracles, people have the wherewithal to buy the goods we produce.

We have none of that. With 782,000 people in Ontario out of work, with 233,000 young people and 230,000 women, where in blazes is this government? Where in blazes is a positive, hard-hitting, real program? With due respect, Mr. Speaker, it does not exist.

We see patchwork; we see no real effort to deal with the basic problems. We do not see this kind of program, and we do not hear much of an alternative from the Liberals. I simply have to say that we have not come to grips with our really serious problems in Ontario.

We could get into pensions. We could get into safety and health. I had intended to read a couple of memos, but do not have time now, unfortunately. One of them has to do with coke oven emissions—a favorite hobby-horse of mine—something which has resulted in an awful lot of workers dying from lung cancer. Even Weiler is now saying an awful lot of them never got the benefits they should have from the Workers' Compensation Board.

We have that kind of situation, and there are problems with the new regulations that we are now trying to resolve. Let me just read a paragraph out of this memo I just got, almost in desperation, from the union at Stelco. "Stelco will not agree that people who work in the coal-handling and byproducts plant should be covered by the new regulations. This particular operation covers better than 40 people. The company is using this section, subsection 3(1), to exclude workers in the coal-handling operation, some of whom are actually working in bunkers right over the coke ovens, and workers in the byproducts plant. Although in some operations the byproducts plant might be remote from the coke ovens, at Stelco it is only 50 or 60 feet away."

The memo goes on to point out they are actually getting the same kind of exposure as those who actually work on the coke ovens, and sections of the act are being used to deny them the coverage we are supposed to now have under one of the five. How many years has it taken us to get five designated substances?

I would like to have covered many more things, but all of those tell us that working people are not among the priorities in Ontario. I do not care whether it is jobs, whether it is health, whether it is their rights in a legal strike situation, or what it is.

I am also saying this government had better get off its can and start taking a look at the problems people have—women, youngsters, workers—which it is not doing at the current time.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this, I believe the third throne speech debate I have taken part in since I was elected some two years ago. As I recall, I am sure that in both those first two debates I focused my remarks on matters of an economic nature—questions of jobs in industry and so on. I will be doing so in this one, and I suspect in throne speech debates to come I again will be talking about matters of an economic nature.

I would like to pick up on a few of the themes that were being developed by the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie), when he spoke a few moments ago.

First of all, just as a passing remark and one of local importance to me when he talked about labour relations, there has been a strike going on at one of our major industries in Brantford—actually just outside of Brantford, in the great riding of Brant-Oxford-Norfolk—at Pullman Trailmobile Canada Ltd.

Mr. Brandt: Who is the representative there?

Mr. Gillies: The representative for that particular riding is here, of course.

I am very concerned about the fact that this labour dispute between the United Automobile Workers and Pullman Trailmobile has been going on since January. I gather that neither the union nor the company is talking at this time. The negotiations have broken down almost entirely. I have some very grave concerns because, as I talk to the workers of that company who live in my constituency, I feel they want to work. I think we reach a very fundamental problem in this type of dispute, which was alluded to by the member opposite.

The members want to go back to work, and the economy is in a very bad state.

Mr. Wildman: What is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay) doing?

Mr. Gillies: Working on it. At the same time, I am sure the legitimate concerns of the workers and their union would be such that they would not want to cave in to whatever position the company first puts forward and go back to work, perhaps prematurely before a suitable negotiated settlement has been reached.

I am not saying this is necessarily the case in this particular dispute, but I do have a great concern that at a time of high unemployment, at a time of dislocation in the industrial sector, there might be a tendency for some labour disputes to stretch out longer than they should, simply because in some ways that is in itself an economical short-term solution.

Mr. Wildman: What the member is saying is that it is a management dispute, it is not a labour dispute.

Mr. Gillies: I would say that some employers perhaps can see the value in a factory sitting idle at the current time while labour negotiations go on and people do not work. This has to be unacceptable. At the same time, this would be one of the inadequate solutions that arises out of the current system of labour negotiations that we have.

I can only echo the words of the member for Hamilton East when he said that new mechanisms and new solutions are needed. I would hope that in the current session and in coming years our government and the members opposite will be looking at this as an area of very grave concern.

Mr. Nixon: Your days are numbered.

Mr. Gillies: Never. Another concern alluded to by the previous speaker is the whole question of the changing industrial economy. My constituency, the city of Brantford, is very much a heavy manufacturing city. The major companies, Massey-Ferguson, White Farm Equipment, Pullman Trailmobile and others, are basically steel fabrication plants.

As I read more and more about the so-called microtechnological revolution, and I saw an item on one of the television journals last week about a city in southern California which is now almost entirely dependent upon microtechnological industries, I have to agree again with previous speakers that this does not really provide the whole answer.

There was an item on television last week about a city in California—I believe it was Oakland—and the employment situation there. It became very apparent that many of the microchip industries created a very small number of positions for executives, for engineers and scientists and a very large number of unskilled and fairly low-paying positions for the working men. Many of the people working in these plants in the city that was addressed in this TV program were not the principal breadwinner but a working woman, a second or third member of a family who was working to supplement another income.

It would be a very difficult situation, I would suggest, if we ignore the plight of heavy manufacturing and think that all of the answers and all of the solutions for our future economic development are going to come with microtechnology. What are we going to do with a very large pool of skilled industrial workers who are used to a certain standard of living, a certain standard of wage and a type of work which, it is becoming evident, is in increasingly short supply?

Mr. Martel: Is that right?

Mr. Gillies: I think it is. Of course, as I turn from both Pullman Trailmobile and those brief points on microtechnology, of great and pressing concern not only to me but to the other elected representatives in the Brantford area, is the situation of White Farm Equipment.

9:20 p.m.

I believe most members of this House are somewhat familiar with the background of that company. It has existed and operated in the city of Brantford for well over 100 years now, originally as the Cockshutt Plow Co., then as Cockshutt Farm Equipment Ltd., and now as White Farm Equipment. In good times, that company has employed over 1,000 people both in manufacturing and in the office. Now there is a mere handful of them working. The member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk (Mr. Nixon), the mayor of Brantford, the federal member for Brant and I met with the workers, the United Auto Workers members, last week to talk about the current situation.

Mr. Conway: Was Mac Makarchuk there?

Mr. Nixon: Mac was not in evidence.

Mr. Gillies: No, my illustrious predecessor was not. I have to assume he had another engagement.

We did meet with the workers and it was not a happy occasion. These people are upset, angry and frustrated. Many of them worked for that company for 15 or 20 years before the current situation and now, with very few of what might be called almost work interruptions, they have not been at their jobs for a period of some two years. The reasons are quite evident. White Farm is not one of the primary farm equipment manufacturers. It accounts for about four per cent of the North American market. As competition increased, as the agricultural economy worsened, its situation in the marketplace became more and more difficult.

I meet regularly with officials both from Massey-Ferguson and White Farm Equipment in my riding—naturally, as they are the two largest and most important employers in my riding—and there has been no glimmer of light in the farm equipment industry in at least the first quarter of 1983. As one executive of Massey-Ferguson said to me in the last couple of weeks, "1982 was a terrible year for the farm equipment industry, and 1983 at this point is looking worse."

White Farm Equipment is in a difficult situation. There were those who said that as interest rates declined things would pick up and the farmers who have been under the gun in the last year or so would start buying equipment again. It is not quite that easy. Interest rates are down, but that is not enough. Commodity prices remain at a low level. We have to remember also that the great bulk of the equipment manufactured in Brantford, both by White Farm Equipment and Massey-Ferguson, is not sold in Canada but is exported.

One problem we are faced with is the agricultural policy of the Reagan administration in which farmers in the United States are actually being subsidized by the federal government simply to let 20 per cent of their acreage lie fallow. They are being paid not to plant their crops. When one considers the already low commodity prices, one can see the marketplace is simply not conducive to the sale of heavy pieces of equipment to farmers.

Another situation that has been damaging has been the incidence of farm bankruptcies in the last year. As farmers have gone bankrupt, good used equipment, combines and tractors, has gone on the market and has been sold at bargain basement prices. The farmer again is in a situation where he can pick up a combine that is perhaps two or three years old for $30,000 or $40,000, whereas a new one is going to cost him, depending on the model and type, anywhere between $80,000 and $130,000. We have to remember those prices when we talk about farm equipment.

The interest, the carrying charges alone, for a farmer buying a new combine can be in the neighbourhood of $10,000 or $15,000 a year. We are not talking about principal. That is the interest alone. The farmer has to be in a very good position in terms of his equity in his farm and in terms of his debt load to invest that kind of money in equipment.

At the meeting last week, where, as I said, all the elected representatives—federal, provincial and municipal—from the Brantford area were in attendance, there was a lot of angry discussion. There were some solutions put forward, many of which appeared attractive at first but which, I think, bear consideration.

The federal member for Brant, Mr. Blackburn, a very fine gentleman and a friend, is a member of the New Democratic Party. He favours, or has emphasized in his statements on White Farm Equipment, the proposition that the federal government should force the current owners of White Farm Equipment into receivership with the vague suggestion that something better awaits the workers after that happens.

I do not question the motives of my honourable colleague in the federal House, but I do think that is a very shaky proposition to put before these workers. What guarantee do we have that if the current owners of White Farm Equipment go into receivership there is another willing buyer for the company or that some other arrangement could be made?

Mr. Wildman: Did you not support the sale of that company?

Mr. Gillies: Yes, indeed I did. I supported the sale of that company and I happen to think the fact that a buyer was found at the time is the reason that it still exists and that at least some of the people are still working.

Mr. Wildman: A handful.

Mr. Gillies: A handful indeed. It is not a happy situation.

I would put the proposition again for the consideration of members who may read such statements as those made by Mr. Blackburn last week, that White Farm Equipment should be forced into receivership, that some vague promise of a better future awaits those 1,000 workers after that happens. I think we should look at that very carefully and perhaps take it with a grain of salt.

I myself would want to have a better idea of what that future is. I would like to have a better idea whether there is another buyer in the wings, as has been suggested but not confirmed. I would like to know if there is any workable proposal between the two levels of government and the company or between the two levels of government and the workers to create a new White entity.

At the root of all this is simply this fact: no matter who owns the company, no matter who is trying to operate that company and sell the product it makes, the root problem is the marketplace; the product is simply not being sold.

I am aware of figures—which I would certainly not use in this House—I am quite aware of the number of combines sold by the major manufacturers of farm equipment in this country in the last number of months and those figures are just short of frightening. Where I might have guessed that X number of Massey-Ferguson combines were sold in January, in fact I found that the truth was that about one tenth of what I estimated was the case.

I have a tremendous concern, and I might add that we as legislators have to share that concern, because our government has a commitment to White Farm Equipment of some $7.5 million in taxpayers' dollars—$5.5 million in loan guarantees and $2 million in cold, hard cash that the company is already using. I would suggest it is our responsibility as members, and it is certainly the responsibility of the government, not only to work for the continuation of White Farm Equipment and the betterment of the workers, but to safeguard the public's investment in that company. We certainly hope to see an improvement in that situation soon.

Just in the last day I have become aware, through a letter circulated by the president of White Canada to his dealer network, that refinancing arrangements have been completed for the company in the United States. So White US, with its financial backing by Borg Warner Acceptance and other creditors in the United States, may be in a better position to continue than we had previously thought.

I think that gives some reason to be encouraged about the prospects of White Canada. The negotiations between the Ministry of Industry and Trade here and the company continue, and the negotiations continue in Ottawa; we will be awaiting the outcome of those negotiations in the coming weeks with some very grave concern.

Since I last spoke on a throne debate, the situation at Massey-Ferguson is somewhat better. Certainly, their prospects would appear to be somewhat brighter than was the case in months past. About one half of the Brantford work force is working on the day shift at Massey-Ferguson. They are producing and the combines are leaving the plant and the yard, which I know many members see as they pass through Brantford on the train on their way to southwestern Ontario ridings in particular. I often have members from southwestern Ontario come up to me and say, "I passed the Massey plant on Friday and there do not seem to be too many machines in the yard. You must be pretty happy about that;" or conversely, "I saw a sea of red as I drove through Brantford the other day. You must be awfully worried about that." So that is the barometer we keep an eye on.

9:30 p.m.

About half of the workers are in the plant, a full day shift. We have seen in the past year the consolidation, or if you will the rationalization, of some of Massey-Ferguson's American operations into the Brantford operation. I do not particularly disagree with some of the earlier comments made by members opposite about the nature of our branch plant economy, but I guess it is a small irony that in this particular case the fact that Massey-Ferguson is a Canadian multinational company and has rationalized many of its operations back into Canada is going to be of long-term benefit to the people of Brantford and to the employees of the company. For instance, the manufacture of tractor parts, which was previously done in Des Moines, Iowa, has now been moved to Brantford.

We are also very keenly aware of the comments made by Victor Rice last week at the Massey shareholders' meeting. I am sure some of the members from the west end of Toronto and I would share a concern about the future of the Toronto jobs at Massey-Ferguson. Based on the comments made last week, it would appear that some of the operation in this case may be rationalized from Toronto to Brantford. We do not know at this stage, and I think the time frame used was some two to five years down the road, but I think we will be very concerned to see whether as many of the Toronto jobs are protected either by transfer to Brantford or by early retirement mechanisms or other mechanisms which may be available to the company. We would certainly hope there will not be a large shortfall of jobs if the Toronto Massey-Ferguson plants, as has been suggested by the chairman of the company, do close and move back to Brantford. We will be watching that situation very closely.

Obviously of great concern to me and to my community and to the many employees of that company is the future of Massey-Ferguson. As members of this House, we all must be terribly concerned about the future of that company, not just because of its importance to Canada or because it is one of our larger indigenous corporations in Canada and produces an extremely fine product, which is exported throughout the world and which brings our manufacturing industry in Canada credit throughout the world, but because, when we come down to hard dollars and cents, we have to be concerned because of the very large public investment in that company. In this case there is a total of some $225 million in loans and loan guarantees by this government, which I think accounts for some $78 million of that, and by the government of Canada.

We all have an obligation to monitor the ongoing operation of this company and to see that the taxpayers' interest in Massey-Ferguson is protected and that the guarantees made by Massey-Ferguson and renegotiated within the last year are held to.

The employment levels promised in the original Massey agreement are being held to. I cannot say in all honesty I take a great deal of encouragement from that, because when we speak of about 13 per cent of its worldwide jobs having to be within the borders of our country, obviously 13 per cent of a smaller number of workers is somewhat easier to achieve. Massey-Ferguson's world work force and its worldwide operations have shrunk. Their avowed intention is to become a leaner and more competitive company. In the long run this has to be the solution for Massey-Ferguson.

I would be less than honest if I were to suggest I believe that the 4,000 plus people who have worked in the past for Massey-Ferguson at its peak within Brant county would ever in those numbers again work for that company. I feel that is probably unrealistic and eventually, when the company is back up to three shifts and back up to full production, I would imagine that the full employment of the company in Brantford will be somewhere between 2,500 and 3,000 people. So when I talk about White Farm Equipment or Pullman Trailmobile and Massey, I am really getting at some of the problems that face a basically one-industry town.

I am sure that many members have visited my community at some point. I hear comments from members. Many who have visited for the first time are impressed by what an attractive community it is, and I believe that in my maiden speech in this House I probably went on at great length about what an attractive community it is.

I bring this to mind because as all of the bad economic news hit about the situation in the industrial sector in Brantford in the last two years, there grew an impression, I think, in certain minds, that Brantford was just a mess of smokestacks and factories and was in fact a depressed and unattractive community. Those of us who represent the city do our best at every opportunity to point out to those who have not been there that this is simply not the case. Brantford is in fact a very beautiful and historic city with outstanding cultural and sports facilities and an award-winning parks board.

I may sound as if I am giving a chamber of commerce speech here, but I would urge any members who have a very negative impression of Brantford to go there and visit. I would be pleased to host any member of this House at breakfast, lunch or dinner any time he would like to come down, because I think—

Mr. Boudria: At any one of them?

Mr. Gillies: I said "breakfast, lunch or dinner," not "and." I make that offer because I think anyone who sees Brantford and sees what a wonderful place it is goes away and becomes an ambassador of that great community himself.

Mr. Epp: I will take you up on that.

Mr. Gillies: I do owe the member for Waterloo North one from the last time I was in his great community, which is also just lovely.

The solution for a town like Brantford, as I see it, has to be the diversification of the industrial base. We are in bad times now; we have been in bad times economically for over a year. But this is nothing new. I talk to older people who have been in politics or the labour movement or the management of companies in Brantford for many years. They will point out to me that the roller-coaster nature of that city's economy has always been the case and is in fact tied to the nature of our industrial base.

It is a simple equation: when farm equipment and the agricultural economy boom, Brantford booms, and with one of the highest industrial wage levels in the province and a very thriving community in good times; but when that agricultural economy and the farm equipment industry go belly up, I had better say or into a slump, then the situation on my community is absolutely devastating when you consider that over 20 per cent of the work force is directly or indirectly employed in the farm equipment industry.

So in our attempts to draw new employment into the city the thrust we have used co-operatively as the representatives of the area has been based on the premise that on any given day we would rather have 10 companies come in, each employing 100 people, than one company employing 1,000.

I am not particularly in the habit of throwing bouquets at the government of Canada and at times I am as critical of many of their policies as are many members of this House, but I do point to the very positive benefits that the designation of Brant county under the industry and labour adjustment program has had. We have seen new, small companies locate in Brantford, and people are being hired and taken up by these companies—not in massive numbers: 50 here, 80 there, 12 there; I see this as the key to the future prosperity of that community.

When I see smaller companies like Westcan moving into Brantford, I take a great deal of encouragement from that. I might add that we are not talking necessarily about high-technology companies; we are just talking about the kinds of companies, as in the case of Westcan, that make something as simple as baseboard heaters; but they are making them, and they are making a good product. They are making it at a very competitive price and it is selling. This is a trend we should continue. Many of these industry and labour adjustment program companies are coming into Brantford with the co-operation of and with various types of financial assistance through the Ontario Development Corp.

Over the couple of years I have been the member for Brantford, I have seen many small enterprises assisted in Brantford through the Ontario Development Corp. If one tallied them all up, it would come to over 600 jobs; but it is not headline news because, as I said, we are talking about smaller enterprises which get loan guarantees, loans, grants or whatever assistance is available for them in order to set up. Over a period of time it all adds up.

I have some hope for the future. I also have some great concerns about the major employers in my area, but I have to think that in the coming months there will be somewhat more reasonable commodity prices for our farmers and for farmers throughout North America. With a few other beneficial changes we could see a great turnaround in the farm equipment industry. I do not expect it overnight. I guess I become a little frustrated sometimes because Brantford did slump into the recession very early, as the farm equipment industry was one of the first to go bad, even before the auto sector. I do not see it pulling out of the recession early either.

Mr. Martel: They need a good member, that's all.

Mr. Gillies: I do not necessarily tie it to that, but my friend has a point.

Mr. Martel: I did not think he would agree with me.

Mr. Gillies: I would like to turn from those somewhat localized concerns and the opportunity to speak about them to another area about which I have great concern and some responsibility. It was touched on in the throne speech. It is the whole area of youth employment. I have tremendous concerns about the future of our young people but, at the same time, I see great things happening and programs being developed which are going to be of benefit to young people throughout the province.

These things are happening largely because of the leadership and guidance given to the youth secretariat by the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch), who is doing an outstanding job in very difficult circumstances of showing some light and hope for the young people of this province. I am going to take severe exception at this time to those callous and unfeeling members of the opposition who have found it fashionable in recent days to criticize my minister because of the breadth of her responsibilities and the breadth of her concerns, saying she and the secretariat are not doing the job they are designed to do. They are dead wrong.

I have watched this minister for two years. The members opposite may be interested to know that in two weeks I am coming to my biennial at the youth secretariat which we will probably be celebrating. We have seen the growth and development of programs for the benefit of young people.

One of the earlier speakers mentioned, quite correctly, the grave situation for the young unemployed in the current economy, with some 235,000 young people in this province out of work. To put that on a percentage basis we should be aware that while the national unemployment rate in Canada hovers between about 12 and 13 per cent, at the current time it is much higher among young people, over 20 per cent. I have some concerns. My concern is simply—

Mr. Martel: Your government has done nothing.

Interjections.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cousens): Order.

Mr. Gillies: I am just warming up.

I have some concern that the focus of public concern may be shifting away from our young people. Why do I say this? Partly, I think, it is because of demographics. Let us throw our minds back to the 1960s when the great strides being made in policy in this province were in the field of education, when we saw the development of Ontario's modern and first-class system of education. What were the issues on the front pages of the newspapers in the 1960s? They were issues of interest to young people. They were issues such as unrest on campus and things that were of primary focus to the young.

In the 1970s—and I am sure honourable members would agree with me—the developing issues were those of health care. Perhaps education as a focus of public concern started to take a bit of a back seat.

My experience and the experience of some of my friends in this chamber would point out, I am absolutely convinced, that in the coming 10 years the great public issue, not only in this province but in this country, is going to be in the field of pensions. Some of the things we uncovered in the select committee on pensions give us great reasons to be concerned.

This is no accident. This shift in focus is simply a reflection—

Mr. Boudria: Look at how we have progressed on that issue.

The Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gillies:—of the ageing society in which we live. What we are seeing is a change in the demographic makeup of our population.

Where does that leave the young people? Where does that leave the people who are leaving school now? Where does it leave the ones who are looking to the future and wondering where they will be some years down the road? It is a very serious situation.

Mr. Boudria: Are you going to give them pensions?

Mr. Gillies: I would suggest the problem is deep, but we have to look at the unemployment figure as it pertains to young people. Yes, there is about 20 per cent across the board unemployment, but as I point out whenever I am speaking to a group of young people, as I do periodically, the unemployment rate among young people who leave the school system at about grade nine or 10 rises to over 30 per cent. Among those who finish high school, it falls to around 15 per cent and among those who have a university degree, a college certificate, or apprenticeship training, it falls to around eight or nine per cent.

This is very significant and I always try to make the point on campuses and in schools that despite all the talk one hears that it does not matter any more in the 1980s whether one finishes school or not because there are no jobs, the facts are simply to the contrary. The biggest favour young persons can do themselves in this tight economy is to stay in school, finish their education and get as much training as they can. It is still beneficial in this day and age.

In the last year, 1982-83, on youth employment programs alone, and I am not talking about the Canada-Ontario employment development program and I am not talking about job creation programs that affect the whole working population, we have spent over $90 million to create over 90,000 jobs.

I was greatly encouraged when I saw the reference on April 18 when His Honour spoke to us, when he alluded to the fact that in the coming budget the spending on youth employment programs alone will rise to some $120 million, an increase of some $30 million. Yet I come here and I open the paper in the morning and I repeatedly hear my friends opposite saying that we are spending less money on youth employment than we have in the past.

Let me ask some of my friends on this side, many of whom know a lot more about math than I do, since when is $120 million less than $90 million? Can somebody help me with that, please?

Mr. Brandt: They cannot add.

Mr. Gillies: They cannot add; they do not know the answer. I will send it over—$120 million to create many new jobs for young people. A copy was just delivered to my seat mate. I should send it opposite.

Mr. Shymko: En français.

Mr. Gillies: En français, aussi—mais $120 million, as opposed to $90 million.

9:50 p.m.

Am I nearly finished? I am coming to the conclusion of my remarks, I am led to understand.

The programs of the Provincial Secretary for Social Development—the experience program; the student venture capital program; the new winter experience program; the Ontario career action program, under our colleague the Minister of Colleges and Universities (Miss Stephenson); the Ontario youth employment program, which is so popular with the farmers and the small business people of this province and which is administered by our colleague the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett)—are doing a tremendous job. They are doing their bit to cut into this massive unemployment problem among the young.

We now read in His Honour's speech that these programs will be enriched. Our already tremendous commitment to youth employment will be enriched and more people will participate in those programs this year than ever before. More people will find themselves in job situations; and I trust that many of them, once they have that first work experience, will be able to go on and find jobs in the marketplace.

One last point before I wrap up. Because we ran the winter experience program for the first time during the past couple of months, I had an opportunity to go into several communities where we were running it. I spent a day in Niagara Falls and a day in Oshawa. I had no idea or preconception as to how many of the participants in that short-term program would find jobs or be retained in jobs at the end of the program.

I am sure members know how winter experience operates. Through the youth employment counselling centres—we now have 29 across the province, and we are heading for 50—young people are placed with a private sector employer for a period of no more than 20 weeks. They receive training, they work and are paid, albeit not handsomely, for that period of 20 weeks.

Frankly, I had no preconception as to what percentage of them might find themselves in an employment situation at the end of the program. We are doing a study of that now, and I can tell honourable members that the figures are very encouraging indeed. In fact, among the young people I spoke to in Oshawa when I toured the program there, more than half of them had either a full-time job or a part-time job arising out their winter experience jobs. This was a much higher figure than I had expected, and I take a great deal of encouragement from it.

These opportunities made available by the youth secretariat gave some of these young people their first jobs in two years. It gave some of them their first glimmer of hope, their first indication that there was anything for them. Many of them now have developed the confidence to find a place in the work force.

If I get a little angry when I hear unjust criticism of what we are trying to do, that is why. I do not hear the criticism or the endless negative comments from the young people in the programs. I do not hear it from the people who are being given a chance by this government. I hear it from people who have not taken the time to go out to talk to the participants and see what we are doing.

I will stand by the efforts of this government, by our overwhelming commitment to the young people of this province and by the outstanding leadership of the Provincial Secretary for Social Development in co-ordinating those efforts.

Mr. J. M. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that you have recognized me, and I thank you for doing that. I hope you will pay attention to some of the comments I have to make, because they especially relate to your part of the province.

A year ago I felt the three major important concerns we had as a government were inflation, unemployment and high interest rates.

Inflation, in the combination of world events, because of the American economy and for whatever reasons—not that we take any credit for it—has moderated, and I think we are in better shape in that regard. Interest rates, for the same reasons, have come down; and again we are very pleased that has happened. Unfortunately, unemployment has not moderated, and it is of concern to every single member of this Legislature.

I have a personal stake in the unemployment situation. My son was laid off last week. He has worked for several years with one of the best construction companies in the province and he was laid off because of lack of work. We talk about retraining and things of this nature, but that is not going to solve such a problem. It is a fact of the economy of the province and we have to face up to it. I firmly believe it is time we took some incentive in job creation programs, in some type of public works programs that would provide employment for people in this kind of trade, and also that we should stimulate the economy in other ways.

In the riding I represent, Wellington-Dufferin-Peel, which is basically rural and small business, the people have suffered greatly from the high interest rates. The farmers especially have paid the price in the last few years, as has the small business community. I personally was in business for over 30 years, and I know the amount of support a small business community receives from any level of government. It is not very much. I do not think anyone should take credit for what we do for the small business community because, frankly, it is not that great. I speak as a member of the government.

Actually I am not sure business people want that kind of support. When I was in business, my main concern was the less government involvement, the better. We wanted to be left alone to do our own thing, to stimulate our business in the best way we could. We did not look for government assistance. We did not want programs and we did not want handouts.

I think most in the business community feel that way. Just give them the climate they can work in to the best of their ability, do not interfere with business and do not saddle them with collecting a lot of taxes and a lot of obligations they do not want. This year, with the interest rates moderating, our business community has an opportunity to advance again into the kind of constructive trade they are capable of. I think, without interference, they will do this.

The farming community, if given a chance, can again come back to the level it was at three or four years ago and start to improve. I have some concerns about the farming community. One concern which I support, that has been mentioned on occasion in this House, is foreign absentee ownership of our farm lands. This is something the government has started to address. I hope it will take a more serious look at it, because I really do feel there could be a problem in the future. I understand the Minister of Revenue (Mr. Ashe) has introduced a bill that addresses one loophole we have in the registration of foreign ownership. I am not too sure if it covers the complete spectrum.

I happen to feel there is an area that could be overlooked. I have made a survey in my riding and there are many thousands of acres of land that have been sold to corporations and nobody can tell me who owns the land. They give us a name but they cannot tell us whether they reside in Ontario or if they are Canadian residents. I find it disturbing to think there is a possibility that our land is being sold to people we cannot trace. If this is the case, then I submit it is time our government took a look at it to make sure we close that loophole as well.

In the speech from the throne it was suggested assistance will be made available to young farmers in this coming budget. I truly hope this is a fact because young farmers cannot get into farming today with the high costs. I hope we do address this major problem in this coming budget.

We talked of transit service and the need for it. There is no greater need in any part of the province than in my riding. We have many elderly people and students who certainly need some type of public transit. There is very little of it provided in Wellington-Dufferin-Peel. I hope the Minister of Transportation and Communications (Mr. Snow) takes a look at this part of the province. I am sure other members share this same concern.

Mr. Haggerty: You have Gray Coach there.

Mr. J. M. Johnson: I would like to mention three or four other points, but I understand there are two or three members, including the member for Oxford (Mr. Treleaven), who would like to speak, so I will not take too long. But I would like to mention one thing that was mentioned in the throne speech, that is equal opportunity for women. I am very concerned about this for a personal reason because I have four granddaughters. I think it is time we took a hard look at this approach.

I understand the federal minister stated that we are up to 47 or 48 per cent in terms of jobs with equal opportunities for women. I am not sure if this is right or not, but if that is true it is totally unacceptable. We have to go much further than that. Because I have four granddaughters and no grandsons, I am very disturbed about this. It is a personal concern. I do think the time is ripe, that we must look at the future and make the changes that are necessary. We cannot do it overnight, and there is an economic cost built into it, but in all fairness we do have that responsibility to see if we cannot address this problem.

My good friend the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Kolyn) reminded me of another issue that I did want to address tonight. It is in relation to the stockyards. I know one of our members has a personal concern in this, and I certainly respect that, but I do think that today the major concern should be for the welfare of the farming community. If Toronto has to live with the stockyards for another three, five or 10 years, then so be it, but for heaven's sake, do not make a change today that is going to be detrimental to the farming community.

I thank you for your patience and indulgence.

Hon. Mr. Gregory: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: I am wondering if we can have a ruling from the chair. The main clock shows about 26 minutes or 27 minutes to go and the digital clock shows 29 minutes. Can we have a ruling from the chair as to which clock we follow?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brandt): I thank the member for the question, which I have looked forward to with great anticipation. We will be following the main, older clock with respect to the time.

M. Shymko: M. le Président, tout d'abord, cela nous indique que ce qui est ancien peut être considéré comme une marque de stabilité; on conteste par contre souvent ce qui est moderne. Il y a donc une certaine stabilité à conserver les traditions.

Je voudrais ce soir donner une ampleur nationale au discours du Tret au commentaire qui en a été fait. J'espère que la réaction de mes collègues députés sera favorable, malgré ce qui s'est passé lors de réunions il y a quelques jours.

Il faut tout d'abord admettre que les problèmes économiques que nous éprouvons sont pour la plupart le résultat d'une situation du monde occidental dans son ensemble, situation dont on ressent l'ampleur et les effets tant au Canada que dans la province de l'Ontario.

Réactions.

M. Shymko: Vous voyez, M. le Président, le respect que l'on a pour la langue française.

M. Gillies: Oui, c'est vrai, c'est vrai.

M. Shymko: C'est la réaction socialiste quand on parle français. J'espère que mes collègues du Parti néo-démocrate vont me permettre de continuer—

M. Gillies: C'est dommage, c'est dommage.

M. Shymko: Je demandais simplement la permission, M. le Président, de continuer en français. Je remercie mon cher ami le député de Cornwall (M. Samis), pour la compréhension dont il fait preuve en matière de bilinguisme officiel.

Je voudrais dire, deuxièmement, que malgré l'influence de l'état économique du monde industriel occidental sur notre société, on doit néanmoins prendre des mesures pour parvenir à une certaine reprise de l'activité économique dans cette province. N'oublions pas qu'en ce qui concerne le che, on a atteint un niveau sans précédent dans notre histoire depuis la guerre. Alors nos priorités visent à éliminer le taux élevé de chômage en Ontario. Et nous considérons comme priorités les initiatives qui vont procurer des emplois à nos travailleurs. On parle, dans le discours du tr de 176 millions de dollars; mais selon une indication du 19 avril, on vient de verser 188,9 millions pour créer environ 14 210 emplois. C'est là un exemple, je le rappelle au député de Cornwall, de l'attitude sérieuse de ce gouvernement quant à l'épanouissement économique.

On doit faire face également au taux de l'inflation. Et nous voyons très bien certains signes d'activité économique assez intensifs qui ont un effet sur l'inflation. L'Ontario doit créer, et commence à le faire, tant dans le secteur privé que dans le secteur public, un climat de confiance. C'est cet esprit de confiance qui compte, comme vous le savez; je le rappelle aux députés, particulièrement à ceux du Parti néo-démocrate. Vous savez que le grand philosophe français Pascal a dit: "Le coeur a ses raisons que la raison ne connaît point." La confiance en soi, la confiance en cette province, la confiance en notre société aura un effet spirituel et psychologique qui nous donnera plus de pouvoir pour sortir de l'état économique pitoyable où nous sommes; cela vaut mieux que d'écouter les discours toujours pessimistes du Parti néo-démocrate pour qui c'est toujours la fin du monde—

M. Gillies: C'est vrai, c'est vrai.

M. Shymko: Et c'est là qu'on détruit la force essentielle nécessaire à l'épanouissement économique.

M. Gillies: Les misérables, les misérables.

M. Shymko: Oui, ce sont des misérables, et je ne sais pas s'ils sont capables de lire la littérature classique française, comme vous savez—

Je ne sais pas ce qu'on trouvera dans le budget de le Trésorier, député de Muskoka, (M. F. S. Miller) mais espérons que ce sont des projets, des objectifs qui vont stimuler considérablement les investissements commerciaux au moins au cours des deux prochaines années. J'espère qu'on trouvera aussi des projets, des objectifs qui vont faire doubler le commerce extérieur, qui permettront d'augmenter la productivité de cette province.

J'espère que dans le secteur des syndicats—

Réactions.

M. Shymko: Oui je vais terminer. J'espère que dans le secteur des syndicats, au lieu de voir toujours la lutte entre le patronat et les syndicats, de voir des conflits perpétuels entre le patron—le boss—et le travailleur, nous allons parvenir à un climat de collaboration entre ces deux parties très importantes. De même, nous essayons de créer un climat de collaboration, et non de conflit, avec le gouvernement fédéral, ce que nous voyons de temps en temps, notamment entre l'Honorable Lloyd Axworthy et le ministre du Travail (M. Ramsay) à propos des 188 millions de dollars. Voilà un exemple de collaboration et de confiance, n'est-ce pas. Mes collègues libéraux seront totalement d'accord.

Je ne vais pas parler du point le plus important pour la francophonie de cette province, à savoir la demande qui a été faite pour garantir l'instruction en français à 93 706 élèves de l'Ontario. Je suis certain que le premier à le reconnaître sera le député d'Ottawa-Est (M. Roy). Voilà le courage de cette administration; voilà le vrai gouvernement conservateur, sensible aux besoins des francophones, qui comprend—

Réactions.

M. Shymko: —qui comprend ce qui se passe dans la province du Québec pour ce qui est des droits qu'on donne à la minorité nationale. Espérons que Monsieur René Lévesque fera la même chose. Mais ici en Ontario, nous donnerons aux autres provinces l'exemple à suivre.

Réactions.

M. Shymko: Voilà. Je voudrais terminer sur une note d'optimisme. Si vous regardez dans les deux tomes de L'économie de l'Ontario que je vous montre, vous trouverez à la page 8 ceci: Au cours de la période de 1981 à 1985, le produit national brut enregistrera une augmentation réelle de 1,9 pour cent, et entre 1986 et 1990, une augmentation de 3,3 pour cent.

10:10 p.m.

So we see an optimistic projection, an increase in the real gross national product growth, from 1985 to 1986, of 1.9 to 3.3 per cent. Inflation, which currently is approximately 12 per cent, 10.1 per cent on average between 1981 and 1985, will decrease to 9.1 per cent in 1986 and to 8.9 per cent in 1991. That is an optimistic projection. The unemployment rate will decrease from 10.3 per cent now to nine per cent. Here is the result of the calculations of those who have the ability and the expertise to project an optimistic note, of which the members of the New Democratic Party should be, and are, reminded every day.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to comment briefly in French,—dans la langue officielle de ce pays et de l'esprit du jour de cette province.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to have this opportunity to speak in the throne speech debate, although I have to admit that these clocks make me feel rather bilious. At one time, I was even informed that the socialists here objected to the fact that there was a red light on the top of this building when the House was sitting and demanded that it be taken away because they thought it reflected Liberalism, but when I look at that those green lights on the clocks, I must say I always thought green was the colour for the socialists. That is another reason we should remove these clocks: they keep reminding us of the socialist hordes that are waiting out there.

I want to speak this evening about the future of this province and about the future of the great region that I represent, the Sudbury region. It is a region of approximately 167,000 people, a region that has very industrious people, a region that is very proud of what it has accomplished and a region that does have a great future.

I would like to talk briefly about that future this evening, because we have seen a lot of negative remarks about the Sudbury area in the press here in this city. We also hear negative remarks, and we have heard them for about at least the past 12 years, from the members who sit across in the section that is identified as being green on my seating plan; perhaps they will remain nameless for now.

Nevertheless, I must say there have been a number of steps taken within the Sudbury region. The footings are being laid at present for the future of our city, of my riding and of northern Ontario. Speaking of those footings, I first of all have to point out that in the throne speech that preceded this one there were comments about a mining machinery advisory board that was to be established within my riding. After a great deal of consultation with the ministers involved and with the Board of Industrial Leadership and Development, that was expanded to become one of our six technology centres in this province.

I might also remind those on the other side that this technology centre now has a budget of approximately $20.3 million, which will be spent over the next four and a half years to develop the capabilities for research which will help the mining and forestry people and the machinery and equipment people to find export markets as well as markets within the North American continent.

I might add that another avenue this technology centre is going to follow is that of becoming involved in joint ventures with the private sector. There are already a number of promising developments that have come before the board of the Ontario Centre for Resource Machinery.

Besides the Ontario Centre for Resource Machinery in my riding in the city of Sudbury, approximately 10 days ago the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. Pope) and I also announced a waferboard plant for the Sudbury region. This will mean employment in the Sudbury region for over 425 workers. That means we are diversifying within the region. It is an industry we have never had before and it is going to mean my people are going to have jobs.

I might also add there is another interesting development within the Sudbury area and we are expecting an announcement within the near future. I might just announce it tonight if the federal Liberals can get their act together. At the present moment the Minister of Mines, Judy Erola, is still trying to decide whether she can find some money out of Lalonde's budget for MECO. For those members who are not aware,

MECO is the Mining Equipment Co. of Ontario, a mining machinery company that has been formed by John Clark and Inco.

It is our belief that over a period of years we should see anywhere between 100 and 200 workers involved in the mining machinery business within the Sudbury region. Our government will be contributing towards that plant. We are still waiting for the federal Liberals to decide whether or not they are going to participate. I would suggest they will since they will have an election coming up soon and they are going to have to try to do something.

When I look down at the row in front, I can see the member for Burlington South (Mr. Kerr) who was formerly the Minister of Environment in this province and he was a very great minister. As a matter of fact, I can remember meeting him one time. Members on the other side will be interested in this. I remember meeting him at a luncheon that was given by Inco out at their guest retreat at Copper Cliff. What brings it back is when I look across and see the socialists on the other side, I remember how for years and years they used to lambaste Inco. They talked about what an awful company it was and how they had to get Inco and take away its profits and force it to clean up its act, to clean up the pollution problem and so forth. They kept drumming this into the people of Sudbury time and again, over and over again; that it was the company and they were rich and something had to be done about it.

In this Legislature just a few days ago, we heard the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) say, "The Ontario government should do it now. Make the rich pay." Those people they are always talking about are the taxpayers of Ontario. "Make the rich pay."

The problem is, those fellows over there have been hoisted with their own petard in the Sudbury region. As a result of that, their credibility has gone down the tubes. I am shocked that the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) is not here to hear me this evening. I just cannot believe it. I would have thought that—

Mr. Nixon: He heard you were on the speaker's list.

Mr. Gordon: I am sure he is coming. I am sure he is on his way back up the stairs. Would someone go and get him.?

Mr. Philip: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: The member happens to be in the resources committee at the present time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cousens): That is not a point of order. There are seven minutes left in this debate. Do not believe the green clocks.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped you would have had that closet Conservative here to hear me speak, since I think it is something very important to him.

Nevertheless, I think it is time I turned over this particular speaking spot in the Legislature to another great speaker. The member for Oxford (Mr. Treleaven) is going to carry on. I turn it over to him.

Mr. Treleaven: Mr. Speaker, it is correct to say this is another great speaker in the line of back-bench Tory speakers this evening.

Mr. Charlton: Yes. None of you can last for more than five minutes.

The Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Treleaven: The honourable whip asked me to clean up and really with five minutes left, it does make one feel like the man who follows—

Mr. Charlton: Good speech. Time.

Mr. Treleaven: Yes, thank you. It makes one feel like the man who follows the horses and elephants at the end of the parade to clean up after such an illustrious group.

Mr. Shymko: You know where the horses sit.

Mr. Treleaven: Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I would generally like to give congratulations in this speech tonight. First I would like to thank the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay), the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) and all others who are responsible for the Canada-Ontario employment development program.

We have heard the members of the third party speak negatively of the COED program. I want to mention that the good burghers in the riding of Oxford have received over $2 million and over 200 jobs, which amount to about 100 job-years, from the COED program. More is coming in all the time. I might say this also includes that small portion of Oxford that I do not represent, but I am sort of looking after the statistics for the small portion that the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk (Mr. Nixon) represents.

I also congratulate the Minister of Transportation and Communications (Mr. Snow). This morning on my way—was it this morning?

Interjections.

Mr. Treleaven: It must have been yesterday. One day seems like another in the Legislature. They are all filled with joy.

On the way to this place from Oxford I stopped in at various points on Highway 403, mainly in the riding of my friend the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk. I must congratulate the minister on having four clearing crews working in four different spots, two in Oxford and two in Brant, two brushing crews. I might mention to the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk that brushing crews do not paint; they clear brush. I thought I would clarify that for my friend.

Might I also ask my friend the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk if he could have a meeting with the member for Wentworth North (Mr. Cunningham)? The Minister of Transportation and Communications is waiting for those two Liberal members to get together to recommend to him—I know the member knows what is coming—an increase in the speed limit along Highway 2 between Brantford and Hamilton.

Mr. Gillies: They won't do it, because Eric Cunningham doesn't want it.

Mr. Treleaven: That's correct. The Liberal caucus should get together on the topic.

In two-and-a-half minutes I have very little to touch on. I would like to touch on the primary concern of the county of Oxford, again including that small portion of Oxford that my friend represents.

Mr. Nixon: The richest part of the county.

Mr. Treleaven: Yes, it is Blandford-Blenheim township, which does not have any adequate garbage facilities of its own.

I would like to touch on the subject of landfill sites in Oxford. Oxford has been blessed with the longest landfill site hearing in Canadian history, 59 days. The county of Oxford has spent $1.6 million to this date, and two townships have spent about $200,000 each, a total of $2 million. They started their search in 1973. The county bought the site at Salford in 1975, 300-odd acres. In 1982 there were hearings, and now we have an appeal before the cabinet as to whether or not the hearing of the joint board will stand.

The member for Essex North (Mr. Ruston) referred to landfill sites in his speech yesterday. I suggest that we need two things in this province. One is public education. For too long in this province we have been used to dealing with garbage as something for which we find the nearest hole, dump it in, cover it up and that is it. Spend $7 a person per year and garbage looks after itself; we must now educate the public to expect to pay $50 a person per year to look after their garbage. They will do so with their road budget but they will not consider garbage as a primary concern.

Second, we must amend the environmental acts so we may have speedy legislation, with democracy taking its place and having all the protections the people wish, but we must have speedy disposition which precludes lengthy references to the courts.

In clearing up, I would like simply to say that, with the Premier's (Mr. Davis) thoughts of running federally, I hope the Premier runs so he can bring to all of Canada the enlightenment he has brought to this House, and do all of Canada that favour. However, if he stays with us, he will continue with the enlightened leadership we have seen for 12 years.

On motion by Mr. McClellan, the debate was adjourned.

EDUCATION FOR MENTALLY HANDICAPPED

The Acting Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 28, the question that this House do now adjourn is deemed to have been made. The member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) has given notice of dissatisfaction with the answer to a question given by the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea). The member has up to five minutes to debate the matter and the minister may reply for up to five minutes.

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised the minister is not here.

Let me tell members the problem which prompted this late night debate. In the Sudbury area, there are a number of young, mentally retarded people in the school system who have speech problems. These children require speech pathology services. They require an assessment be done in the first instance and that a program, as a result of that assessment, be put in place in the school system.

In Sudbury, the Sudbury Algoma Sanitorium has refused to do any assessments or programs for school-aged children because of lack of funding. It has said it is the responsibility of the school system to provide that service.

The school system, on the other hand, says: "We recognize the fact there are mentally retarded children in our system who require assessment and who require programs and follow-up on those programs, but we do not have the funds. It is up to the Ministry of Community and Social Services or the Ministry of Health to provide that service."

The Ministry of Community and Social Services and the Ministry of Health say that under Bill 82 it is the responsibility of the school boards to provide that service.

That is the situation as it now stands in the Sudbury area. Even for preschool children, at the Sudbury Algoma Sanitorium there is a one-year waiting list. If the child happens to be of school age, the only place there is a service available is in the English section of the separate school board system. A child in the French section of the separate school board or the entire public school system does not have the services required.

Let me tell the members how ridiculous the situation is. There were a number of students in the area I represent who could not get an assessment and could not get a program. An advocacy agency went to service clubs in the area and obtained funding to get an assessment done and a program for those children.

We have reached the point in this province where this government is allowing charity to replace what should be a service provided to all children in the school system in Ontario. That is not the kind of system we think is appropriate for Ontario.

The school boards say, "We cannot do anything about it because we are not getting the funding from the Ministry of Education." Right in the middle, guess who is caught in the squeeze? It is the children. At the same time the Minister of Community and Social Services is stating he wants to put children from institutions back into the community, he is doing something that is going to guarantee that more of these children will require institutional care in the future. If young people do not get the kind of program they require, namely speech pathology in this case, then those children, some of whom are completely noncommunicative, will end up being required to go into institutions in the years to come, those same institutions the minister is closing across the province.

Surely that is not the kind of system we want in Ontario. When the Minister of Community and Social Services stands up—and I hear him bluster when I put that question to him, "I am greatly offended"—what he says is: "It works everywhere else in Ontario. If it does not work in Sudbury, it is not my problem."

I am really surprised. The Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch) was in her seat not five minutes ago and chose to leave. This is also indicative of her interest in this whole matter. Here we have a classic case where the provincial secretary, given the umbrella role she is supposed to play, could pull into her office the boards of education, the Ministry of Health and the Community and Social Services people and say, "You people work out this problem;" because what is being done is simply not adequate, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: I thank the honourable member. The five minutes have elapsed.

The House adjourned at 10:37 p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Thursday, May 5, 1983

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the opposition, may I say "Welcome back" to the Premier (Mr. Davis). But I think you should send forth a little expedition to find out why brothers Grossman, Walker and Timbrell are not here applauding the return to the House of the Premier today.

Mr. T. P. Reid: They jumped out of the Macdonald Block last night.

Mr. Peterson: They may be in the cell down in the basement.

Mr. T. P. Reid: The sound of screaming could be heard for miles—all the way from Switzerland.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Ashe: That's the Liberal tie the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Peterson) is wearing; it has every colour of the rainbow.

Mr. Peterson: I am going to ask the Premier a question, and he can talk about my tie on that occasion if he would like to do so; it is as relevant as anything.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I didn't say anything about your tie at all, except that you need sunglasses.

ORAL QUESTIONS

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, the Premier is no doubt aware that we had some 233,000 unemployed young people aged 15 to 24 in this province last month, constituting an unemployment rate of about 22.2 per cent; and for males that is almost one in four who is unemployed. The Premier will realize, I am sure, that while the young people make up only 19 per cent of the population, they currently account for 41 per cent of the unemployment of Ontario.

With these high levels of youth unemployment, I am asking the Premier why his government is not responding. He is aware, of course, that the last budget's supplementary allocation of some $7 million to the Ontario youth employment program was underspent by some $6.3 million; so even the money that has been allocated is not being spent. It is creating, in this year's terms, some 11,000 fewer jobs than in 1981 or 1982, and 13,000 fewer jobs than in 1980-81. So the government response, given the magnitude of the problem, has been very dismal.

When is the Premier going to direct his government and his Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) to direct resources into this most critical problem?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the government is aware of the concern expressed by the Leader of the Opposition. This has been addressed by the government in the past and will continue to be so. I suggest that he wait until roughly four o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, is the Premier aware that about 160,000 Ontarians will turn 19 years of age in 1983 and that, of this group, about 95,000 will either drop out of school or get no further apprenticeship or gain other skills? What does he intend to do about the fact that about 78,000 people will enter the work force with neither a university degree, a college diploma, completed apprenticeship nor certification?

Can the Premier indicate now exactly which direction we are heading in to provide these people, who otherwise are going to be permanently unemployed, with some hope for the future?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am far more optimistic and have far more confidence in the future of this province than perhaps has the honourable member. If he looks back historically, that confidence and optimism is based on substantial fact. I think it is fair to state that, compared with almost any other jurisdiction with the same growth in that age group, unlike West Germany, the United Kingdom, etc., our record in this province really is unequalled by those of comparable jurisdictions.

I suggest to the honourable member that if he too, along with his leader, waits until approximately four o'clock on Tuesday, I anticipate that the Treasurer will have some observations to make.

Mr. Cooke: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in Mr. Lalonde's budget he is projecting unemployment is going to be running at 12 per cent this year, 11 per cent next year and 10 per cent after that, and obviously that means youth unemployment is going to continue at around 20 per cent, is the Premier prepared to assure us that in next week's budget there will be major job creation programs addressed to the young people of this province so that we do not continue to have more and more young people unemployed, a generation of young people who will never experience the value and dignity of work in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I say to the honourable member, who is once again on a bit of a fantasy flight, that no generation is going to be without employment. I do not agree with Mr. Lalonde's projections. They may be relatively accurate; I do not know. All I can say is that former federal budgets have not always been totally accurate.

It is fair to state that once again, as I said to the member for Rainy River, if one looks back at the historical record of this province and compares it with that of any other industrialized community in North America, one will find that not only have we been able to assimilate people within the work force in competitive numbers—in fact, better than in most jurisdictions—but also that once again will be the future of this province.

I suggest that for the member to hint there will be a whole generation of young people without employment is just totally inaccurate but consistent with his point of view on many other issues, which once again has been totally inaccurate since he has been a member of the House.

Mr. Mancini: Mr. Speaker, in 1980-81 this government spent $58.80 per person on programs for unemployed youth. In 1981-82 this fell to $53.94. Last year, real funding levels were cut even further to $45.28. Given the announced funding cutbacks and the current employment trends, the ratio probably will fall to about $36 for the 1983-84 fiscal year.

Will the Premier ask the Treasurer to accept the suggestion I gave to him yesterday in an open letter and use moneys from the unnecessary government advertising in the Ontario youth employment program so the youth of this province will have an opportunity to find work this summer, fall and winter?

2:10 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I actually read the open letter from the honourable member. I really understand his creative approach, but I find it a shade unfortunate that he is attempting in a statistical way to evaluate either government programs or the successful nature of our employment programs for youth based on a percentage of the dollar.

With respect, if the member looks at the total commitment last year—I think it was in the neighbourhood of $21 million—he will find that it provided a large number of jobs for young people in this province. He will find on Tuesday that the Treasurer will demonstrate not only a sensitivity but also a realistic logical approach to this matter, as he has done in the past.

FUNDING FOR EDUCATION

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Premier. He will recall, when he left the Education portfolio a decade or so ago, that the education share of the budget was some 23 per cent. Even acknowledging that there have been declining enrolments, it now constitutes some 14.6 per cent of the provincial budget.

The Premier will be aware that the entire thrust of the new directions in education, such as the reports of the secondary education review project, OSIS, or Ontario Schools Intermediate and Senior divisions, and a variety of other new proposals that presumably will be statutorily enshrined and will oblige the school boards to do a variety of things, are going to cost a great deal of money.

He is also aware that the financial effects of Bill 82 are putting real pressure on the school boards and that, for example, the 3,000 or 4,000 new French classes we will require are going to cost a great deal of money.

How can the Premier reconcile these two divergent approaches? On the one hand he is cutting back funding in real terms, and on the other hand he is demanding more of the school boards. How is the Premier going to explain to the boards how they are going to fund these new programs?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am always intrigued by the approach of the Leader of the Opposition, who will take up an issue if he senses there is some political mileage inherent therein. At the same time, I will predict with total accuracy that when he gets on the news as he rushes out of here on Tuesday at six o'clock, he will say the government should be spending less and should have a lower deficit at the same time as he comes in here and tells us that in program after program we should be spending more. I will give 11-to-two odds that is exactly what he will do. He has done it every year he has been here.

Mr. Bradley: We'll settle for an answer; never mind the 11 to two.

Mr. Peterson: Is there anything the Premier would like to say about my tie while he is up on his feet? I will tell him what I am going to say. I am going to tell him to sell Suncor and cut the outrageous expenditure on his advertising. He should spend money appropriately for a change. Why is he cheating kids when he has money to spend constantly on his own aggrandizement over there?

The Deputy Speaker: The question being?

Mr. Peterson: It is his priorities that are screwed up over there, that is the Premier's problem, and I will say the same then as I am saying now. Now, does he want to answer the question?

He is aware, now the figures will come out, that the provincial share of education now has fallen below 50 per cent from 60 per cent or so some five or seven years ago. The incredible pressures the government is putting on the school boards, and thereby the municipal taxpayers, is creating a crisis in funding in the educational system. What is the Premier's approach to that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member may find, if he analyses it very carefully, that there is the odd school board in Ontario with a budgetary surplus. I know that will come as a great shock to him and will be contrary to what he is suggesting. He may find that. He should get his researchers to use that public money he talks about to analyse it just a shade more closely. The member for Quinte (Mr. O'Neil) is smiling, because he happens to know I am telling the truth.

Mr. Sweeney: He is smiling in disbelief.

Mr. O'Neil: I will not even comment on that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I certainly was right in the first instance. He was smiling. He cannot deny that.

Mr. Sweeney: In absolute disbelief.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I say to the member for Kitchener-Wilmot (Mr. Sweeney)—

Mr. Bradley: Call him to order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member should tell his colleague to be quiet; and he might do the same himself.

The Deputy Speaker: Yes, there is something to that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was saying to the Leader of the Opposition that if he looks historically at the level of—

Mr. Mancini: We can see now why you didn't go.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I just say to the member for Essex South (Mr. Mancini) that without a leader we are doing substantially better than his national party. And with his present leader, we are doing an awful lot better in this province than they are. I may even tell him a bit more about that later this afternoon.

Historically we have been over 50 per cent in some years, no question. This year it will probably emerge at 49 plus some per cent of the cost. I say to the member from St. Catharines (Mr. Bradley), who likes to interject, if he also includes in that figure the amount—which is a legitimate educational expense—that goes into the contribution by Ontario to the very valid area of teacher superannuation, with which he will be very familiar, and the amount of money that is allocated in terms of property tax credits for the educational levy that relates to the school board expenditure, he will find that on average we are well above 50 per cent.

I also say to the member that while the school boards of this province do have additional responsibilities, I think it is fair to state that if he calculates the expenditure per student related to many competing jurisdictions in terms of salaries for our elementary and secondary school teachers—and I say to him to please go back to what he said about them as a professional group not too long ago—it will be sensed that in terms of priority, or as a sense of total public expenditure, the elementary and secondary school systems are being well served.

There is no question there are some pressures; however, we are all dealing with pressures in terms of public expenditure, and I think the contribution of the province to the school system this year will enable it to provide a high level of educational service; a level that, with great respect, is not equalled anywhere else in this country.

Mr. Allen: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, that is not the message we are getting from teachers and those who are closest to students. In 1943 Premier Drew promised to maintain provincial funding at 50 per cent. It took 27 years for this province to achieve that and now it is backing away from it. The Premier assures us that given the new initiatives his government paints with a beautiful red brush, Bill 82—

Mr. Sheppard: Blue.

Mr. Allen: I'm sorry; it is blue, blue is the order of the day today.

Mr. T. P. Reid: The ones who are not here are wearing black.

Mr. Allen: In any case, regardless of colour, there are two new major initiatives out there, Bill 82 and the Renewal of Secondary Education report. We know that will cost a lot more money if either of those projects is going to be done decently.

Will the Premier assure us that the money will be in place to ensure adequate funding to put special education into the classrooms and to satisfactorily reorder the secondary curriculum, so it will be meaningful and not simply a hollow sham?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I could not hear for the interjections from some members of the honourable member's own party. He referred to—

Mr. Martel: We were talking about the coronation that didn't happen.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, no; I could not hear the member for some of the things some of his colleagues were saying. I understand—

Mr. Swart: If you listened you would do a lot better.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh no; the member from Welland (Mr. Swart) has only to whisper and we are inundated.

Can I say to the honourable member that I heard him refer to the one report. What was the second report?

Mr. Wildman: The ROSE report.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member means the secondary education review project report.

Can I suggest, with respect, that whatever reorganization may take place within the secondary school system, I do not think it is inherent in any reorganization or alteration that it necessarily requires substantial increases in the amount of funding. In my own mind, I do not think I have ever been able necessarily to equate quality in education with the amount of money that is allocated. I think that is a bit of mythology which the member should take a careful look at.

2:20 p.m.

I assure the member that we are committed to special education. I have made that statement a dozen times in the past 21 or so years in this Legislature. But I also suggest to the teachers who come to the member with their concerns, and I appreciate they are genuine, that in terms of the amount of funding, the priority that has been given and the traditional approach to education in this province, our teachers and our students are being well served. I say that without fear of contradiction.

I give the member an opportunity to show me statistically how they are being better served in any other part of Canada or, quite frankly, in any part of the United States. Even in California they do not do as well.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, I think the Premier recognizes that all members of the House are pleased we have Bill 82 and commend the efforts of his government in that regard, as well as for the initiatives in terms of French-language education.

Will the Premier give a commitment to the House that money will not be taken from other essential areas of education to pay for the implementation of Bill 82 and other initiatives that flow from OSIS?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, as far as the general legislative grants are concerned we certainly will not be taking money from other important or, as the honourable member phrases it, essential areas of education. But there is not just a responsibility upon government but also, and I say this with respect, a modest responsibility upon the local school boards, which have democratically elected individuals and competent and relatively well-paid professionals at the head of their systems, to organize their priorities to see what efficiencies they can create within the school system.

While I suggest they have done a certain measure of this, and I do not quarrel with it, I think there are still some areas where greater creativity can be shown, such as in the area of administration, perhaps in the numbers of people involved, so the dollars—which are scarce, and no one is going to argue with that—can be appropriately spent. That includes special education.

EXTENDICARE LTD.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman), I would like to address a question to the Premier.

Can he explain why the Ministry of Health approved a contract between Queensway General Hospital and Extendicare Ltd.? That contract gives ownership of a chronic care unit of 120 beds to a private, profit firm called Extendicare, in exchange for which the provincial government and the taxpayers of this province will be providing that private, profit institution with capital funding of $2.2 million, operating revenues well in excess of $400,000 a month and private and semi-private fees, as well as user fees, at a rate, for private and semi-private fees, that has been described by an official of the Ministry of Health as whatever the traffic will bear.

How can the Premier possibly justify that kind of approval and that kind of a project when it simply means the taxpayers of this province are handing over large chunks of money to private, profit medicine in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I guess there is a philosophical difference between this party and that of the leader of the New Democratic Party. Profit over here is not an ugly word. I know it is with him. I understand that. I do not agree with it.

If he will trace the history of the involvement with Queensway, he will find it was initiated by the board of Queensway General Hospital, a group of people who represent that community. They are a group of people who have had some success, in my view, in administering that hospital. They came to the government with this proposal. It is not a new principle and it is not unique. We have seen many hospitals contracting out requirements for laundry services and things of that nature.

There is no question that, in terms of the assessment of the Queensway General Hospital board and in terms of the economics, this is an excellent way to go. I know it offends the honourable member philosophically but if the level of care is there, and we agree it will be, if economically it is as efficient as other ways of funding extended care or chronic care facilities, why should the leader of the third party be reluctant to see whether this pilot project will create greater efficiencies within the health care system? What is so offensive to him?

Mr. Rae: What is offensive is that we are squandering taxpayers' dollars and handing them over to private, profit individuals. The Premier says there is a philosophical difference between our two parties. He is quite right. He and his party believe health care is a commodity that should be sold to the highest bidder, and we in our party find this view offensive to the notion that health care is a right for every citizen.

In that regard, since the Premier brought up the question of contracting out and the activities of the Ministry of Health, does he really think it is appropriate that the Ministry of Health should be contracting out the ownership and operation of large-scale operations to private companies whose senior executives, in the case of Extendicare and AMI (Canada) Ltd., are former senior officials of the Ministry of Health itself? Does he not think this kind of relationship and this kind of contracting out is totally inappropriate in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I must confess to the member that I am not familiar with the senior executives of Extendicare at all. I do not even know who they are. But I think, if memory serves me correctly, he may find that the same sort of operation—maybe even the same company—was doing some of the same kind of service work in Saskatchewan under the leadership of his former friend and colleague Premier Blakeney.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, when the Premier says the discussion with Extendicare was entirely—

Mr. Hennessy: Louder, louder.

Ms. Copps: Does my friend want it louder? I will give it to him louder.

When the Premier says the discussion was a discussion between the board at Queensway hospital and Extendicare, can he explain to me why I spoke with a member of the institutional planning division of the Ministry of Health last year and was told that the discussions with Queensway were under way, and when we called the administrator of Queensway to get information about the project, he stated: "Don't ask me; ask Larry Grossman. I have been working on this deal for eight months and I am not about to blow it now"?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I haven't the foggiest idea.

Mr. Rae: Truer words have never been spoken by the Premier.

Since I gather from the Premier's earlier answer that not only does he not find these contracts and this trend in the province offensive but also it is a trend he favours, I wonder whether he can comment on a remark that was made by the vice-president of AMI, who said: "We have done our homework. We are anxious to move forward just as other situations arise. We think we have a big future in Ontario. We are focusing on Ontario for our achievement list." Similar statements were made by Extendicare in its annual report for 1982 in the sense that it sees this as the beginning of a trend in Ontario.

Can the Premier give us an assurance today that no more hospitals and no more chronic care units will be turned over to private, profit medicine for use of a private and semi-private user fee system in Ontario? Can he also give us an assurance that this tendency to demolish accessibility and universality in Ontario with respect to health care finally will be brought to an end?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I say to the member, don't get so excited, eh? The first part of his question he already asked last week to somebody. I can recall that—

Mr. Martel: He didn't get an answer.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Listen, he used exactly the same quotation.

Mr. Rae: I didn't get an answer.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I just thought I would remind him that I heard the same question last week to one of the ministers, and a very excellent answer.

I cannot speak with the same knowledge about the arrangement at Hawkesbury hospital. They did not speak to me. I am familiar, not with the details but with what the Queensway hospital board is developing. They came to see me. I directed them to the Ministry of Health. I think the ministry has already said this is not a trend; it is a project the government has supported. We want to see how effective it is, how efficient it is, the standard of care. We are relatively confident that the assessment the Queensway hospital board has made in its desire to initiate this project will turn out to be correct.

The member's suggestion that we are turning over the entire hospital system in this province to private entrepreneurs is totally erroneous. Do not get carried away. Do not exaggerate the problem. Leave room for a little creativity. Leave room for a little entrepreneurship that may be more efficient and may even provide a better level of health care. Do not get so excited about it.

2:30 p.m.

Mr. Rae: The so-called nursing home industry in this province is a monument to the Tory government's commitment to private, profit medicine in Ontario and the Premier knows it.

DEATH OF GARY GUILBEAULT

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. It concerns the tragic death of a young man named Gary Guilbeault, who was only 24 years old, in an accident on April 26 in the Stanleigh mine at Elliot Lake. I am sure the minister knows about this accident.

There was a very strong feeling on the part of the union health and safety committee that this was an accident that could have been avoided. Mr. Guilbeault was hit by a ventilation door that came down on him as he was driving a scoop tram through. Thirty general ventilation orders with respect to the ventilation system were issued last year and four have been issued so far this year, on February 7 and 28, March 10 and April 22.

Can the minister give the House the categorical assurance that none of the orders involved could have affected the safety of this individual? Can he explain why so many orders have been issued over the past while? As the minister knows, 1,700 orders were issued against Rio Algom and Denison Mines last year. Can the minister tell us why that number of orders has been required? Can he give us the assurance that nothing could have been done to avoid the tragic death of Gary Guilbeault at Elliot Lake?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the third party raises an excellent point. It is one I looked into on a personal basis as soon as I learned about this tragic accident.

It is my understanding that Mr. Guilbeault was driving in second gear when company policy requires driving in first gear. Apparently he did not stop to activate the switch but pulled the switch on the run.

We are trying to investigate this completely and also to look at the training and supervision aspects of the operation. I am expecting a complete report on that in the very near future.

Mr. Rae: I would like to tell the minister that the union has yet to receive the accident investigation report from the Ministry of Labour. They would appreciate receiving a copy of it.

Our information from both witness and company reports is that the alternator belt on the scoop tram was broken, the headlights were not working properly and, perhaps most important, Mr. Guilbeault was not licensed to run a 320 scoop tram. The fact that he was not licensed had not been checked by his supervisor. That is the information we have. Could the minister report back to the House with respect to that?

If the ministry had policies with respect to refusal on a group basis when a union feels an operation is unsafe, such as were recommended by my colleague the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) in his ground-breaking report entitled, Not Yet Healthy, Not Yet Safe, does the minister not feel that kind of measure would have given the union the ability to protect the life of Gary Guilbeault when it felt it needed that right?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: In response to the first part of the member's question, I believe when I answered originally I stated we were looking at two aspects of the company operation: first, whether or not he was properly trained; and second, whether or not he was properly supervised. We are looking at the very points the member has raised and I indicated that right at the beginning.

As far as the suggestion the honourable member is putting forward, it is something we will simply have to take a look at.

Mr. Wildman: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister looks at it very seriously, because if the recommendation of my colleague from Sudbury East had been implemented, perhaps Gary Guilbeault would still be alive today.

Is the minister aware the Atomic Energy Control Board has recognized the danger of the ventilation doors but has refused to deal with that in its regulations, arguing it is a matter of conventional health and safety and is therefore up to the provincial authorities? This again raises the federal-provincial jurisdictional dispute that has bedeviled regulation of health and safety for uranium miners for far too long.

Is he now prepared to accede to the requests made by the union and order the installation of audio and visual warning devices on these doors? If he is not because of the jurisdictional dispute, is he prepared to get out of the field of health and safety for uranium mines altogether?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member brings up a good point. We have been holding ongoing negotiations with the federal government, with the mining industry and with the unions as to whether we should get out and turn those responsibilities over to the federal government.

We have found great reluctance on the part of the industry for us to do that. We have found some reluctance on the part of the unions for us to do that. Yet the federal government is telling us it feels it should be taking over those responsibilities. We are attempting to come to grips with that.

Mr. Martel: Four years.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I agree it has been far too long. I do not disagree whatsoever and I wish I could bring it to a satisfactory resolution. In the meantime, while we are trying to make the necessary arrangements with the federal government, I will not apologize for the calibre of the inspectors or the calibre of the inspections being done by the personnel of the mine safety branch of the Ministry of Labour.

EXTRA BILLING

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond further to a question raised with me on Monday by the member for Bellwoods (Mr. McClellan) concerning the continued treatment of Debbie Sutherland.

As I promised, I discussed this matter with the Deputy Minister of Health and with the acting minister, the member for Eglinton (Mr. McMurtry). We are pleased that since her birth Debbie has been able and will continue to be able to receive this unique treatment within the Ontario health care system. However, we do not believe patients or their parents should be faced with the unbearable debt to pay for necessary medical treatment in the public hospitals of Ontario.

I have asked the deputy minister to contact the Ontario Medical Association and ask it to review this entire matter in the light of the repeated assurances of the medical profession that opting out does not restrict access to medicare or place undue financial burdens on those with limited income.

Regarding the unpaid portion of the medical bills, the Ontario health insurance plan schedule of benefits has a provision under independent consideration. This provides flexibility when considering situations such as this, under which the experts in the medical field, as well as the Ministry of Health, can determine whether unique situations such as Debbie Sutherland's would warrant special consideration for funding.

I will review this further with the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman) when he returns and ask him to report to the House.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the minister correctly, and I hope I am not putting too uncharitable a cast on it, the Ministry of Health will be going cap in hand to the Ontario Medical Association on behalf of the Sutherland family and, in effect, begging for charity.

I would like to ask the provincial secretary if she is aware that the stupendous volume of opted-out claims in this province—which now amounts to three million claims a year, 8,219 opted-out claims each and every day of the year—means there are many cases of severe financial hardship, the majority of which are specialist opted-out claims? It is totally preposterous for her government to be in the position of trying to deal with these on a case-by-case basis. Even if it is able to solve the Sutherland case, and it has not yet solved it, it cannot possibly solve all the cases of hardship created by this level of opting out.

2:40 p.m.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is?

Mr. McClellan: When are they going to put an end to opting out and extra billing?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: I would suggest the member address that question to the Minister of Health when he returns. At this time, there is no indication the government will be issuing any such kind of regulation.

Ms. Capps: Mr. Speaker, will the provincial secretary make a commitment to table in the Legislature the response of the Ontario Medical Association to the question?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Mr. Speaker, I will leave that consideration to the Minister of Health.

SALFORD LANDFILL SITE

Mr. Elston: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. As he will recall, on December 22, 1982, the joint board under the Consolidated Hearings Act made a decision on the Salford landfill question. Has the minister now come to a decision as to whether he supports that decision of the joint board?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the member knows, there is an appeal which is currently before cabinet on that decision or flowing from that decision. As is routinely the case, an appeal has been circulated I believe to all parties and they have had an opportunity to respond. Among those, of course, would be my ministry, but any response that has been submitted would be a part of a cabinet submission and I would not be free to divulge the specific contents of any such submission to cabinet.

The matter will be dealt with by cabinet in due course and the decision will be made known to the member and others then.

Mr. Elston: The minister will realize the hearing that was held under the Consolidated Hearings Act went on for quite some time. There is a great deal of expense on the part of the interveners. There is a great deal of expense on the part of the proponents who, as I understand it, were under the care and guidance of the ministry. As a result of that, a great deal of technical information was passed in front of the board.

As a result of the technical nature of that hearing, that whole process, does the minister not feel it is probably not appropriate that the cabinet intervene to press its decision on top of a decision that was made by a fully qualified board under legislation which was sponsored in the past by this government?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Obviously when cabinet considers an appeal from any tribunal from which an appeal to cabinet flows, it considers very seriously and very carefully all aspects of the matter before it. This matter would be no different.

WELFARE PAYMENTS

Mr. R. F. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Treasurer. The Treasurer will be well aware that the high welfare levels have caused great hardship for municipalities around Ontario because of the burden on the property tax. I presume he is also aware that the Association of Municipalities of Ontario has a group that is now studying some alternatives to this particular format we have at the moment for dealing with welfare payments.

Will the minister in his budget, or around the time of his budget, be making a statement which will indicate a percentage reduction in the amount of money that would be coming from the property tax base? Or will he be announcing a number of direct grants to a select group of municipalities which he decides have been sufficiently hard hit to warrant some bailing out but not without touching the basic structural inequity at all?

The Deputy Speaker: Before the response, there seem to be an awful lot of private conversations taking place in the assembly. I am wondering if all members would co-operate, so we might hear the, I am sure, eloquent answer from the Treasurer.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Absolutely eloquent.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, the two ministers most commonly involved with the problem—the ministers of Community and Social Services (Mr. Drea) and Municipal Affairs and Housing (Mr. Bennett)—have also been monitoring the situation. Obviously I cannot make any commitment as to what is or is not in my budget; obviously, however, there has been concern. I believe the member will find answers from a number of ministers from way back on this issue saying there would or could be assistance programs for municipalities which are having a problem raising the money.

On average, the load has not significantly increased the mill rate, but on average it does not allow for the specific communities with real difficulties. I have to depend upon advice from them, as the member can understand, before determining which communities are involved or what assistance programs might be beneficial.

Mr. Wildman: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not aware that the reason the mill rate has not been affected in many communities such as Sault Ste. Marie, which is facing a 45 per cent increase in its welfare costs this year as more and more exhaustees come off unemployment insurance benefits, is that those municipalities such as the Sault have cut back on their other services, especially the roads budgets and other projects they would normally be spending on this year, and that means extra costs in the near future?

Can he confirm that the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing will be making an announcement of ad hoc grants to some of these municipalities in the near future? If that is true, what are the criteria that will determine which municipalities will get special assistance and which will not?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, no, I cannot confirm anything at this moment, and in fact I would point out that while there has been a growing general welfare assistance load in most municipalities, such as Metro Toronto, I believe it was just a couple of days ago that Metro said for the first time in quite a few months that the trend line had reversed. It was too early to say it was definite. However, when one looks at cities such as Windsor and Sudbury, where I believe employment has improved lately—

Interjection.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Sudbury has recently improved in employment.

Mr. Martel: It hasn't in the Sault, though. There are 2,200 guys not going back to work at all.

Hon. F. S. Miller: No, it has not in the Sault. I quite accept the fact. The trend lines may be improving. The other thing I would point out to my friend from the north is that one of the great beauties of municipal government is that they do have some flexibility in programs. It is a very wise thing to allow that flexibility. That does not mean we have not a provincial one. We have never denied that.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, does the Treasurer not recall that he already put an extra burden on the municipalities with the expansion of the seven per cent provincial sales tax? Besides that, is he not aware that his colleague has not been increasing the unconditional grant as compared to the conditional grant and that municipalities do not have the flexibility or the ability to make those kinds of decisions that the Treasurer is indicating? The government again has let the municipalities down in doing exactly what it had promised would be done in years past.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Speaker, if my friend's comments are correct, then why is the burden of municipal taxation a lower percentage of family income today than it was five years ago?

HOSPITAL BEDS

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, the member for Ottawa South and the senior minister for Ottawa-Carleton. For 10 years, he has been a minister in this cabinet and for 10 years we have experienced a shortage of acute care hospital beds in Ottawa-Carleton.

Can the member, as a senior minister, tell the people of Ottawa-Carleton when we are going to get additional acute care beds, in view of the fact that we now have not a political but an objective report from the Ottawa-Carleton Regional District Health Council?

This indicates that instead of making progress over the past 10 years, we have been going backwards. We are now short 214 adult acute care hospital beds for Ottawa-Carleton. In the meantime, we are having a situation where people cannot get into certain hospitals. We are having difficulty treating cancer patients and so on. What can he say to the people of Ottawa-Carleton to solve this very serious problem?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, first, I have had the opportunity of meeting with the members of the hospital planning council in Ottawa and reviewing with them some of the statistics in that report. In questioning the report, they were not quite sure of some of the bases it happens to be derived from.

2:50 p.m.

The question should really be directed to the Minister of Health (Mr. Grossman), but I am delighted to have an opportunity to answer because I have met with them and have gone through some of the aspects of that report.

I think it would be fairer to say that some of the criticisms the member has levelled at this government for not having some of the provisions for heart treatment and so on have been answered by one of the most outstanding doctors in the community—indeed, if not in the province and the country—in the field of heart surgery, and that is Dr. Keon. He very clearly indicates that this government has gone an extremely long way in bringing on stream later this year, some time in the month of September, a relatively large number of units, or beds, for the treatment of heart patients.

Indeed, I asked the hospital planning council in the Ottawa-Carleton area one very straightforward question, "Are you indicating clearly to me that people cannot derive emergency service at all of the institutions in that general geographic area of our province?" That statement is not sustained or upheld by the hospital planning council. They know very well that the capacity is there to look after emergency cases. Where selective surgery is involved, there are sometimes delays in getting that surgery completed.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, the minister quoted from that great surgeon Dr. Keon, and that is the only thing I agree with him about: that he is a great surgeon.

But here is what Dr. Keon said just a very few weeks ago about Mrs. Henriette Renaud, who died because she could not be admitted to the cardiac unit: "But in this case there is just no excuse. She waited seven days, and if we had got her a few days before, even four or five hours before, she probably would be alive today." The reason he did not get her—and he is quoted as saying this—is that he did not have adequate beds.

The minister is well aware that the committee he met with has indicated the necessity is for active hospital acute care beds.

Mr. Rotenberg: Question.

Mr. Roy: Yes, I am coming along. I know it is very sensitive out there because the situation in Ottawa-Carleton is embarrassing.

The committee the minister met with has indicated that the occupancy rate for Ottawa-Carleton is the highest in the province, and what is necessary is more active or acute care beds.

Instead of just voicing generalities, will the minister and his colleague the member for Ottawa West (Mr. Baetz) or the member for Carleton-Grenville (Mr. Sterling), on behalf of their colleagues in cabinet, advise the people of Ottawa-Carleton when we will get additional acute care beds so that patients can get normal treatment in Ottawa-Carleton, as they do in the rest of the province?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Instead of trying to grandstand, the member for Ottawa East should look at the situation in its very clearest form. Indeed, he should read through the entire remarks of Dr. Keon, who recognizes the fact that the individual to whom the member refers should have been admitted to the hospital in advance; but that is a decision of that hospital, not of this government.

I question anyone who will tell me that in the great part of this province, eastern Ontario, the hospitals and the administrations of those hospitals are not responsive to emergency cases. If the member is saying they lack the intelligence, the understanding and the appreciation of emergency cases, I doubt very much that he understands the service of hospitals at all.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, when hospitals are pressed to the wall because of the shortage of resources to provide beds, they are going to be forced into making decisions they will regret, but they will be forced into them by the government.

Is it the policy of the government of Ontario, in addition to keeping a lower ratio of hospital beds to population in eastern Ontario than in any other part of the province, that more than 10 per cent of those beds will have to be taken up with chronic care patients? If not, what action will the minister take to ensure that there is space outside of acute care beds for chronic patients so that the acute care beds can be used for emergency needs?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, I have responded to the member for Ottawa East; I would suggest that the question of the member for Ottawa Centre is similar and I will refer any further questioning or answers on that to the Minister of Health.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Ms. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour with regard to the government's goal, announced in 1980, to achieve 30 per cent representation of women in all modules and categories in the public service by the year 2000. I draw attention to an alarming statement in the introduction to the recently issued report of the women crown employees' office for 1981-82 which seems to indicate a backing away—

The Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the honourable member. I hate doing this but actually I am having trouble hearing the question. I wonder if all honourable members might be so kind as to keep their quiet conversations quiet.

Ms. Bryden: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The comment in the women crown employees' office report for 1981-82 which alarms me and seems to indicate a backing away from the 30 per cent goal is as follows: "The result of this examination was an agreement that the specific goal of 30 per cent representation by women in all modules and categories may not be realistic in some categories and that the goal and methodology be re-examined." They are referring to an examination by the Provincial Auditor and the public accounts committee of the operation of the office.

Does the minister agree that both the goal and the methodology need to be re-examined? Does he feel such a modest goal as 30 per cent representation to be achieved 17 years hence is unrealistic, particularly in view of the opportunities his ministry and the government have to change the atmosphere and to increase the supply of qualified women and the openings to which they may apply?

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the honourable member. I think the goal of 30 per cent is the one we should be working towards. That is what we are attempting to achieve. In fact, that report also indicates that in the past year which the report covers there was improved representation in nine out of the 10 under-represented modules or categories. In the 10th, which was a technical module, the women maintained their representation. That is an indication of definite progress.

Ms. Bryden: Is the minister aware the criticism of the Provincial Auditor was directed to some specific categories involving technical and legal positions? What are the minister's plans to improve the opportunities for training women in these fields? Also, what are his plans to improve the projection techniques for vacancies in these fields?

The public accounts committee recommended both those procedures should be re-examined to see what programs can be developed for training qualified women and for improving the projections.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: I agree with the recommendation that they should be re-examined and that is what is going on at the present time.

Mr. Wrye: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not concerned that while there was an overall increase noted in the report the increase in women's representation in the executive category in the past year was, I believe, only from 6.3 per cent to 6.9 per cent, a total of only 44 women in that category?

Has the minister's staff any studies that may have been done, and can he share them with us, to indicate whether the narrowing of the wage gap by 1.6 per cent as reported in that report was due more to large increases negotiated in collective agreements within the civil service than to any affirmative action by his own ministry?

3 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Ramsay: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted the honourable member brought up the decrease in the wage gap by 1.6 per cent, because that is the most significant decrease we have had in any single year. We are proud of that and I am convinced it has been because of the affirmative action program.

In respect to the other part of the member's question, I just had a conversation yesterday with my colleague the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. Pope). He was telling me very proudly, as well he should, of some executive changes involving women in his ministry.

He has a woman assistant deputy minister and there are now two or three regional directors who are women. That is certainly a breakthrough in that particular ministry, and the same thing is happening across government. This is particularly a breakthrough at a time when there has been a virtual freeze on employment and so on. All of the movement within the civil service is of an internal nature.

EMPLOYEES' PURCHASE OF PLANT

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry and Trade regarding yet another company closing in the province. Given the response of his colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ramsay), to a request for assistance to employees to purchase a plant about to close that he would do everything he could to persuade the company to arrange for the possibility of a buy-out by its employees, and given the minister's response to a request for legislation requiring companies first to make an offer to employees to purchase a plant about to close which was a flat "no," I would like to ask the minister if he still holds the same view in light of the imminent closing of a company on his own home turf in London, Ontario, PPG Industries; would he consider assistance in this and other cases to help employees buy companies which are about to close?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated I am not prepared to see a law passed, and I do not think the member is prepared to see a law passed, that would oblige a company to sell out. In some cases it might not be in the interests of the company to do that. We have to realize they have a right to determine the approach they take to the business and who they might sell to. They have the right to not sell and this might sometimes work to their competitive advantage. Examples of this have come up in recent times.

However, I have agreed to use whatever persuasion my good offices could be to a company, in this case one from Hamilton, to try and be part of that process. I may say we did, to no avail. At least we made an attempt at it and I am prepared to do that in other cases.

I am told of other examples where we have been successful in encouraging an operation to sell to the employees. We are prepared to be a part of it. Indeed, the member might raise the matter with his colleague the member for Kitchener-Wilmot (Mr. Sweeney): in that riding, there is a company with which we are actively playing a role in encouraging a sell-out arrangement to the employees. We will try and do that wherever possible. If we are advised of the situation, wherever it is, we will certainly tackle it.

START CENTRE

Mr. McNeil: Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition containing over 3,450 signatures opposed to the proposed closing of the St. Thomas Adult Rehabilitation and Training Centre.

MCCARTHY'S SANDBLASTING

Ms. Capps: Mr. Speaker, I have a petition for the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Norton): We the undersigned residents of Lake Avenue North and Lake Avenue South, Barlake Avenue, Eastview Avenue, etc., wish to call to your attention the flagrant violation of rules and regulations concerning the health and welfare of all citizens in this area, particularly the children in schools and playgrounds, by McCarthy's Sandblasting, 255 Lake Avenue North. There is a long explanation which I will forego. There are 20 signatures attached to this petition.

REPORT

STANDING COMMITTEE ON REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Kerr from the standing committee on regulations and other statutory instruments presented the following report and moved its adoption:

Your committee begs to report the following bill with a certain amendment:

Bill Pr4, An Act respecting the Missionary Church Canada East.

Your committee begs to report the following bills without amendment:

Bill Pr8, An Act to revive Dave Holliday Limited.

Bill Pr10, An Act to revive Thunder Bay United Church Camps Incorporated.

Bill Pr11, An Act to revive Thomas-Hamilton-Webber Limited.

Bill Pr16, An Act to revive Coptic Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria, the Church of the Virgin Mary and St. Athanasius.

Your committee recommends that the fees, less the actual cost of printing, be remitted on the following:

Bill Pr4, An Act respecting the Missionary Church Canada East.

Bill Pr10, An Act to revive Thunder Bay United Church Camps Incorporated.

Bill Pr16, An Act to revive Coptic Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria, the Church of the Virgin Mary and St. Athanasius.

MOTION

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BUSINESS

Hon. Mr. Wells moved that, notwithstanding standing order 64(d), Mr. Lane and Mr. Dean shall exchange positions in the order of consideration of private members' public business.

Motion agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL

WORKERS' COMPENSATION AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Haggerty moved, seconded by Mr. Mancini, first reading of Bill 30, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, the explanatory note says: "The purpose of the bill is to broaden the criteria used by the Workers' Compensation Board in assessing the impairment of earning capacity resulting from an injury that causes permanent disability. The act currently states that the impairment of earning capacity shall be estimated from the nature and degree of the injury. The board is authorized under the act to compile a rating schedule of percentages of impairment of earning capacity for specified injuries that may be used as a guide in determining the compensation payable in permanent disability cases. The bill repeals the provision that authorizes the board to compile a rating schedule and directs the board to estimate the impairment of earning capacity in the light of all the other circumstances of each individual case."

ORDERS OF THE DAY

THRONE SPEECH DEBATE (concluded)

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the House that we will be moving a further amendment to the amendment to the speech from the throne. As soon as the final delicate wording of that arrives in the House we will be distributing it to the other two parties. I will be moving it at the end of this discourse.

3:10 p.m.

The speech from the throne was as vapid, as vague and as indecisive a document received in this Legislature as I have seen during the decade of this Premier's (Mr. Davis) administration. Considering the nature of throne speeches, this one reached new heights, new heights that gave indecision, procrastination and vagueness, always a hallmark of the this administration, a bad name.

Mr. Barlow: Does that mean you didn't understand it?

Mr. Foulds: No. What it means, for my honourable friend in the back benches of the Tory party, is there was nothing there to understand. What it means is it was, as the great American novelist Faulkner would say, quoting Shakespeare, "A tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Mr. Barlow: I'm sorry I asked.

Mr. Foulds: I'm sure you are.

My personal view is never have people been so disillusioned with their governments, either provincial or federal, and never since the 1930s have the people of the province looked for and desired decisive leadership that contains at least some hint of vision.

Here in Ontario in the last eight weeks, the whole government seems to have been on hold while the Premier made up his mind about whether or not he would run for the federal leadership of the Conservative Party. Will-he Davis or Won't-he Davis: will he run or won't he?

To paraphrase a commentator in Thunder Bay yesterday, Arthur Black: "After the Premier danced his dance of the seven veils, what do we get? We got Premier William Davis revealed in a pale blue body stocking." The central question was: could a vacuum replace a vacuum? The answer came a resounding "yes." The Premier succeeded himself here in the Ontario Legislature.

What we need in this province is leadership, not mere generalship from behind relying on the safety of public opinion polls, relying on the safety of ad hoc decisions that just might get us out of difficult times temporarily.

What we have seen in the last few months, and it was typified by the speech from the throne, is a government in disarray, a government at war among themselves: The minister of Northern Affairs (Mr. Bernier) opposing the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. Pope); and the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) frozen in incompetence, indecision and lack of action over a number of major public policy questions, whether they had to do with the Norcen affair, so clearly outlined by my colleague the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick), or whether they had to do with the tragic events at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Leadership does not mean waiting forever to hear what the polls tell you about everything from the Darlington nuclear station to the province's increasingly artificial bicentennial project. Leadership does not mean waiting forever while the Big Blue Machine takes its polls and tells one whether or not one has a sure thing going into the federal leadership race—or should I say suicide gamble?

What has happened over the last 10 years in this province is that underneath the politics of blandness in Ontario there has begun to emerge, unfortunately, the politics of meanness, the politics of pettiness, the politics of bread and circuses and the politics of absolutely no substance.

This administration has led us from the great expectations of the 1960s, the great hopes of our province and our country at that time to the acknowledged hard times of the 1980s. When the annals of history come to be written of this administration, it will indeed be condemned for its lack of vision, lack of courage and lack of imagination. It will be praised for some political astuteness and shrewdness. It will be praised wherever men praise and revere indecision, public manipulation and procrastination.

Let me quote a couple of paragraphs from this year's speech from the throne:

"Ontario is now emerging from a period that has proven to be difficult for all jurisdictions within the industrial western world. The economic setbacks experienced in 1982 were, beyond doubt, more severe than any public or private observers had foreseen. For the first time since 1975, real output for the industrialized world's economies as a whole declined; and, more disturbing, unemployment rose to unprecedented post-war heights. Clearly, steps must be taken to overcome this situation."

Further on, it says, "The personal economic outlook for many Ontarians, however, will remain challenging." There indeed is a misuse of words if I have ever heard one. Challenging indeed: how can it be challenging when many of those people have no hope of a job?

To go on with the quotation: "My government is well aware of the hardships imposed by high levels of unemployment. These hardships have been borne by men and women in all regions and from all walks of life. The lessening of these difficulties will continue to head the list of matters requiring the full attention of this Legislature."

So far, so good, even if vague. However, as is typical of this administration, here comes the cruncher, the disclaimer, the washing of hands, the abdication of responsibility.

In the next paragraph it says: "It is obvious that no single province has at its disposal the means to solve all of the problems resulting from current economic conditions. However, the government of Ontario"—get this, Mr. Speaker—"will continue to give the highest priority towards the fashioning of initiatives designed to provide badly needed job opportunities."

Let me repeat that just in case anybody missed it, "The government of Ontario will continue to give the highest priority towards the fashioning of initiatives designed to provide badly needed job opportunities."

What the blazes does that mean? In very simple language it means this government has no idea how to create jobs. It means the Premier's and the government's writers and advisers will sit down to fashion words, slides and advertising to try to make things look good.

Actually, that particular sentence elevates verbal qualification to new heights. It may be the first sentence I have ever read that has four qualifying verbs between the subject and the object.

We in the New Democratic Party lack confidence in this government. That should come as no surprise. We think this government has failed dismally the people of Ontario.

It has failed the farmers of this province in view of the number of farm bankruptcies just this spring. When the Canadian Farmers' Survival Association is driven to the action it has taken, and has received the attention it has, it is because the farmers of this province simply have not received the attention and the leadership they expect and deserve from this government.

3:20 p.m.

When the residents from remote northern communities experience the price discrimination they do, as outlined so ably by my colleague the member for Lake Nipigon (Mr. Stokes), and when a relatively stable and large town such as Marathon is barely saved from the precipice of disaster by the closing of their mill, it is obvious that over the decade of this administration they have not received the leadership from this government that they expect and deserve.

When the elderly of this province face extra billing for medical services, and when they face a lack of housing, chronic care, extended care and nursing home beds, it is obvious they have not received the leadership they expect and deserve from this government.

When we have youth unemployment at an unprecedented high rate, I suggest the youth unemployment question is not merely a question of unemployment, not merely a question of job creation but a question that will divide, badger and bedevil this society unless it is remedied, so that social ills in this province will see an unprecedented unfortunate outcome unless they are remedied.

When married young people who require housing cannot afford it, even though there is housing stock they cannot afford on the market, it is obvious they are not getting the leadership they deserve and expect from this government.

When school boards are mandated to provide special education programs; when the Ministry of Community and Social Services, which has been covering some of those programs, has announced that it will no longer provide this funding; when the Ministry of Education will no longer provide that funding and throws it back on to the local school boards; when the municipalities of this province are obliged to provide ever-increasing general welfare assistance by the province; and when we have the province, on the other hand, steadily reducing its share of the costs of these programs, it is obvious the school boards, the municipalities and the people they represent are not receiving the leadership they deserve and have expected from this Conservative government.

My colleague the member for Scarborough West (Mr. R. F. Johnston) demonstrated the other day that people all over this province are seeking and desperately want work. All of us in our constituency offices across the province have experienced similar cases of a very real, heartbreaking and touching nature. I do not know how a government can sit on those benches across the way, in the face of the kind of evidence they have been and must be receiving from their own back-benchers and from the letters that were received by my colleague the member for Scarborough West, and show such complacency, indecision and sheer vague vapidity.

It is obvious that the unemployed, and the unemployed who are in the most tragic situation, those whose unemployment insurance benefits have been exhausted, are not receiving the leadership they deserve and expect from this provincial government.

When my colleague the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) heads a task force on occupational health and safety and, after very careful and thorough examination over the course of a year, comes to the conclusion the Ministry of Labour is failing to enforce the act in literally hundreds if not thousands of instances, it is obvious the workers of this province who are working are not getting the leadership they expect and deserve.

As one witness before that task force put it so graphically, "If the provincial police were to enforce the highway speed limits in the same manner as the Ministry of Labour enforces the Occupational Health and Safety Act, then the only thing on the highways doing less than 150 miles an hour would be a jogger."

The government in this province has given us absolutely no economic leadership in the past year. It has given us little in the past 10 years.

I would for the moment like to turn to some so-called federal initiatives, those initiatives that were greeted so warmly by this Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) initially and by many people initially. In the past 10 days or so, there has been an erosion and a realization that Marc Lalonde's budget was not what it was initially cracked up to be.

I suppose the best thing one can say about it is the reason it looks so good in the first place is that it was preceded by Allan MacEachen's two disasters. If one thinks back far enough, there was John Crosbie's fiscal suicide before that. At a time when Canada's unemployed were expecting a new deal, they were given a raw deal by Mr. Lalonde.

Although it is couched in the language of economic recovery, there is little in the Liberal budget that alleviates the suffering of the unemployed or the insecurity of working Canadians. The federal budget is wrong-headed. The private sector has made it clear that high debt loads and excess capacity have put the brakes on any hope for an investment-led recovery. The Liberals, however, have ignored these facts and gone ahead to strengthen those same tax expenditures which have failed to create jobs in the past.

When 40 per cent of the manufacturing capacity of Ontario, for example, is not being used, how does anyone expect industry to invest in building new capacity? Recent studies have shown Canada's very generous tax incentives in research and development have failed to entice industry into investing in research and development in Canada. In fact, shamefully, only Ireland and Iceland spend less on research and development than is spent in Canada.

The failure of the Lalonde budget has provided the Ontario Treasurer with a responsibility and the opportunity to assist directly the unemployed of Ontario. But we have had no hint, either from the speech from the throne or more recently, that that will be the case.

The Treasurer has been so preoccupied in the past with investment giveaways that he must now concentrate his attention and Ontario's financial resources on job creation and economic stimulation. His budget should contain a major housing initiative. It must create direct jobs through investment in the health care system, in environmental control and in the major industrial sectors.

The Lalonde budget has given investors in the private sector more than enough room to manoeuvre. The Treasurer's budget has to provide those same opportunities for our youth, for our farmers, for our consumers and for the unemployed in Ontario.

The recession has produced a job crisis, pure and simple. There are three quarters of a million unemployed in Ontario. Our youth and our women seek to take their place in our economic life, but their hope is fading. The human cost of this recession is measured in the despair of young graduates looking for their first job, of people in their most productive years suddenly forced into idleness and in older workers cast aside and in fear of never finding another job.

3:30 p.m.

Economists in the Globe and Mail Report on Business and in the Financial Post can talk all they like about economic recovery, but until the unemployed have the dignity and security of a job, the recession remains a recession, if not a depression.

The recession is not even-handed. The government is not accurate when it tries to imply that it has affected men and women equally in all sectors and in all regions of the province. It has affected them deeply but not equally. It affects women workers more than men. It affects the young and less experienced slightly more than others. It increases the ranks of the poor relative to the rich.

Without disregarding the influence of the 1980 oil price shock or the real, ongoing shifts of manufacturing to low-wage countries by the multinational corporations, the prime responsibility for the rate, depth and extent of this recession lies with the government's monetarist experiment, and a cruel experiment it has turned out to be.

The response of conservative governments, whether they be called Liberal, Conservative or PC, to the economic crisis has been cutback and retrenchment. Social programs are suffering. Thousands of the unemployed are in danger of exhausting their unemployment benefits, and the six and five or nine and five public wage restraints have further strangled the sick economy while discriminating against specific workers and trampling on collective bargaining rights.

One of the side effects of the government's wage restraint program on public service workers is coming to my attention more and more from small businessmen in my community. They have people coming into their stores, looking at furniture or appliances and saying, "I really would like to buy a new refrigerator because mine is 10 or 15 years old but, because the government has cut back on my wages, I cannot afford it this year." That is what they say to small businessmen in my community.

It is not just trampling on a small segment of our society. The ripple effect of that trampling on a segment of our society is beginning to be felt by the whole economy. Simply put, we in the New Democratic Party believe strongly that government action, direct and indirect, is required to dig our way out of the situation.

What is the one single economic initiative this government can take credit for over the past year? There is only one. With the help of their Liberal partners here in slavishly following the Liberal lead in Ottawa, they brought in wage controls on public service employees. These are public service employees all across this province; not merely those working with the provincial government but those working for municipalities, school boards, nursing homes, hospitals, universities, schools and all those institutions that provide needed and necessary services for the citizens of Ontario.

This government brought in those controls in September 1982. That was supposed to be the big initiative to get the economy back on the tracks, to get the Ontario economy working again. Has the program succeeded? Has Ontario's economy picked up since last fall? Has the cutback in government spending, the ripping up of contracts, the keeping the lid on the wages of these employees created employment in Ontario? It has not created one single job.

When the program was announced, the unemployment situation was something like this. There were 689,000 out of work in Ontario. Of the women in the Ontario work force, 11.2 per cent were out of work. We had a youth unemployment rate of 16.1 per cent. Let us look at a few randomly selected cities across the province. Thunder Bay, which was one of the best off, had an unemployment rate of 10.1 per cent. St. Catharines and Niagara Falls had unemployment rates of 12.4 per cent. Hamilton had an unemployment rate of 13.1 per cent. Sudbury, the mining capital of Ontario and once the mining capital of the world, had an unemployment rate of 26.9 per cent.

When the government introduced its legislation, I said those figures were scandalous. What are they today, after eight months of those wage controls? The unemployment rate for Ontario is higher at 11.4 per cent. In Thunder Bay it is higher at 14.5 per cent. In St. Catharines and Niagara it is higher at 17 per cent. In Hamilton it is higher at 15.7 per cent. In Sudbury, believe it or not, it is even higher at 27.1 per cent. All those figures have been exceeded in the intervening eight months at some point.

The government's single economic action, the one initiative it took to put the economy back on the road, has not helped our most crucial problem in this deep and abiding recession, the problem of unemployment, one little bit. Furthermore, unemployment for women increased to 11.9 per cent and unemployment for youth skyrocketed to 22.2 per cent. How can we get across to this government, which is largely absent this afternoon, that remedying the unemployment line is far more important than the bottom line?

Finally, the real number of unemployed in the province has jumped in the eight months since September by almost 100,000 to 782,000. That demonstrates just how the Davis government has failed in this past year.

Let us look briefly at the Davis decade. In April 1971 the speech from the throne, the first of the Davis government, contained this statement; I quote directly: "The current unconscionable levels of unemployment which have been forced upon the Canadian people will be combated with every means at the disposal of this provincial government. The budget will be presented on April 26. Its purpose will be to restore the inherent vitality of our economy."

What were the "current unconscionable levels of unemployment which have been forced upon the Canadian people" in April 1971? In our province, it was 6.1 per cent, with the number of unemployed at 192,000. Youth unemployment was still high but, at 11.5 per cent, about half of today's figure. Unemployment of women in the work force was at 5.3 per cent, less than half of today's figure.

What took place in individual cities across the province, in the same cities I compared for the period from September to this month? We went back and looked. The statistics are not exactly parallel, because there has been some minor adjustment of the way Statscan reports, but in the figures we can compare there has been an adjustment of only about 0.2 per cent at the very best.

In Thunder Bay unemployment was at 7.1 per cent, about half of today's figure. In St. Catharines it was at 5.9 per cent, less than half of today's figure. In Hamilton it was at 6.7 per cent, less than half of today's figure. Mr. Speaker, just take a guess at what unemployment in Sudbury was in April 1971. You were in the Legislature in 1971. You were elected in 1971 for the first time. Unemployment was 5.6 per cent. Unemployment in Sudbury was at one fifth of what it is today.

So much for the Premier's vision of the north; so much for diversifying the economy of the largest one-industry town in northern Ontario, let alone the many other one-industry towns.

If those figures were unconscionable, to use the government's phrase in 1971, what can we say about today's rate of unemployment? What can we say about this government, because every one of those figures represents human beings in every region of this province? We can only say that today's unemployment figures display the moral, economic, social and human bankruptcy of this government.

The Davis decade has led us from the great expectations of the 1960s to the hard times of the 1980s. If the creation of a powerful economy, an exciting society, full employment and a place for all our people to stand requires resources, skilled workers and a sound infrastructure, we have all of those here in Ontario. What we do not have is a government that has the guts and is willing to take a hand to put all of these things together and provide the lead for a growing and prosperous economy. What we have is a government that believes in the law of the economic jungle of meanness and of leanness.

At this time I want to put forward a number of proposals for creating jobs. The proposals, quite frankly, will require some deficit financing, but that deficit financing will be a productive deficit and a deficit designed specifically to put people back to work. It will not be the kind of deficit this government has engaged in during the 10 years of the Premier's stewardship, investing in stupid and exotic government spending from the white elephant of Minaki Lodge to the self-serving $40 million in advocacy advertising of this government.

The Premier's government may not have bankrupted this province fiscally, but it has bankrupted this province of its hope and its future and it is dangerously close to bankrupting this province of its faith in itself.

This government's deficit is no more stimulative, no more genuine than the deficit of the federal Liberal government. In fact, the kind of deficit financing that both these levels of government have carried on goes to show that the Premier should not have been seeking or considering the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party at the federal level. He should be pondering the leadership of the Liberal Party at the federal level, and perhaps that is what he is holding off for.

I believe the people of this province and the province itself will fight back. I believe the people of this province will work to make this a place, as the prayer at the opening of this Legislature says every day, "where prosperity reigns and justice prevails," particularly where economic justice prevails. It is economic justice this party has put on the front burner. It is economic justice that we will fight for every day of this sitting of the Legislature.

Prosperity and justice will prevail if the people of this province get the leadership they desire and need. We in the New Democratic Party make no bones about it. We are prepared to accept that leadership. We are prepared to take direct government action and direct government intervention in the economy of this province at any time to help the working men and women and the unemployed people of this province.

We are prepared to work in co-operation with industry, business, small business and the workers of this province. Only by developing a co-operative sense of the future, a co-operative sense of ownership and a co-operative sense of our own strength will we turn this economy around. It is no good to pit one segment of society against another as this government has done by its nine and five per cent wage program. It is no good to victimize the victims of recession as this government has done with social services, with the unemployed and with the throwing of economic costs back on local school boards and municipalities.

It is increasingly apparent that the recovery, which has been welcomed with such relief by the Liberals and Conservatives, is a profit recovery, not a job recovery. The true nature of the recovery is there for anyone to see in last month's Liberal budget projections. Those projections expect unemployment of more than 12 per cent in 1983, more than 11 per cent in 1984 and more than 10 per cent through 1985 and 1986.

What happened to the unconscionable level of unemployment in 1971 of 6.1 per cent? We are going to get back to those unconscionable levels of 6.1 per cent only if we have the guts to aim for full employment and to start some direct intervention in the economy now. Recovery is a meaningless term in the face of continuing high unemployment.

There is no recovery for the 176 Ontario farmers who went into bankruptcy in 1982. There is no recovery for the additional 47 farmers who lost their farms to creditors in the first quarter of 1983. There is precious little recovery for the workers in Sudbury, Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie, in Brantford, Chatham, Windsor, the Niagara Peninsula and in eastern Ontario, where the recession has meant unemployment rates of 15 to 27 per cent.

The recovery is a cruel joke to the thousands of employable people in Ontario who have exhausted their unemployment claims and have been forced on to the welfare rolls.

What must be done immediately is to restore the conditions under which consumer spending will resume, jobs will be created and necessary investment will be undertaken, and under which social services and health services must be not only maintained but also strengthened. In the face of the inability of the private sector to provide those jobs, and the incomes so desperately needed for the economic recovery in Ontario, government must act. There is a good deal that can be done and an NDP government would do it.

An unemployment recovery program must respond to cyclical, seasonal and structural unemployment. This means harmonizing a range of policies to promote economic development and community wellbeing. My friend and colleague the member for Windsor-Riverside (Mr. Cooke) will be outlining those policies and strategies in detail in his response to the budget to be presented by the Treasurer (Mr. F. S. Miller) next Tuesday. However, I would like to comment and outline some of the highlights.

The policies must include general spending and taxation policies that will provide the most efficient use of government supports for industrial development activity, the most effective direction of government expenditures, both direct and indirect, in relation to job creation. In other words, government expenditures should be job-intensive, and the most progressive kind of tax funding must be included in the government's program.

Second, when we build on public assets we are not simply throwing money away; we are investing in the future. When we build new schools, hospitals or health care clinics we are building for the future of this province; they are assets that this province and the communities of this province will enjoy for years to come. We must do that so the people of Ontario will continue to derive future benefits from current government spending. In other words, the kind of spending we are talking about is the kind of spending that will pay off in the future and not simply go up in a puff of smoke.

3:50 p.m.

We must build human resources. We must do that through career choices and through retraining opportunities, and career opportunities, if I may say so, should be not merely in the new high-tech areas but in some traditional job areas as well. We must support community initiatives; we must have direct job creation initiatives; we must have economic planning in public investment. Finally, we must have in many cases, particularly in the case of plant shutdowns, direct legislative intervention to give us protection.

Real economic recovery must begin with action to protect existing jobs. We have long argued for improvements in plant closing legislation to bring Canada into line with its European counterparts. Proposed plant closings should be subjected to public scrutiny, with an open-book examination of the company's operations. In any shutdown, workers should have the right of first refusal to purchase the operation, and government should support such initiatives via preferential financing terms.

We have found over the past year that many of the closings in this province have been closings of plants that were profitable or potentially profitable. It was "rationalization," and the rationalization sacrificed the Canadian worker and the Canadian branch plants. We have to get that kind of protection.

However, if a plant closing really is unavoidable, companies should provide and pay for retraining as well as encouraging and paying for early retirement. Severance pay obligations, pension provisions and collective bargaining rights must be strengthened to protect jobs in Ontario.

What follows is, very briefly, the kind of job creation program that we in this party believe in and believe in very strongly. We are proposing a $2-billion, short-term employment program to create 150,000 jobs and a five-year, $5-billion program to create 200,000 new jobs throughout Ontario. The program is creative and it is workable. It is principled but pragmatic. It is ambitious and it will cost some dollars, but I submit that it is fiscally responsible.

Youth unemployment is at a crisis level in Ontario. Our proposals would put at least 140,000 of our young people to work. They would increase the pool of skilled labour in our province so that those young people could continue to have jobs in their middle age and until their retirement.

Other proposals in the energy field, in agriculture, in the environmental sector and in the health and social service sector would create useful jobs and provide Ontario with services and facilities that are needed now. These proposals, although they are short-term in the sense that they would create short-term jobs, are investments for today and tomorrow to give people experience and skill so they can become part of the permanent work force of Ontario and be pulled into a growing and developing economy.

In the longer term we are proposing a five-year program of industrial restructuring. That is what we need in this province; let us face it. Despite the claims that the economy has begun a fragile recovery, the private sector continues to dismantle productive capacity. Branch plants are closing down. Private sector reinvestment is falling short of necessary levels of retooling and product development. We must begin to implement an economic strategy for recovery based on the creation of permanent jobs, industrial restructuring, resource development and local and regional development.

Ontario imports more than $35 billion worth of manufactured goods. If we replaced only 15 per cent by domestic products, 60,000 direct jobs could be created and many other jobs would be created by the spinoff activities. Whether it is auto parts, agricultural products, mining machinery or electronics, we have significant trade deficits. These deficits represent opportunities for jobs and industrial development. Government must undertake public investment today for tomorrow's jobs. Our five-year program is designed to take advantage of these opportunities in key sectors of Ontario's economy.

The talk, which is very disappointing, is about the recovery that is "under way." Catch phrases such as "increase in investor confidence" are supposed to indicate that the recession has bottomed out and that we are on our way to so-called sustained growth. However, when we have unemployment predictions that point to a continuing unemployment crisis, what we have is a government that has failed to come to terms with creating jobs. The Liberal budget projected unemployment at more than 12 per cent for the rest of this year, more than 11 per cent for 1984 and more than 10 per cent for 1985 and 1986. Very simply, we believe these figures are unacceptable.

I want to conclude by indicating that this speech from the throne has got to be the biggest non-event, the biggest pile of pap, the biggest abdication of authority, the biggest abdication of responsibility that even the Davis administration has engaged in during its whole decade; and that is saying a lot. As I have emphasized before, what the people of Ontario want is leadership, not abdication. What they want is hope, not despair. What they want is the understanding that jobs will be created now, not starting in 1985 or 1986.

What they want is a bicentennial that is really worth celebrating in 1984. One of the biggest and best bicentennial projects this government could bring in would be a massive job creation program all across this province. That is the kind of bicentennial project that would speak to all the groups in all the regions of this province, and that is the kind of bicentennial project this party would be delighted to implement and to support.

What the people of Ontario want is a government of substance, not a government of image. The people of Ontario are willing to pitch in. They are willing to bear their fair share of rebuilding this province and this economy, but they are no longer willing to be victimized by an insensitive, callous and floundering administration.

Because the speech from the throne fails in every conceivable way to come to grips with the major problem of our province, the problem of jobs, the problem of human need, the problem of decent housing, the problem of health care, this speech from the throne does not have our confidence. This government has given the people of Ontario not a glimmer of hope, not a glimmer of vision for the future direction of this province, and we in the New Democratic Party have absolutely no alternative but to vote against this government.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Foulds moves, seconded by Mr. Rae, that the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech of the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor be amended by adding after the word "times" and before the words, "Therefore, this House declares its lack of confidence in the government," the following:

"And further, this House regrets that the provincial government has utterly failed to respond to the bankruptcy of Liberal government policies and has instead simply produced a vague and aimless speech worthy of liberalism itself rather than acting decisively to provide jobs, health and housing for Ontario's people."

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour for me to wind up this throne speech debate on behalf of my Liberal colleagues.

At the outset of my remarks, as is customary, I would like to extend to you, Mr. Speaker, my very best wishes on the manner in which you are discharging your responsibilities in the chair. I think it is no secret for me to suggest we have had differences of opinion, but I like to believe we are growing together. I have been increasingly impressed by the way in which you are discharging the very difficult responsibilities that are yours.

As well, I would like to have you communicate those best wishes to your colleagues the member for Durham East (Mr. Cureatz) and the member for York Centre (Mr. Cousens).

Also at the outset of my remarks, I would like to offer a word of thanks to the good people of the Ottawa Valley and Renfrew North who continue to support me in most of my causes. I certainly enjoyed the legislative recess during which I had an excellent opportunity to travel about the hills and valleys of Renfrew county. I profited greatly from that opportunity.

I would like to turn my attention to the speech from the throne, which was read by the Lieutenant Governor in this place on Monday afternoon, April 18, 1983.

Given the recent events of this place and the politics of this province, I dare say upon rereading this particular speech from the throne on a number of occasions in preparation for this afternoon's reply that I have to think there was no more clear indicator than this speech from the throne that this was a government and a Premier (Mr. Davis) who truly have and had no plans to have any plans.

When one reads and rereads this speech from the throne, it is hard to imagine there was enough here to entice even Zena Cherry to this assembly on that sunny afternoon two or three weeks ago. One of my constituents to whom I offered the speech for reflection said it was "a tribute to longitude and platitude."

Before I turn to this tribute to longitude and platitude, I want to comment quickly upon much of the throne speech debate which it has been my pleasure to have heard over these past number of days. Once my leader asked me to prepare these remarks for the summary debate on our part, I must say I tried to listen to as many of the interveners as possible. In my humble estimation, I have to say that on balance the speeches in the debate on the throne speech were decidedly superior to the document itself.

I was disappointed, as were many of my colleagues on this side of the House and I dare say some on the government side, with the
